In order to bring that question before the Court the former probate has been called in, and these unexecuted papers have been propounded by one of the executors named in each set of instruments, and opposed by the other three executors. The suit seems to have been quite amicably conducted. The plea propounding the unexecuted papers details all the circumstances, and in proof, the answers of Mr. Langford, one of the executors, have been given, he being the confidential solicitor of the deceased employed in preparing the several instruments; and five witnesses have been examined; two of these are Mr. Langford's clerks, who supply some material facts not within Mr. Langford's own knowledge: the other three witnesses are, the medical person [240] who attended the deceased, and two tradesmen who were called in to attest the execution, but which execution was prevented by the death of the deceased, when he was just about to execute the principal instrument—the new will.

The facts thus laid before the Court, it may be proper to state. The deceased, besides his personalty, had a valuable real estate; he was engaged in a distillery, and also in a glass manufactory. On the marriage of three of his daughters, Mrs. Crofton, Mrs. Luttrell, and Mrs. Dashwood, the deceased advanced 10,000l., and on the marriage of the other daughter, Mrs. Acland, he settled on her 20,000l.; 10,000l. in money and 10,000l. by bond.

On the 2d of August, 1826, as I have already stated, he executed a will and two codicils; by that will, as far as it is necessary to state it, he gave to each of his married daughters, with the exception of Mrs. Acland, 10,000l. in addition to their settlement; and to his unmarried daughter, Ann, 20,000l., who was at that time about to be married to Mr. Dashwood; so that he then clearly intended that each of his daughters should receive from him in the whole 20,000l. His daughter Mary (Mrs. Crofton) having been left a widow with two children, had afterwards married Captain Losack, and her additional 10,000l. were secured to her children by Mr. Crofton, but the deceased also gave to his grand-daughter, Miss Losack, 2000l. The residue, real and personal, he bequeathed to his son, who then was, and still is, a minor: he appointed as executors Mr. John Maberly, with a legacy of 1000l.; [241] Mr. Edward Temple Booth, Mr. John Masterman, and Mr. Robert Langford, each with a legacy of 500l.: these were the contents of the will of August, 1826, so far as it is necessary to recite them.

(a) The deed of settlement was before the Court, but it was not propounded: its contents and the reasons of its non-execution are noticed in the judgment. See infra, pp. 242, 3, 5.

The first codicil directed that the legacy duty should be paid out of the estate: the second, that if the son died a minor (for it was only on that contingency), the residue, real and personal, should be divided among the daughters.

About September, 1827, the deceased became unwell, and grew gradually worse till his death. Mr. Langford, his solicitor and one of his executors, was at the commencement of this illness absent from London, but returned in November. The deceased shortly afterwards expressed to him his wish to make some alterations in his will, and in the beginning of December they read over the will together, when he gave instructions for the alterations he wished to have made, which Mr. Langford took down in writing. Those alterations were, an annuity of 100l. to Miss Sandford; the omission of the conditional provision to his daughter Ann, as the marriage between her and Mr. Dashwood had taken place; the substitution of William Leader Maberly as a trustee and executor, in the place of John Maberly, his father; the omission of the legacy to the latter; the introduction of a legacy of 100l. to his coachman, and of one year's wages to other deserving servants; blanks were to be left for the legacies to his daughters; and the legacy to his grand-daughter, Augusta Losack, was to be 5000l.

Such was the substance of the instructions [242] given, as I understand, at the first interview; and from them, which made no very important alteration in the former will (that is, supposing the legacies to the daughters were filled up), the draft of a new will was prepared. On the 12th of December Mr. Langford attended the deceased and read or explained the draft to him, and was then informed by him that Mr. Atlee, his partner in the distillery, had proposed paying him 30,000l. for his share of the business, and that he, the deceased, had determined to invest that sum in the funds, in the names of trustees, for the benefit of three of his daughters, Mrs. Losack, Mrs. Dashwood, and Mrs. Luttrell, and their children: Mrs. Acland, as has been before remarked, had had the whole 20,000l. secured to her at her marriage. At this interview the deceased also told Mr. Langford that he had it in contemplation to give bonds to the trustees of the marriage settlements of these three daughters, in order thus to secure to each of them 10,000l. instead of doing it by will.

At the latter end of December the deceased had a further interview with Mr. Langford, and then gave instructions for some additional small legacies; and 500l. a year to his wife in case she did not wish to inhabit the house at Putney; for the omission of the legacies to the three daughters, as he intended to secure them the 10,000l. by bond instead of by will; and for the insertion of a legacy of 5000l. to his daughter Mrs. Acland, and of 5000l. to Mr. Acland—and who were to have no share in the 30,000l. from Atlee; of an additional 500l. a year for the maintenance of his son till he came of age; and if the son died before the age of twenty-[243]-one, then, instead of the residue going equally between the four daughters, he directed only 20,000l. to be given to Mrs. Losack and the rest among the other three. He also gave instructions for a deed of settlement of the 30,000l. expected to be received from Mr. Atlee; one-sixth thereof was to go to his grandchildren the Croftons, one-sixth to his grandchildren the Losacks, one-third to Mrs. Dashwood and her children, one-third to Mrs. Luttrell and her children; and, in consequence of this arrangement, the legacy of 5000l. to Miss Losack was omitted. In pursuance of these further instructions drafts were prepared—of the new will without legacies to the three daughters—of the bonds securing 10,000l. to the trustees of each marriage settlement—and of the deed of trust for Atlee's 30,000l., which latter deed was to be executed as soon as that sum should be invested in the funds. These draft bonds, and the draft of the new will, are the papers propounded. On the 4th of January the drafts of these several instruments were carried by Langford to the deceased, were read or fully explained to him, and he approved of, or expressed his satisfaction at, them.

Here, then, were the instructions carefully decided on, after much consideration and repeated interviews, and the drafts finally approved. The only further direction given on that day had no reference to the former part of the disposition; it was merely an authority to his executors to allow his partners, both in the distillery and in the glass manufactory, a certain time to pay in their share of the capital in these concerns.

[244] Mr. Langford was under an engagement to go out of town on the following day, the 5th of January, and it was settled that the matters should be completed as soon as he came back, which was expected to be in a few days: but he informed the deceased that the instruments should be prepared, so that if he wished to execute them he might send for them to his (Langford's) office. Mr. Langford, therefore, must have considered the mind of the deceased to have been finally made up. On the 5th of January the additions, respecting the time to be allowed the partners for paying off the deceased's share of the capital, were directed by Simmonds, Mr. Langford's clerk, to be inserted in the draft; and he waited on the deceased with the draft, so altered, on the 7th. He found the deceased very ill, but sitting on a sofa; he informed the deceased, "That he had brought the several drafts, but would only trouble him with the alterations:" he replied, "That every thing had been arranged respecting the said will with Mr. Langford, and that he only required to have the additional clauses read to him." This was accordingly done; those clauses were finally settled; some other unimportant explanations were given, and the deceased expressed himself quite satisfied; so that here, again, was a final approbation. Simmonds then asked, "If he should get this instrument engrossed for execution?" The deceased replied, "No, nothing can be done till I see Mr. Atlee, who is to pay the 30,000l.; it must wait till Mr. Langford comes to town." This does not appear to have arisen in the slightest degree from any wavering of intention, but merely from [245] a wish that the whole might be completed at once; for the deed of settlement could not be executed till the 30,000l. was actually invested.

It was argued that this declaration shewed that the disposition was wholly to depend on Mr. Atlee's paying this 30,000l. I cannot view it in that light; every thing was settled; and suppose that Atlee had changed his intention and declined to pay, it would not have affected the whole; it would be no abandonment. I cannot think that the whole matter was at all dependent upon the completion of the act by Mr. Atlee. So satisfied, however, was Simmonds of the deceased's final approbation, that, perceiving the deceased was very ill, he caused all the instruments to be actually engrossed.

On the 11th of January the deceased was alarmingly ill, but was better the next day: on Sunday the 13th, however, he was again worse, and asked his medical attendant, Fisher, "If it was the 17th?" who replied by asking, "If he had any thing to do on the 17th?" He said, "He had some papers to sign." Fisher said, "He had better not defer it:" the deceased replied, "I know what you mean:" understanding, therefore, that he was in that degree of danger that, if it was necessary to do any act, he had better not delay it: he then immediately informed Mr. Acland that there were some papers at Langford's house which he wanted to execute; and desired they might be directly fetched. Langford had, as already pointed out, said that the papers should be ready if wanted; and though the deceased had told Simmonds that the whole business should stand over till Langford's return to town, yet, immediately on [246] being apprized of his danger, he sent for the papers, though he was clearly aware that the deed of settlement could not take effect. These circumstances again shew final intention, and that at this time the deceased was in a perfect state of capacity. One of Mr. Langford's clerks, Stent, immediately delivered the engrossed copy of the will—but what other papers does not appear: it was carried to the deceased's house; he was informed of its arrival by Fisher; he wished to sign it; witnesses were procured; he was lifted up in bed; but at the very moment that a pen was handed to him he expired.

Now these circumstances, happening on the 13th, are sufficient to shew adherence of intention, generally, to the arrangement he had decided upon making; but it cannot be understood that he meant to give effect to the engrossed will in exclusion of the bonds; it is quite clear that the bonds constituted a part of the arrangement which he intended should take place after his death. Fisher describes him as being in a dying state on that morning; he speaks of papers (in the plural) which he wanted to execute, not as if he wanted the will in exclusion of the bonds; no allusion was made to the omission in the will of the legacies of the 10,000l., which legacies were merely omitted because he was to carry his intentions into effect in a different mode: it was as much his determination to execute the bonds as the will; the bonds were meant as a substitute for the legacies in the will.

These being the facts of the case, and the intentions of the deceased quite manifest, there seems to be no difficulty thus far as to the law.

[247] In respect to personal property, where there is final intention proved and execution prevented by the act of God, the mere want of execution does not invalidate the instrument. The disposition intended to be made has the same legal effect, in regard to personal property, as if the instruments had been actually signed and attested. This non-execution does not in law affect the validity of these instruments as testamentary instruments applying to personal property. It is also settled law, and several cases have been decided, that if the paper contains the disposition of the property to be made after death, though it were meant to operate as a settlement, or a deed of gift, or a bond; though such paper were not intended to be a will nor other testamentary instrument, but an instrument of a different shape; yet if it cannot operate in the latter, it may nevertheless operate in the former, character.

Cases of Scotch conveyances, of deeds of gift, and others of a similar nature were cited in argument; and I will only mention a few in addition to them. In Musgrave v. Down, T. T. 1784, the assignment of a bond by endorsement—in Sabine v. Goate and Church, 1782, receipts for stock and bills endorsed "for Mrs. Sabine"—in Drybutter v. Hodges, E. T. 1793, a letter—in Marnell v. Walton, T. T. 1796, marriage articles—in Maxee v. Shute, H. T. 1799, promissory notes, and notes payable by executors to evade legacy duty, were held to be testamentary.

These are a few out of many cases that have occurred in the Prerogative Court; and, from the reports both at common law and in [248] equity, a variety of instances have been, and others might be, cited.(a)[1] So that it is a settled point that the form of a paper does not affect its title to probate, provided it is the intention of the deceased that it should operate after his death. Here the intention of the deceased in respect to the disposition is beyond doubt; it is clear that he meant these daughters to have the additional 10,000l. each; he had proposed at first to effect this in the form of legacies in his will; but afterwards thought it would answer his purpose better to give those legacies in the form of bonds, and to omit them in the will; and these bonds therefore are to be considered as testamentary instruments, and the mere want of execution does not invalidate them; as that execution is shewn to have been prevented alone by death.

The fair copy of the will and the bonds therefore taken together, though none of them are executed, contain, on the ordinary principles of the Court, the will of the deceased as to his personalty. For it is clear that the execution was intended till the latest moment of his life, and that he would have executed the bonds as well as the will had he not been suddenly struck by death: nor is there any reason to suppose that he would have postponed that act till Atlee's 30,000l. were paid and invested in the funds.

The effect of pronouncing for probate of the unexecuted paper and the bonds may be to give a larger relative benefit to the Aclands; for the other three daughters will, under those papers as well as under the original will, each take [249] 10,000l. less than the deceased finally intended: Miss Losack's legacy also may be defeated from the circuitous mode in which the deceased proposed to give effect to his intentions: the Court much regrets that circumstance, and would fain trust that, when the minor comes of age, effect may be given to the deceased's wishes in that respect.(a)[2] But on all the consideration that a judicial view of the subject requires, and acting on legal principles, without regarding what may be the result upon the construction of these papers, I decree probate of the fair copy of the will (for in that way the instrument was laid before the deceased for execution), and of the bonds.

The probate which has been granted must be revoked, but the will may remain in the registry of this Court for safe custody.

(a)[1] See Molineux v. Molineux, Cro. Jac. 144.

(a)[2] In the course of the argument the Court said: It was the clear intention of the deceased that his grand-daughter, Miss Losack, should have a legacy of £5000: it was taken down in writing, in the instructions given to Mr. Langford at his first interview, in December, 1827, with the deceased, on the subject of his will; and it was inserted in the first draft. The revocation of the legacy was only conditional upon the execution of the deed of settlement, which was not effected.

REAY v. COWCHER. Prerogative Court, 15th Jan., 1829.—The presumption is that a codicil disposing of realty as well as personalty, unattested, only signed by initials and with many interlineations is unfinished and preparatory; and then it must be shewn the deceased thought it would operate in its actual form or was prevented by a sufficient cause from finishing it.—When a paper is unfinished the presumption of law is strong against it; especially when it is to alter an executed instrument; still more when to revoke a disposition of the bulk of the property to the deceased's own family, and transfer it to a stranger.

The King's advocate and Dodson for the will and codicils. [See vol. i. p. 75.]

Lushington and Haggard contrà.

[250] Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This cause has been already under the consideration of the Court at a former hearing, so far as respected the validity of the will, which was opposed by the widow. A multitude of witnesses were examined; but, though much contradictory and inconsistent evidence was produced, the grounds of opposition manifestly and completely failed her; and there being no doubt of the deceased's capacity in 1824, the will was clearly established. The wife being thereby excluded, and her interest not being affected by the codicil, the case stood over; and the Court reserved the question arising upon the codicil till the party interested under and excluded by it intervened.

The codicil rests upon totally distinct grounds from the will. The question is, 1st, whether the instrument is finished or unfinished; and, 2dly, whether, if unfinished, it is supported by circumstances sufficient to shew that it contains the fixed and final intentions of the deceased, and that the finishing was prevented.

The will marks a considerable degree of resentment and want of confidence towards the son and daughter, or rather towards the daughter's husband; but still the bulk of the deceased's property (after providing for his housekeeper, and reposing trust in her, and in her sister) is to centre in his own family—in his grandchildren. Now the codicil makes a great alteration: instead of the annuities to the son and daughter, it gives the daughter and her children a house in Davies-street, and to the son and his children another house in the same [251] street: whether these are of equal value with the legacy does not appear; but the paper bequeaths the residue to Mrs. Reay, and authorises his executrices (viz. herself and her sister), if his wife, daughter, or son should institute legal proceedings, "To cut them off with a shilling." This codicil is dated on the 21st of October, 1826.

Here, then, between March, 1824, the date of the will, and October, 1826, is a complete departure from, and alteration of, the intention of the will. The son and the daughter are differently provided for, and the bulk of his property is given away from his own family—from his grandchildren—and is transferred to a stranger in blood who lived with him in the capacity of housekeeper. To account for this great change no circumstances are adduced which rationally and naturally lead to it.

The deceased was a strange, eccentric, violent man in temper; his quarrels with, and separation from, his wife; his alienation from his son and daughter, prove that to have been his character: but these things had occurred long before the will was made; so that these resentments account in no way for the change in the disposition of his property; and the daughter had a child, which would be an additional reason for the continuance of the bequest in their favour. So also as to his confidence in Elizabeth Reay; she had resided with him under the name of Mrs. Smith ever since 1820; and there is no evidence that her residence was otherwise than perfectly innocent, and in the character of companion and housekeeper: but there had been no change in her relation to him; [252] no fresh quarrel with his son and daughter; they occasionally called and were kindly received; and on the last occasion of his seeing his daughter "he kissed and blessed her." This is proved by two of Mrs. Reay's own witnesses.

Much evidence was offered to shew that the deceased was not only eccentric and, in the opinion of several, insane, but that he was also much addicted to intoxication; and Mr. Crowdy, the medical man, deposes, "That the disorder of which he died was brought on by intemperance:" and though that was not sufficient to affect the validity of a will formally drawn up, and regularly executed and attested in March, 1824, yet it may be material, coupled with the change of disposition, to bear upon the inference whether, in October, 1826, within six weeks of his death, this codicil was a finished and final paper, or whether it was produced by a hasty and transient feeling not afterwards adhered to, but abandoned.

The question then comes to this consideration, whether from the form and appearance of the paper itself, or rather of the two papers, they are to be esteemed final. There is a third paper which is not propounded; but on which an observation arises, and not an unimportant one; for though it is a mere directory memorandum, yet the deceased's name is subscribed formally and fully: this shews his practice and habit, and affords something of an inference against the mere subscription of A, by his initials.

However, paper A, the dispositive paper, is the important instrument: it is half a sheet of gilt post letter paper: and apparently it was only [253] half a sheet when the deceased took it up, for the writing which covers both sides of it begins at the gilt, and not at the torn, edge. It is not a paper therefore on which it is likely that a methodical formal man (for so the deceased was) would begin writing an important codicil, to which he had previously made up his mind: it looks more like a hasty memorandum for further deliberation; and upon the face of it cannot be deemed a final instrument. There are various erasures and interlineations; and most important alterations, particularly in the disposition of the residue; for though, as first written, it was revocatory of the residuary clause in the will, yet this paper originally bequeathed it quite to a different person from the actual legatee, viz. to "Mr. Charles Douglas of Cambridge College:" but who he was, or why he was introduced, or why he was superseded, no account is given: and afterwards the name of Mrs. Elizabeth Reay was interlined. The paper is only subscribed with initials: is unattested: seems to have been written and subscribed uno contextu; and the alteration appears to have taken place subsequently; but when is not ascertained.

The first impression therefore was not to give the residue to Mrs. Reay: so that the origin of this codicil is not to be sought in the increase of his affection for her: and when I consider that the deceased was a man of great regularity, form, and precision; and that all the papers found in the drawer with the paper in question were in order, it is hardly possible to suppose that he could have intended it as final and finished, or have proposed it to be any thing more than a mere preparatory sketch for future deliberation.

[254] But further; his will, all written with his own hand, is signed and sealed, and was executed in the presence of three witnesses: he was aware, therefore, of the necessity of having three witnesses to a devise of real property; and part of the residue is real: if, then, he had intended this paper to operate, it is to be inferred he would have had witnesses: and it is proved by Mr. Crowdy, the surgeon, Mrs. Reay's own witness, that the deceased did intend to have the paper attested, and to do a further act in order to give it effect. The paper under these circumstances must be regarded as unfinished.

A declaration, however, is relied on: but it is quite impossible to depend on a loose declaration, deposed to at a considerable distance of time. From the experience we have in this place, we know declarations are for ever made and for ever misunderstood, and never can operate against the conduct of the party deceased. The paper itself shews that he had a floating intention when he wrote it to do something, and that he also had the same sort of intention when he altered it: but I have already said it can only be considered as unfinished and preparatory; and then the question is, whether there is sufficient to establish it in that character.

When a paper is unfinished the presumption of law is strong against it; more especially when it is to alter an executed instrument, and, à multo fortiori, when it is to revoke a disposition of the bulk of the property to the deceased's own family, and to transfer it to a stranger; and such would be the effect of this codicil. There is a total absence of all circumstances tending to shew either that the [255] deceased considered this paper would operate in its present form, or that he wished to finish it, but was by some sufficient cause prevented. The paper is dated on the 21st of October, and the deceased died on the 1st of December, so that he lived for six weeks after he wrote it, and had abundant opportunity of completing it. True, he was confined to his bed for the last three weeks of his life, but there is no reference to this paper within the last month of his life, except a single declaration, and that, I repeat, is of no weight under the circumstances of this case.

The question then comes to the finding. The will itself was found sealed up in an envelope endorsed as the will, and placed in a tin box with other papers relating to his property. Had the codicil been also so found it might have been a very material fact, but it was found in an open drawer of a table in the room where the deceased sat, in which drawer was the memorandum to which I have adverted, and which could have been of no effect for the last three or four years of his life: this is just the situation in which the deceased might leave an unfinished, deliberative paper, to be taken out and copied whenever he should make up his mind finally to give it effect: but if he had already decided, if he meant to do nothing more, if he intended the paper to operate in this form, he would have put it away in a place of safety with his will. But, then, it is said, that paper B, a fairly written paper, was found in the same place; B, however, carries the matter no further: it is true that it is fairly written; but it ends without any stop, not even a comma, and has no date; nor does it [256] appear when it was written, nor is there any certain constat to what paper it applies; there is no positive reference to A, and the direction contained in it as to the sale of the house would be unnecessary, if Mrs. Reay was already residuary legatee. The inference then is that it is quite independent of, and has no connexion with, A, except that it was found in conjunction with it. There is, then, nothing to shew that A was a finished paper; or, if unfinished, that the deceased was prevented from completing it; nor is there any circumstance to prove adherence to it, nor an intention that it should operate at the time of his death.

I therefore pronounce against the validity of the codicil, and direct the costs on all sides to be paid out of the estate.

[257] BEARE AND BILES v. JACOB. Arches Court, Hilary Term, 1st Session, 1829. —Though the regular appeal from a jurisdiction not peculiar but subordinate is to the diocesan, yet, if the Judge of the subordinate and diocesan courts be the same person, the appeal may be per saltum to the metropolitan: but the reason must appear by the formal instruments in the cause.

[See further, p. 522, post.]

On protest.

This was an appeal from the Court of the Sub-dean of Sarum, described as "an exempt and peculiar jurisdiction." (a)

It was a suit originally instituted in that Court, before the Reverend Matthew Marsh, B.D., sub-dean of the said sub-deanery, by Peter Jacob, who, as surviving residuary legatee in the will of James Jacob, had called upon Messrs. Beare and Biles, the executors, for an inventory and account.

The præsertim of the appeal was: "That the Judge had confirmed a report of the registrar, thereby pronouncing that 57l. were due to Peter Jacob."

After the inhibition and citation were returned, an appearance, under protest, was given for the respondent; and, on his behalf, it was alleged [258] in act on petition, "that the right of appeal in all cases, depending in the Court of the Sub-dean of Sarum, by law notoriously belonged to the lord bishop of the diocese of Sarum, or his chancellor for the time being, and did not lie directly and immediately to the Court of Arches: that the Court of the Sub-dean was not an exempt and peculiar jurisdiction, but archidiaconal merely, and that the sub-dean, in the exercise of his jurisdiction, was subordinate to, and controuled by, the bishop."

For the appellants it was alleged "that the Judge of the Court of the Sub-dean was also Judge of the Consistory Court of the bishop of the diocese, and that the appeal would, under the circumstances, lie to the Arches."

In reply it was averred "that the circumstance of the two offices being held together by the same person was no ground for altering the established course of appeals; and that if it were, such ground ought to have been alleged previous to the issuing of the inhibition and citation, and inserted therein, as founding the metropolitan jurisdiction; but that those instruments had issued on a false suggestion, viz. that the Court of the Sub-dean of Sarum was an exempt and peculiar jurisdiction."

Dodson in support of the protest. The sub-dean of Sarum has no peculiar nor exempt jurisdiction: the dignity and office are conferred by the bishop of the diocese

---

(a) The inhibition and citation did not originally state that the Court of the Sub-dean was an "exempt jurisdiction;" but on the registrar of the Arches Court refusing to sign them, because it did not appear, on the face of the instruments, that the appeal lay to the Arches, the proctor alleged the jurisdiction to be exempt, and the words "exempt and peculiar" were interlined.

who collates to them, who visits and inhibits the sub-dean. Mr. Davies, twenty-two years deputy-registrar of both Courts, states in his affidavit [259] "that the jurisdiction of the Court of the Sub-dean is not exempt and peculiar, nor co-ordinate with the jurisdiction exercised by the bishop of his diocese, his chancellor, or official:" and, further, "that the sub-deanery is visited by the bishop in every respect as the archdeaconries within the diocese." The appellants allege that the chancellor of the diocese and the sub-dean are the same person, and that it is nugatory to appeal to the same Judge: but this objection, if good, should have been originally set forth and legally asserted. Oughton, "De recusatione judicis suspecti," tit. 272. This objection, however, being to the person of the Judge, and not to the Court, the Court should not on that account be passed over, particularly as the Judges of the two Courts are not necessarily the same. On the course of appeals he cited Parham v. Templar, 3 Phill. 241, Tull v. Osberson, 1 Sid. 90.

Lushington and Addams contrà. Objections of form will not be favoured: and much difficulty exists in ascertaining the different jurisdictions in each particular diocese. If the sub-dean of Sarum has not a peculiar and exempt jurisdiction; still, should this protest be sustained, the appeal will be to the same Judge, who must, at least, be considered as disqualified; since, having once decided this very cause, his mind cannot be free from bias. The case comes precisely within the general principles laid down upon this subject by Gail.(a) An appeal does not lie from the com-[260]missary to the bishop, "lest," says Burn (referring to Gibson), "the appeal should seem to be made from the same person to the same person" (1 Burn's Eccl. Law, 8th ed. p. 60). Though by the civil law appeals were strictly gradatim, non omisso medio (Dig. 49, 1, 21, and Theod. Cod. 1 vol. p. 82), by the canon law and by custom they were allowed per saltum. X. 2, 28, 66. Sexti Decret. 1, 4, 2, and 2, 15, 3, et Gloss. Also Gastrell v. Jones, 2 Roll. 448. But a passage from Peckham's Register, fol. 149, will decide the question.(b) Nor was the law altered at the Reformation; for by the statute of appeals the jurisdiction of the archbishop is preserved as before (24 Hen. 8, c. 12, s. 8). Cart v. Marsh, Stra. 1080. The absurdity of an appeal ab eodem ad eundem has been so strongly felt that, in Lee's case (Carthew, 169), it was made to overrule the statute of appeals, which, by the 7th section, expressly gives an appeal from the Dean of the Arches to the Archbishop of Canterbury. This decision strongly shews the doctrine of the Courts of Common Law: and, in this case, there are special circumstances why the appeal should not be gradatim: viz. the same Judge; the same [261] registrar; and, still more, the appeal is from the registrar's report. Strictly, we admit, the objection, to the regular course of appeals being pursued in this instance, ought to have been set forth in the inhibition and citation; but to obviate any inconvenience from this defect the Court may direct a special entry of the fact to be made in the muniment books.

In reply. The ground, that the sub-dean in his Court exercises a "peculiar and exempt jurisdiction," is abandoned as untenable. The cases of bishops, officials and commissaries, as referred to by Gibson, are easily distinguished. The bishop would there have already acted by his sufficient officer; and both the commissary and bishop have the same Court. So in Cart v. Marsh. And in Lee's case it was in substance an appeal to the same person. But here the sub-dean is not an officer of, nor has the same auditory as, the bishop, but is the judge of a different court. It is admitted that appeals regularly are gradatim: and to that course, I apprehend, the court is bound to adhere.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is an appeal from the sub-dean of Sarum,

---

(a) Gail, Pract. Obs. lib. i. obs. 119, s. 2.

(b) Viz. "Processus contra Subdecanum Hereford qui in causâ matrimoniali sententiam tulit definitivam, à qua R. ad sedem Cantuariensem legitimè appellavit, omisso medio, juxta consuetudinem Curiæ Cantuar. observatam; et non obstante rescripto ad appellationem et inhibitionem, Subdecanus dictum R. denuntiavit excommunicatum. Officialis Cantuar. vocavit judicem prædictum dicto querelanti responsurum, et prædicto contemptui Curiæ Cantuar. responsurum et satisfacturum." Concil. Mag. Brit. (Wilkins), vol. ii. p. 84.

And Archbishop Parker says: "Ab inferioribus judicibus ad hunc metropolitanum omissis mediis appellatur, et non gradatim ut jura præscribunt." De Antiquit. Brit. Ecc. p. 42, ed. 1729.

in whose Court it was originally a suit for an inventory and account instituted by Peter Jacob—surviving residuary legatee—against the appellants as executors. A decree was there given against the executors, and upon an appeal to this Court an inhibition issued to the Court of the Sub-dean described therein as "a peculiar and [262] exempt jurisdiction." An appearance was here given for Jacob under protest, alleging "that the jurisdiction was not 'peculiar and exempt,' but subordinate to the bishop, and that the appeal lay to his Consistorial Court." The appellants denied this statement, and further alleged that the same person was chancellor and sub-dean, and therefore that there was no appeal, pro hac vice, to the Consistory. The respondent answered that the inhibition and citation did not suggest that ground, but alleged only the jurisdiction to be "peculiar and exempt," and consequently that these proceedings were not valid.

Hence, it seems that three questions present themselves:

First: of fact: whether the sub-dean's Court exercises a peculiar and exempt jurisdiction; for if it does, the appeal lies to the Arches; if however not peculiar but subordinate, then the appeal is to the bishop in his Consistory Court.

Second: whether the circumstance of the chancellor being also the sub-dean alters the course of appeal.

Third: whether it is competent to the parties to raise that question on the present process.

The first point, which hardly admits of any question either on the fact or law, has been but little pressed in argument. The instrument of appointment of the sub-dean has been exhibited, and is merely subordinate and archidiaconal: the bishop visits and inhibits: during his visitation the sub-dean's jurisdiction is wholly suspended, and is merged in, and exercised by, the bishop as in ordinary archdeaconries. This jurisdiction of the sub-dean of Sarum [263] is well ascertained, and has been made more public by the return to Parliament, in the last session, of Courts exercising ecclesiastical jurisdiction. In the diocese of Sarum it is stated, "The Bishop of Sarum, by his chancellor, exercises the authority of granting probates and administrations, in the sub-deanery of Sarum, during the bishop's triennial visitation for six months, only containing five parishes." "The sub-dean of Sarum exercises the (above) authority, except for six months in every third year (as aforesaid)." This return confirms what appears from the instruments of appeal, and from the appointment of the sub-dean, that he is appointed by the diocesan, and has a mere subordinate jurisdiction; and his jurisdiction being subordinate, and not peculiar and exempt, no doubt, in common cases, the appeal lies to the diocesan, and not, per saltum, to the metropolitan. I will not now go into that question, for it was fully discussed, and the cases and authorities examined, in Parham v. Templar (3 Phill. 223); and I see no reason to alter the opinion then expressed.

The next point is, whether the intermediate appeal is lost by the same person holding both offices. It appears that not only the Judge—but that the registrar—of the two courts is the same person (and this, it must be remembered, is an appeal from the registrar's report); there is, however, nothing to shew whether the Courts are held in the same place. If it is meant to keep the jurisdictions separate, the offices are incompatible: the Dean of the Arches cannot [264] hold the chancellorship of a diocese; the Judge of the Consistory of London is never at the same time official of the Archdeaconry of London or Middlesex. But if the bishop thinks fit to appoint the same individual to both offices, they must be considered as consolidated and merged, otherwise the absurdity and extreme inconvenience of appealing from the same person to the same person would be introduced. I cannot suppose the Judge of the Courts now in question is of a different condition from other persons, and I must, therefore, consider the sentence of the sub-dean to be the sentence of the chancellor, or, in other words, that this cause has in effect been decided by the chancellor.

It is said "that the two offices being held by the same person ought not to deprive the Consistorial Court of its jurisdiction:" jurisdictions, however, are not set up for the sake of Courts and their officers, but of the suitors who live within the jurisdiction. It is the act of the diocesan in appointing to, and of the chancellor in accepting, the two offices, that deprives the suitor of the benefit of an appeal. What would be the effect of compelling the suitors to travel through both Courts? It would only be an intolerable hardship without any probable advantage, or the fair benefit of an appellate jurisdiction; for an alteration of the sentence would, under such circumstances, be perfectly hopeless. In truth it would be no appeal. I should therefore be disposed to hold that the two offices must, pro hac vice, be regarded as consolidated, and that the decision of the Chancellor of Sarum has been already given in his character of sub-dean.

[265] The remaining question is, whether this consolidation of the two offices ought not to have been stated in the inhibition and citation, and alleged in the nature of a recusatio judicis, as the reason for coming to this Court "per saltum." This omission seems a stronger ground of protest. The citation and inhibition are defective: they have made a misnomer, which is not merely formal but may be substantially injurious to the Consistorial Court: they call the sub-dean's jurisdiction "peculiar and exempt," and may tend, at a future time, to deprive the diocesan jurisdiction of its due authority, for they will remain as part of the records of this Court and of the Sub-dean's Court, and therefore would be instruments describing the latter as exempt and not subordinate.

This Court cannot, then, proceed on these instruments; but it would be very unwilling, when the property is so small, and when under the circumstances of this case the intermediate Court is taken away, as a real and substantial appeal, to send the parties back and deprive them of the remedy intended by the law. I shall therefore let the matter stand over for consideration, whether the real ground of appealing to this Court omisso medio, and the principle upon which this Court might properly have issued its inhibition, can be made to appear in such a manner as shall hereafter prevent any proceedings, taken in this cause, from being drawn into a precedent to the injury of the diocesan Court.(a)

[266] COLVIN v. FRASER AND OTHERS. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, By-Day, 1829.—A will being executed in duplicate, one part of which was proved to have been in, and was never traced out of, the deceased's possession and was not found at his death, the primâ facie presumptions are: first, that the testator destroyed the part in his own possession; and, second (if the first be not repelled), that he intended thereby to revoke the duplicate not in his possession. The deceased pronounced dead intestate.—The primâ facie presumption that the deceased revoked a will, which was in his own possession, but is either not found at all at his death, or is found cancelled; and the primâ facie legal consequence that a duplicate, not in his possession, is revoked thereby, may be rebutted by a strong combination of circumstances leading to a moral conviction, or by direct positive evidence.—In order to rebut a presumption of law (e.g. as to the destruction of a will by a testator), declarations unsupported by circumstances strongly marking their sincerity, and confirming their probability (especially where their stringency depends on the exact words of a casual expression), cannot safely be relied on.—Declarations, coupled and consistent with conduct and acts are of weight in proof of intention, so are those not depending on the precise words of a particular expression, but on the tenor of an extended conversation, especially if not liable to the suspicion of insincerity; still more if repeatedly made in confidential communications.

[See further, nomine Schoolmasters of Scotland v. Fraser, p. 613, post.]

John Farquhar, formerly of Calcutta, but late of London, the deceased in this cause, was found dead in his bed at his house in the New Road, on the morning of the 6th of July, 1826, being then seventy-six years of age; he left behind him Elizabeth Willoughby (wife of Peter Trezevant) the daughter of a deceased brother; John Farquhar Fraser, and Dame Charlotte (wife of Sir William Templar De La Pole), children of a deceased sister; and James and George Mortimer, Charlotte (wife of William Aitken), and Mary (wife of James Lumsden), children of another deceased sister; the only persons in distribution in case he had died intestate.

On the 15th of September, 1826, administration of the goods of the deceased, as dying intestate, was granted to John Farquhar Fraser. A copy of a will and codicil (executed, in duplicate or triplicate, by the deceased in India) having been received by David Colvin, the party in this cause, authenticated under seal of the Supreme Court of Judicature at Fort William, in Bengal, a decree issued at his instance, calling upon Mr. Fraser to bring in the administration, and shew cause why the same should not be re-[267]-voked, and probate of the will and codicil be granted to Mr. Colvin.(a)

(a) On the 8th of June a decree had not been made; the case being under agreement.

(a) A comparative statement of the will and codicil of the 7th of March, 1814; of paper A; and script No. 1:

Will and Codicil—
Dated 7th March 1814:

"I, John Farquhar, agent for the manufacture of gunpowder at Ishapore in Bengal, being about to embark for Europe, and being in sound and disposing mind, do hereby bequeath my real and personal property as follows. To my nephew John Fraser, and niece Lady Pole, each 500l. sterling money of Great Britain: to my friend George Wilson, at present one of my agents, 1000l. of the same denomination: to Sir John Royds, one of the puisne Judges in the Supreme Court of Judicature in Bengal 500l. of the same denomination: to George Davidson, Esq. Mint Master of Bengal, 1000l. of the same denomination: to Alexander, David, and James Colvin (brothers), and Alexander Colvin, their nephew, 300l. each, to commence from the time of the respective arrival of the parties in any part of Great Britain: to my old friend Dr. George French, professor, or some time since professor of chemistry in the Marischal College of Aberdeen, 300l. of the above denomination: to Colonel or Lieut. Colonel Calcraft 300l.: all the above sums to be paid to the respective persons named during the natural term of their lives annually. I likewise bequeath for the purpose of promoting learning,

Paper A and Script
No. 1—
as far as they differ from the will and codicil of the 7th of March, 1814. The passages in Italics are the clauses which are not contained in script, No. 1: in other respects, except as is hereafter noticed, and with some slight verbal variations, the three instruments coincide.

For an account of paper A, and script No. 1, see the 14th article of Mr. Colvin's allegation, infra, p. 273:—the 9th, 10th 11th, and 12th articles of Mr. Fraser's allegation, p. 280;—and the 6th and 9th articles of Mr. Colvin's second allegation, pp. 287, 8.

Paper A is also noticed in the judgment. See infra, p. 315, et seq.

"This is the last will and testament of me John Farquhar of Gloucester Place, Portman Square, in the county of Middlesex, Esquire.

"I give devise and bequeath all my estate of what nature or kind soever not herein otherwise disposed of unto my executors hereinafter named their heirs executors and administrators for the purpose of promoting learning in manner following: viz. To apply

"such sum as may be sufficient for salaries of the following professors who are to teach during the whole of the summer, as I know from my own experience that nothing is so contrary to the acquisition of knowledge as the long vacations in the Scottish universities: viz. I bequeath for the salary of the professor of Greek 200l. sterling; for the salary of the professor of the second class, called the semi-class, the same sum; for that of the professors of the third and fourth classes the same sum to each: the above sums to be paid annually in lawful money of Great Britain to the new professors of all the universities or colleges of Scotland beginning with Aberdeen, next St. Andrews, next Glasgow, and lastly Edinburgh: likewise 200l. sterling for the salary of a professor of Mathematics, payable in the same manner, at each of the above seminaries: and my will is, that if the present professors will agree to teach during the whole year without any other vacations than those established by law, and fourteen days about Midsummer, in that case that they shall in the first instance be offered the option and receive annually the above sums during their professorships: I likewise bequeath 300l. annually of sterling money of Great Britain for the purpose of erecting a professorship of mathematics in the College of Old Aberdeen, unless that may have been already done: likewise 300l. annually for one professor of astronomy in the Marischal College of Aberdeen, and 100l. annually for each of two assistants: likewise the same sums for a Professor and two Assistants in the King's College, Old Aberdeen: likewise such sum as may be sufficient for the erection of two observatories of celestial bodies, and furnishing them with the necessary instruments, admitting nothing that

[268] The administration was accordingly brought in; and, after some preliminary steps for the [269] purpose of citing all persons interested, and getting all testamentary papers before the [270] Court (see Colvin v. Fraser, vol. i. 107), on the by-day after Hilary Term, 1828, an allegation, propounding the copy of the will and codicil, was admitted. It, in substance, pleaded:

1. The death of, and the persons entitled in distribution to, the deceased.

[271] 2. A detailed history of the deceased from his birth in the county of Aberdeen, to his death; his education at a parochial school, and afterwards at the Marischal College at Aberdeen; and that early in life he went to India, where "by close application to business and parsimonious habits, he rapidly accumulated considerable property, and at a very early period conceived an intention of leaving his property for the improvement of the system of education in Scotland, and frequently, whilst in India, expressed such intention to his friends."

3. A statement respecting the deceased's relations at the time of his quitting Scotland and subsequently; and that during his residence in India he kept up no communication with them, except by directions to his agents to allow a sufficient sum annually for the maintenance and education of his nephew, Mr. Fraser, and of his

---

is not absolutely necessary for the above purpose for the use of the two above mentioned professorships. Lastly I desire that on the natural decease of the above persons, to whom annuities have been bequeathed, that the annual sums, respectively appropriated to them, shall be added to the annual surplus of my receipts, and, after providing for the other purposes [herein-before] expressed, shall be divided amongst the parochial schoolmasters over all Scotland in sums of not less than 10l. of sterling money of Great Britain annually to each [beginning with the Schoolmasters of Aberdeenshire;] and as, in my opinion, the study of the Greek language ought to precede that of the Latin, I leave 100l. sterling annually to each of four teachers of Greek, provided that such a change of system be approved of by a majority of the Professors of the Universities of Scotland, and in that case, that is to be effected in preference to the provisions for parochial schoolmasters.

"Declaring this to be my last will and testament I appoint the following gentlemen to be my executors, John Bebb, George Wilson, and Dr. John Fleming in Europe, and the above-named Alexander, David, and James Colvin and Alexander Colvin the younger and John Corsar of Calcutta, Agents; and George Davidson, Esq. Mint-master of the same place. Dated in Calcutta this 7th of March 1814."

 It was signed, sealed and executed in the presence of four witnesses; and at the foot of the paper was added a codicil as follows:

"I hereby further bequeath by this codicil of the same date 1000l. sterling money of Great Britain to Mrs. M'Kenzie, wife of John M'Kenzie, Esq. Military Paymaster General of Bengal for the purchase of a ring." J. FARQUHAR.

"I give and devise all my East Mark estate in the county of Somerset unto my nephews James and George Mortimer (c) for their lives, and at their death to the eldest male heir, or in default of male issue to the eldest female heir of my said nephew George Mortimer, on condition that whoever succeeds to the possession of my said East Mark estate shall take and use the name of Farquhar. I give and bequeath to my niece Lady Pole, wife of Sir William Pole of Shute in Devonshire, the sum of l. and to each of her children the sum l. to accumulate for their benefit till they arrive at the age of 21 years respectively, and I give to my niece Mrs. in America the sum of l. and I give and devise unto my most particular friend David Colvin of Gloucester Place aforesaid all my freehold and copyhold estates in the parish of Hanwell, Middlesex. And whereas I have lately agreed to sell unto David Colvin all my leasehold house in Gloucester-place, now in his occupation, for 3400l. but the same has not yet been conveyed to

---

(a) The clause within brackets was not in paper A; nor in No. 1.

(b) In paper A the words "herein-before" were "herein-after;" the words "over all" were transposed; and the words, "the shires or counties of Aberdeen and Mearns in," were interlined before "Scotland;" and the words "beginning with the schoolmasters of Aberdeenshire," were struck through.

(c) In script No. 1 here followed, "and their heirs on condition that they shall take and use the name of Farquhar."

sister, then orphans; and specially directed that the former should pay particular attention to the study of Greek and mathematics.

4 and 5. The execution in duplicate of the will and codicil in India, when the deceased was about to return to Great Britain.(a)

6, 7, and 8. Formal articles.

9. That both copies of the will and codicil, sealed up in separate envelopes, were left in the custody of Messrs. Colvin—the deceased's agents in Calcutta; that he arrived in England at the end of 1814; in 1816 became partner of a house of agency in Broad Street, under the [272] firm of Bazett, Farquhar, Crawford and Co.; that his property at the time of his death was nearly of the same value as at the date of his will; that he desired one part of the will to be transmitted from India; and that in 1816 a sealed packet endorsed "the will of John Farquhar, Esq." arrived in England, and was delivered by David Colvin into the deceased's possession: that he frequently conversed upon the system of education in Scotland, and the improvement thereof; and, whilst in Scotland, in 1816, made various inquiries at Aberdeen and elsewhere upon the subject.

10. That on his arrival from India he was disappointed at Mr. Fraser's progress in mathematics: in 1817 wholly discontinued the allowance to him, frequently expressed dissatisfaction at his conduct, and declared he should inherit no part of his property.

11. Great intimacy with David Colvin; declarations to him and to others of his friends, that he, the deceased, had left his property for the improvement of education in Scotland, and that Colvin was one of his executors.

12. That the deceased, being about to proceed to Paris in October, 1821, brought with him to Mr. Colvin's house (the carriage which was to convey him to Dover being at the door) the packet (pleaded in the ninth article) which was now open; that he took from it a paper which he described as his will; and on a separate sheet of small foolscap paper hastily wrote and executed a codicil, thereby devising the East Mark estate (which he had lately purchased) to his nephews, James and George Mortimer, on condition of their taking the name of Farquhar; [273] a leasehold house and small estate to David Colvin; and appointing, with 100*l.* legacy, his partners in the house of agency executors: that the will and said codicil with the original envelope were left in the hands of David Colvin, who deposited them in the deceased's iron chest in Broad Street.

13. The purchase in 1822 of the Fonthill estate; inquiries respecting the effect of the statutes of mortmain, and declarations of his want of affection for his heir at law, saying, "his heir at law was a vagabond in the back settlements of America."

14. That Mr. Colvin, apprehensive that the said codicil might be invalid, on consultation with his partners and with the deceased's solicitor, sent to the deceased at Paris a sketch will, No. 1, and also a draft will, paper A, that the deceased, on reading it, declared "it would be of no use to make such a will, as he had two already to the same effect, and that one was in his own possession—the other in India."

---

him; now I do hereby bequeath the said house unto David Colvin his executors and administrators discharged of and from the said sum of 3400*l.* And I further give and bequeath to my friend David Colvin, should he survive me, all my leasehold house in Gloucester-place, Portman-square at present in my own occupation to his executors and administrators together with all the furniture, &c. which may be contained in it at my death: and I give to each of my partners in Broad-street, London, viz. R. C. Bazett, David Colvin, W. Crawford, and J. G. Remington, the sum of l. in token of my regard: And my will is that in case all or any of the devises or bequests heretofore contained or any part thereof shall be void under the statutes of mortmain or otherwise howsoever, then I give and devise all my said estate unto

"And I hereby appoint my (aforesaid) partners to be executors of this my last will, and hereby revoking all former wills by me at any time made I publish and declare this as and for my last will and testament: in witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal this day of November 1821."

 The usual clause of attestation was added.

(a) The due execution of this will and codicil, but in triplicate, was admitted by the next of kin.

15. That in 1822, on his return from France, the deceased took his will and codicils to his own residence; that in the spring of 1822 or 1823 he destroyed the codicil in Broad Street, in a fit of anger with Mr. Colvin, but afterwards expressed his regret and was reconciled.

16. Pleaded the execution of a codicil on the 17th of July, 1823, and that it was deposited with a solicitor: (a) it also pleaded declarations to Harry Phillips and others, "that in conse-[274]-quence of the statutes of mortmain, he (the deceased) intended to sell the Fonthill estate, of which no conveyance had been made to him, alleging as a reason that conveyances might at once be made to the next purchaser, and that he should thereby save the stamp duty;" and that he had, previously to his death, sold or agreed for the sale of the greater part of the said estate.

17. That in the early part of 1822 the before mentioned iron chest, and also a certain cabinet, were sent to the deceased's residence in the New Road: it further pleaded declarations, from the beginning of 1822 to his death, "that he had a will or two wills which he had made in India, that one remained in India and the other in his own possession, that he kept the latter in the cabinet, and that David Colvin and Dr. Fleming were two of the executors."

18. A declaration in February, 1823, to his solicitor, Mr. Drake, on his suggesting that he should make a new will, "I have a will by me; it is in that cabinet, and David Colvin and Dr. Fleming are two of the executors."

19. Declarations to Mr. Hume in January, 1825, "that he (the deceased) had a will in the said cabinet;" and also declarations of the contents of such will; which were to the same effect as the bequests in the will propounded.

20. A further declaration to Mr. Hume "that he could not take more than four shares in the London University, because it might interfere with his intentions in respect to the college at Aberdeen, and to education in Scotland in general."

21 and 22. Further declarations on the 29th [275] of June, 1826, to George Harry Phillips, "that he [the deceased] had two wills (which he had made in India) one part thereof in his own possession, and one in India:" and on the 4th of July, 1826, to Harry Phillips, "that he had already two wills;" that on Harry Phillips stating "unless he, the deceased, made a codicil to such will in the presence of three witnesses it would only convey personal property; the deceased replied, 'he would sell all that remained of the Fonthill property:' and that, on leaving Phillips, he appointed to return the following day, but did not keep such appointment."

23. Frequent declarations during the latter part of his life that Mr. Fraser should never have sixpence from him; that the Mortimers had received too much from him already, and should have no more (this more especially to Harry Phillips on the 4th of July, 1826), and that none of his relations should be benefited by his property at his death: that on Mr. and Mrs. Lumsden going to Fonthill in 1822 he expressed displeasure at their coming, and said "she was no relation of his;" and would not permit them to dine at his table.

24. That for several years before his death the deceased was in an enfeebled state of health, and that during the last few years of his life, and particularly the last twelvemonth, he was in the habit of leaving his papers lying about his room, and on going out he usually left his cabinet and other places unlocked, or locked, leaving the keys about; that he occasionally locked his room door, but frequently left in the key, and that after his death several of his pa-[276]-pers of importance and an envelope endorsed "Will of John Farquhar, Esq.," or to that effect, were found in the said cabinet, and that such envelope was taken possession of by Mr. Fraser.

25. That Mr. and Mrs. George Mortimer, about two years before the deceased's death, prevailed on him by false pretences to allow them to reside in his house in the New Road, during his absence, and were from such time to the deceased's death in the habit of residing in it for a considerable time together; and that the deceased expressed great dislike of Mrs. Mortimer: that while there they were frequently, and for a considerable time together, in his room, where the said cabinet and iron chest were; and had free access to his papers.

26. That it being understood Mr. Colvin was one of the deceased's executors, he attended with Mr. Drake and Mr. Fraser, at his house in the New Road, for the purpose of searching for his will; that they searched for the same with two of the deceased's servants; Mr. and Mrs. Mortimer having refused or declined to attend: that one part of the will and codicil, received by the deceased from India, was not cancelled or destroyed by him, nor by his directions, but was destroyed without his knowledge, privity, or consent.

---

(a) This codicil was brought into the registry by the solicitor, and was propounded on behalf of Mr. Colvin; it is noticed in the judgment.

27. That soon after his death disputes arose between Mr. Fraser and Mr. George Mortimer as to the grant of administration: that Fraser having obtained the same to be granted to him alone, George Mortimer and his wife expressed great dissatisfaction thereat; and a few days afterwards Sarah Hurst, widow, being at his [277] house in Gloucester Place, Mrs. Mortimer, his wife, expressed herself to Sarah Hurst (with whom she was intimately acquainted) in terms of anger and resentment at Mr. Fraser's conduct, and said, "John Fraser is under great obligations to me; for if it had not been for me he would have had nothing; for I destroyed the will;" or to that effect; and repeated the same expression, thereby meaning that she had destroyed the duplicate of the will of the deceased, which he had in his own possession.(a)

[278] On the first session of Trinity Term an allegation, with forty-five exhibits, was admitted on the part of the next of kin: it pleaded—

1 and 2. The deceased's real estate as worth 60,000l.; other freehold estates, for the sale of which he had contracted, 170,000l.: other personal property, 310,000l.: and certain slight inaccuracies in the history of the deceased, and of his family as pleaded by the executor.

3. That the instruments propounded were duplicates of a will and codicil brought by the deceased to this country, or shortly afterwards transmitted to him from Calcutta, and subsequently cancelled and destroyed by him. That the said duplicates remained in India, in the custody of Colvin and Co. of Calcutta, till after the deceased's death. That the deceased, when he left Calcutta, never intended to, and never did, return to India.

4. That in September, 1816, shortly before his visit to Scotland, the deceased deposited in [279] the hands of Messrs. Whitbread of London, brewers (in which firm the deceased was a partner), certain papers, among others, a paper sealed up in an envelope, which he declared to Mr. Bland, one of the partners, was his will; that the said paper was a will of the deceased, and remained there three months, and till after his return from Scotland, when it was returned to, and subsequently cancelled and destroyed by, him.

(a) In the course of reading the evidence the counsel for the next of kin took an objection to the deposition on this article, on the ground that the declaration of the wife could not be evidence against the husband. 1 Phillipps, p. 76, 7th edition. 2 Starkie on Evidence, pp. 45, 707; nor against the other parties, on the ordinary principle that nothing except what was given under the sanction of an oath was evidence against third persons.

On the other side, it was argued that, on the principle of the case of Carey v. Adkins, 4 Campb. 92, the evidence was admissible against the husband; and being evidence against him, it was evidence against all the parties in the same interest, as the answers of one executor may be read against the other;* and, further, that the parties, having neglected to object to the admissibility of the allegation, pleading the declaration, were now barred from objecting to the depositions taken on that plea.

In reply. That if these declarations were not legal evidence, it was never too late to object; as, in Chancery, the evidence of an interested witness is struck out when ever such interest is discovered; and, further, that even if the objection were not raised by the party, the Court was bound to see that the cause was decided upon legal evidence: so, at Nisi Prius, the Judge, as soon as he discovers that the evidence is not strictly legal, always stops it and tells the jury not to give it any consideration. In Carey v. Adkins the wife was acting as the agent of the husband, and then her declaration stood upon the same ground as that of any other agent. 1 Phillipps on Evidence, p. 85; 2 Starkie on Evidence, 46, 707. It seemed to be admitted that these declarations were not per se evidence against third persons; but it was contended that, if evidence against one party, it was evidence against all. But it is unnecessary now to argue this last point, which involved a question in these Courts

---

* See Maclae and Ewing v. Ewing and Others, vol. i. 317.

5. That Mr. Colvin, by the deceased's desire, about the latter end of 1821, wrote to Mr. Drake, solicitor to the deceased, and to the house of agency, for instructions for making his will; that Mr. Drake wrote a full letter of instructions, which was delivered to the deceased, and found among his papers at his death; and that, from and after the receipt of such letter, the deceased well knew the effect of the statutes of mortmain.

6. Exhibited Mr. Drake's letter.

7. That about the latter end of 1821 the deceased sent to George Mortimer to meet him at the house of David Colvin in Gloucester Place, "and that the deceased then and there in the presence of George Mortimer and David Colvin produced a will or testamentary paper, and proceeded to cancel and erase by striking out with a pen many material parts thereof, and to make many material alterations in the disposition and bequests contained in the said will or testamentary paper, and did then and there also erase or strike out with a pen the attestation clause and the names of the subscribed witnesses, and did afterwards restore [280] some of the bequests and dispositions so altered."

8. That the codicil (pleaded in the twelfth article of Mr. Colvin's allegation) was on the same occasion written on the back of the will; that it revoked all former wills, and declared the will, as altered, together with this codicil, to be his last will and testament; and that the codicil was attested by two servants, and deposited in Mr. Colvin's hands.

9. That paper No. 1, in Mr. Colvin's handwriting, then in the registry, was an exact transcript of the altered will and codicil, save a certain clause as to the statutes of mortmain.

10. That from No. 1 Mr. Colvin drew up paper A with certain (specified) alterations (see ante, p. 267, note (a)).

11. The handwriting of No. 1 and A.

12. That Mr. Colvin, intending that the deceased should supply the blanks and execute paper A, transmitted the same to the deceased at Paris, in an envelope, consisting of half a sheet of foolscap paper of English manufacture, endorsed in the handwriting of Mr. Colvin, "Copy of the will of John Farquhar, Esq. and codicil thereto:" that on the receipt of such paper the deceased expressed himself angry at the conduct of Mr. Colvin in sending it to him; and that he never executed the same, nor any copy thereof: that, on the return of the deceased to England, he cancelled and destroyed the will and codicil, so executed before he went to Paris, by tearing it in the presence of Mr. Colvin; but kept paper A and its envelope in his possession; and afterwards placed them in [281] a cabinet which stood opposite to the fire-place in his sitting room in his house in the New Road, "where the same remained until the said paper writing was without the knowledge of the deceased abstracted from the said envelope by some person and at some time unknown to Mr. Fraser, but that the envelope was left in the cabinet folded up."

13 and 14. That the deceased purchased Fonthill Abbey on speculation, and not as a permanent investment; and that his resolution of selling the same was not formed in consequence of the operation of the statutes of mortmain; and that, subsequent to Mr. Drake's letter, he purchased other landed property, and advanced money on mortgages, and was, at his death, in possession of landed property, worth 60,000l., and of leasehold estates; that he had not foreclosed any of the mortgages; but in September, 1824, voluntarily offered to permit 100,000l. to remain on mortgage; and in October, 1824, lent a sum of 20,000l. upon mortgage.

15. Exhibited, in supply of proof, two letters to his banker.

16. That after his return from India he conceived a great affection for several of his nephews and nieces, particularly for George and James Mortimer, and Lady De La Pole; that in 1814 he resided for a year with Sir William De La Pole, and, to the time of his death, was on the most friendly terms, and corresponded with them; deserving the nicest consideration; they would, however, merely say that, in Lord Trimlestown's case, Lords Eldon and Redesdale held the contrary doctrine.*

---

Per Curiam. Without expressing any opinion as to the ultimate admissibility of this part of the deposition, it may be argued upon de bene esse.

---

* 1 Bligh, 452 (New Series).

and that from 1822 to his death, Mr. and Mrs. George Mortimer almost constantly resided with him in the greatest harmony.

[282] 17. Exhibited a letter from the deceased to Sir William De La Pole.

18. That after 1820 the deceased frequently advanced to George Mortimer sums of money; and, previous to his going to Paris in 1821, gave an order upon his bankers "to advance him such sums of money as they might think prudent, subject to the opinion of Mr. Colvin."

19. Exhibited the order.

20. That in 1824 the deceased executed a memorandum of agreement to convey to George Mortimer certain lands, not to exceed fifty acres—part of the estate of Fonthill—for the erection and convenient enjoyment of a woollen manufactory.

21. Exhibited the memorandum.

22 and 23. Pleaded and exhibited an order in writing on his bankers to honour George Mortimer's checks, which order was in force at the deceased's death.

24. That the deceased gave his bankers directions to honour George Mortimer's checks to the amount of 20,000l., who, at sundry times, drew to the amount of 10,000l. That the deceased declared that such was the case, and expressed his approbation of George Mortimer's behaviour in these matters, and of his assiduity in business.

25 and 26. That, from 1818 to his death, the deceased treated George Mortimer with great affection, kindness and confidence, and also had a great esteem and regard for Mrs. George Mortimer; and exhibited, as proof thereof, twelve letters from the deceased.

27 and 28. Pleaded, that David Colvin well knew of the deceased's regard and confidence [283] in George Mortimer; and exhibited, in proof, two letters from David Colvin to George Mortimer, dated in November, 1821, and November, 1824.

29. That the deceased's permission to Mr. and Mrs. George Mortimer to reside in his house in the New Road was applied for under the advice of Mr. Colvin, and readily granted by the deceased.

30. Exhibited the letter of permission from the deceased.

31. That in 1825 the deceased also authorized James Mortimer to draw upon his bankers for money; and advanced to him from time to time 1300l.

32. Exhibited the letter to, and order on, the bankers.

33. That though for a considerable period he was greatly offended at Mr. Fraser, on a groundless report, he was afterwards reconciled to him, and from and after the summer of 1822 was on friendly terms, and received him at his house with hospitality; and on the day before his death Mr. Fraser passed upwards of two hours with the deceased at his house in the New Road.

34, 35, 36, 37. Pleaded written and verbal declarations, from 1821 to 1825, to shew that the deceased had destroyed the will, and intended to die intestate; others, that he had executed a will of a different tenor from that propounded; and exhibited a letter from the deceased to Mr. Alderman Wood in 1825.

38 and 39. Declarations of David Colvin (before and since the deceased's death) to his be-[284]-lief "that the deceased had no will; and that it was impossible to get him to make one."

40. That the deceased was not careless about his papers of importance, or his depositories, and that he always carried about his person two keys which opened boxes, one containing articles of value, the other the keys of all his depositories, and that on his death the said two keys were found by Mr. Colvin under his pillow, tied up in his handkerchief, as was his constant custom.

41. That Mr. and Mrs. George Mortimer did not refuse to attend the search; but, being at Fonthill at the time of the deceased's death, they were unable, though they proceeded with all dispatch, to reach London before the search on the morning of the 7th of July.

42, 43, and 44. That the search was principally conducted by Mr. Colvin, and no papers of moment found in the cabinet, except two bonds of Mr. Colvin to the deceased, and an envelope (as described in the twelfth article) with this endorsement "Copy of the will of John Farquhar, Esq. and codicil thereto:" and not "Will of John Farquhar, Esq." and that, after administration had passed, this envelope was destroyed by Mr. Fraser in the presence of a witness who had particularly noticed and could describe the same; and that Mr. Colvin admitted at the search that it was the envelope of paper A, and that the endorsement was in his handwriting: and, further, that the deceased himself, after his return from Paris, had destroyed the altered will and codicil.

45 and 46. Denied that there had been any [285] dispute about the administration between Mr. Fraser and George Mortimer; explained the circumstances under which it had been taken out, and exhibited in supply of proof four original affidavits of Mr. Fraser and Messrs. Mortimer.

47, 48, and 49. That since the death of Mr. Farquhar the firm in Broad Street, of which David Colvin was a partner, had paid over to Mr. Fraser, as administrator, 15,000l. in part payment of a sum due to the deceased as his share of the partnership; and then entered into a further statement of account and a communication relative thereto, and exhibited, in supply of proof, certain accounts, vouchers and bonds.

50. That (in contradiction to the 15th, 17th, and 18th articles of Mr. Colvin's plea) the deceased did not reside in the New Road till the summer or autumn of 1823.

51. That for many years previous to his death he had no property in India or elsewhere out of Great Britain, and that four persons—respectively executors or legatees in the will propounded—were dead.

52 and 53. That for some time previous to his death he had lost all confidence in the Messrs. Phillips: and exhibited a deed executed by the deceased, revoking all revokable instruments made by him in their favor.

On the by-day after Trinity Term an allegation, with eighty-two exhibits annexed, was admitted on behalf of Mr. Colvin.

1. Pleaded that the deceased, while in India, corresponded with George Wilson (an executor in the will propounded), and therein set forth [286] "the manner in which he intended to dispose of his property at his death, and that he was willing to assist his relations during his life, but that they should not inherit his property." That after his return to this country he continued to correspond with Mr. Wilson till the death of the latter in 1816; and in one of those letters, referring to the statutes of mortmain, he inquired, "Whether he could leave to a permanent body a specific sum to be realized by the sale of land; and that, if he could not, he must give up a purchase which he then contemplated;" and he also inquired, "Whether the law of Scotland was the same in that respect as the law of England." That in another letter he expressed his regard for, and obligation to, Mr. Colvin.

2. Exhibited five letters.

3. That in the latter end of 1816, on Mr. Colvin's endeavouring by letter to reconcile the deceased to Mr. Fraser, the deceased wrote two letters to Mr. Colvin, "expressing great anger at the conduct of Mr. Fraser towards him, and that he was resolved he never should be his heir;" and about the same time wrote to Mr. Fraser to the same effect.

4. Exhibited the letters.

5. Declarations of the deceased that he would make a codicil to his will and appoint his partners in Broad Street executors; that, the day before his departure for Paris and the execution of the codicil of October, 1821, at Mr. Colvin's house, he called on Mr. Drake to give him instructions for a codicil, but did not see him: that the only obliterations which he made in the will on the following day at Colvin's house [287] were striking out the annuities to Mr. Fraser (at whose conduct he expressed great dissatisfaction) and to Lady De La Pole: that at the same time he wrote the order on his bankers, exhibited in Mr. Fraser's 19th article.

6. That Mr. Colvin consulted with Mr. Drake on the validity of the said codicil and on the effect of the statutes of mortmain upon the bequests in his will; that the letter annexed to Mr. Fraser's allegation was Mr. Drake's answer, whereupon Mr. Colvin prepared a sketch No. 1 and paper A, and therein added "the form of a bequest to himself of the deceased's house in Gloucester-place, which the deceased had frequently declared his intention to bequeath to Colvin; that the annuities to Fraser and Lady De La Pole having been struck out by the deceased, and some annuitants in the will dead, and the deceased having by his codicil changed his executors, he (Colvin) left the annuities open for the deceased to insert as he might think fit. That No. 1 was not an exact transcript of the will with the exceptions mentioned in Fraser's 9th article."

7. That paper A was not enclosed in an envelope indorsed "Copy of a will of John Farquhar, Esq., and codicil thereto;" but was sent in the same cover with Mr. Drake's letter.

8. Pleaded the deceased's regard for, and confidence in, Mr. Colvin; and exhibited fourteen letters written by the deceased while at Paris and at Fonthill; and in one he expressed an intention "of purchasing lands in France, and that he should thereby avoid the abominable mortmain."

9. That during a journey to Fonthill a ser-[288]-vant boy received from the deceased and gave to De La Hante (a witness with whom the deceased became acquainted at Paris) some provisions wrapped up in a piece of waste paper, and that De La Hante observed that the same contained the draft or form of a will of the deceased's; and which was the draft of a will (paper A) transmitted to the deceased at Paris. That De La Hante indorsed the following words now appearing thereon:—"Given to me by John, Mr. Farquhar's servant, in bringing me a bit of bread on the 12th of July, 1823, at Winterslow Hut Public House, Salisbury," but that he did not inform the deceased of the same being in his possession. It then pleaded the delivery of this paper by De La Hante to Phillips, in whose possession it remained, and that it was never after the 12th of July, 1823, in the deceased's power.

10. That paper of English manufacture is always used in India; and that the propounded will and codicil, and also the duplicates, envelopes, official copies, and several of the exhibits, sent from India, were on English paper.

11 and 12. Referred to arrangements respecting the partnership in Broad Street, to a loan from the deceased to Mr. Colvin, and to the payment of 15,000l. to the administrator; and pleaded, "That on the 7th of May, 1827, Mr. Colvin first received intelligence of the existence of the will in India, which he immediately communicated to Mr. Fraser, and on the 25th, on the receipt of further intelligence, retained counsel."

13. Referred to a correspondence commencing in the middle of August, 1827, between [289] Mr. Fraser and the house of agency relative to the accounts and to this will: and alleged that on the 17th of September, 1827, Mr. Colvin received the official copy of the will and codicil and other papers, together with a letter from Calcutta, dated March, 1827; and that soon afterwards a copy of the said will and codicil and other papers was delivered to Mr. Fraser, who, in a letter of 16th October, 1827, acknowledged the receipt of the same.

14. Exhibited the correspondence and letters.

Two additional articles recited the fifty-first article of Fraser's allegation, and pleaded that the deceased had a ship engaged in trade with India from 1819 till 1826.

The King's advocate and Dodson for Mr. David Colvin, the executor.(a)

The question is whether the paper propounded is Mr. Farquhar's last will. It is in a perfect and entire form, and duly executed, so that, laying out of consideration for the present any question as to its being a duplicate, if it had been in the possession of the executors at his death it would have been entitled to probate in common form: for the primâ facie presumption being in favour of such a paper, the next of kin must shew a revocation, express or implied.

The case on the other side rests on this proposition, that the non-appearance of the copy in the deceased's possession destroys the dupli-[290]-cate: this proposition is founded on three presumptions: 1, that the part once in his own possession, but not forthcoming, is destroyed; 2, that the destruction was the act of the testator himself; 3, that such destruction is the revocation of the other part in India. Here is no proof, except from declarations, of any destruction; still less by the deceased; nor is there any evidence of his intention to revoke.

We do not deny that if a cancelled or mutilated will is found among a deceased's papers, the presumption is that such cancellation or mutilation was the deceased's own act; there is a foundation for the presumption—the paper in a cancelled state; but, where a will is merely not forthcoming, it may have been abstracted unknown to the testator (though the Court would not easily presume fraud); it may be still in existence, though mislaid; or it may have been inadvertently destroyed by the deceased, or by some other person. The question, then, is whether this instrument was purposely destroyed by the deceased; the onus is on the next of kin; and, should this matter rest only in dubio, the Court would not pronounce for an intestacy with a perfect paper before it; more especially looking to the history of this case, from which it is extremely improbable that the deceased would purposely have destroyed a paper which embodied his well-known intentions for many years before and after 1814; and from which there is not only no sufficient evidence of departure, but to which there is proof of adherence within two days of his death.

(a) The report of the arguments has been confined as much as possible to the questions of law.

We do not admit the position that the non-appearance of one part of a will in the testa-[291]-tor's possession in England is a presumptive revocation of the other part in India. The ordinary presumptions that arise from a manifest cancellation of a paper by the deceased do not apply. A duplicate of equal date, being for the very purpose of guarding against accident, is an additional proof of the testator's full intention and anxiety to give effect to the disposition, and thus materially differs from an executed draft; for the latter being superseded by the execution of the will, may be said to be utterly extinguished, and would not easily revive by the non-appearance of the will. But even if a draft could be shewn to correspond in all its material features with the will, and there was no proof of a destruction of the latter, animo revocandi, by the deceased, nor of any change of intention; still more, if the draft remained in his care and possession, it might, perhaps, under strong circumstances, be pronounced for.

Per Curiam. The draft would not, in any such case, be valid as a draft; it would only be evidence of the contents of a valid will.

Argument resumed.

It appears in this case that the duplicate in the testator's possession had been much altered. What then would be the inference if the testator had destroyed the paper so altered? that he reverted to the will in its original state, and intended the duplicate in India to operate. The Court said in Kirkcudbright v. Kirkcudbright (vol. i. p. 327): "If the latter will contains a disposi-[292]-tion quite of a different character, the law may presume such a complete departure from the former intention that a mere cancellation of the latter instrument may not lead to a revival of the former; but intestacy may be inferred. If, however, the two wills are of the same character, with a mere trifling alteration, it may be presumed (because it is the rational probability) that, when the testator destroyed the latter, he departed from the alteration and reverted to the former disposition remaining uncancelled."

Addams for the parochial schoolmasters of Scotland.(a) The will executed in 1814 was adhered to till 1821. The question, as may be deduced from the observations of the Court in Davis v. Davis (2 Add. 226), is whether the evidence in this case leads to a "moral conviction" that the deceased did not himself destroy the duplicate. Here the presumptive proofs are irresistible that the [293] deceased adhered to the will in preference to an intestacy. The case set up by the executors is, that he did not destroy the copy in his possession, or that, if he did, it was not done animo revocandi. The positions to establish this case are—1. An early and fixed intention in the testator thus to dispose. 2. The execution of a will in duplicate, which is not denied. 3. That there was nothing substantial to induce an alteration. 4. Recognitions of his will to the latest period of his life. 5 That, latterly, the deceased was careless of his papers, and surrounded by persons who had a great interest in their destruction.

The allegation of the executor being generally proved, is the case changed by the evidence on the plea of the next of kin? They set up—1. That the deceased probably would destroy his will. 2. That he did destroy it. 3. That he recognized its destruction. But there is no proof that he did himself destroy it as laid in the 12th article of their allegation: and if they fail in this principal point, they cannot fall back on a subsidiary part of their case, viz., the high probability that the testator would destroy his will; nor upon declarations that he had destroyed it. If, however, they could fall back upon this secondary case, it must be established by most unquestionable evidence; and of this there is a total want.

(a) The Court, before the commencement of Dr. Addams' argument, stated that it did not mean to recognize the principle that, when an executor—the appointee of the testator—was before the Court propounding a paper, all persons benefited by that paper had a right to be heard by their counsel without shewing some good and sufficient cause; e.g. suspicion of collusion; want of information; or some other reason which would render the executor less capable than the intervener of conducting the suit. But, in this instance, the Court said it was perfectly ready to hear the counsel for the intervener, but with a reservation of all questions as to his right; and on an understanding that this permission was not to be drawn into a precedent. See, upon the right of intervention, Wood v. Medley, vol. i. 645.

I have hitherto considered this will as if a single copy: I will now consider it as a duplicate. I admit the presumption that the destruction of one part is the revocation of the other part. Sir Edward Seymour's case, and [294] Mason v. Limbery (Comyns' Rep. 451. S. C. Viner's Abridgment, tit. Devise (R. 2), pl. 17). But in those cases there was direct proof of the destruction of the instrument animo revocandi. I contend, that when a duplicate is in existence, cancellation or destruction must be proved of the other part; it is not sufficient to shew mere absence or non-appearance, as in this case: for a legal presumption cannot be grafted upon a legal presumption. Mason v. Limbery shews, from the concluding observations upon that case, as reported in Viner, the anxiety of the law to give effect to a duplicate.

Phillimore and Lushington for the next of kin. We admit that this, being a regularly executed will, is, independent of all extraneous circumstances, primâ facie, entitled to probate unless revoked: there are, however, three admitted facts. 1. That the paper propounded is a duplicate, and was left in India. 2. That the counterpart was in the custody of the testator. 3. That on his death that counterpart was not forthcoming, but what became of it there is no direct evidence. Two presumptions arise. 1. That where a will is left in a testator's possession, its non-appearance is primâ facie proof of a destruction by him animo revocandi. Loxley v. Jackson (3 Phill. 128). Wilson v. Wilson (ibid. 552, 3). Davis v. Davis (2 Add. 226). Here it must be presumed that the deceased destroyed the counterpart himself, [295] because he had the power over it; next, because no one else is proved to have had access; and, lastly, because he alone could innocently destroy it on purpose.

2. If the testator destroyed the counterpart animo revocandi, it is not disputed that it was a primâ facie revocation of the other part, not within his own reach. Rickards v. Mumford (2 Phill. 23). Sir Edward Seymour's case, and Mason v. Limbery; where it is observed, in the report in Comyns—"That it was agreed if A had been completely cancelled, the duplicate would have been thereby also cancelled" (Comyns' Rep. 453). And still further, that it is a revocation of a counterpart in the deceased's possession. Pemberton v. Pemberton (13 Ves. 290). It is said, however, that one presumption cannot be founded on another. But we deny this: Pothier remarks, "The presumptions of most frequent occurrence are those in which, from certain established facts, an inference is deduced that may or may not be true; but the truth of which being much more conformable to probability than its falsehood, is regarded as sufficiently proved until the contrary is shewn. To induce this presumption, the facts from which it is deduced should be either directly established, or themselves deduced from other facts upon the same principle of inference, so that the ultimate presumption may be connected, either mediately or immediately, with facts established by proof" (Pothier on Obligations, p. 332. Evans' edition).

[296] If then the previous presumption of revocation by the deceased himself arises, the other—of the revocation of the part not in his own possession—necessarily follows, though it may be a presumption of a lower degree than when founded on a fact established by positive proof. The onus of rebutting these presumptions lies on the executor; but the evidence does not rebut them, either by shewing—1. Spoliation. 2. Loss or destruction by accident. 3. The existence of the paper at present. All these are possible, but contrary to probability; and the first has against it the additional presumption arising in favour of innocence.

It is admitted there is no direct affirmative evidence to establish any of these; and the case rests upon a mere inference that it was not probable the deceased would destroy the paper. It may be much doubted whether the general presumption of law can be rebutted in this way: there must be facts "producing a moral conviction." Davis v. Davis: but here are no such facts. The whole of the evidence here, except one declaration, would equally justify the Court in pronouncing for a draft as for the counterpart in India. On the principle contended for by the other side, whenever a will is not forthcoming, the Court upon mere loose evidence of the improbability of the destruction by the deceased might be called upon to pronounce for a draft.

The question is not between a will and an intestacy, but the will of 1814 and any other disposition of his property that Mr. Farquhar might choose to make. He might neither like his existing will nor an intestacy; he might [297] have meditated something different from both, or not have made up his mind to any specific disposition. To pronounce for this duplicate it must be shewn that the deceased believed it to be an existing, operative, will: and it must be remembered that this was a will made on the eve of his departure from India, which fixes upon it a more transient character, particularly after an absence from his relations of more than forty years.

The effect of altering the will, and executing the codicil of October, 1821, was a republication of the will, as altered in such very material points, but it was a revocation of the will, as it originally stood, and of the duplicate: the duplicate therefore from that time was altogether extinct unless subsequently revived by circumstances: Wilson v. Wilson: and of such circumstances there is an entire absence. The case of Kirkcudbright v. Kirkcudbright is to the same effect, though cited to shew that the part in India would revive. The subsequent destruction of the codicil, if on a separate paper, would leave the part of the will of 1814 in the deceased's possession in its altered state a valid and subsisting will; but would not revive the duplicate.

The King's advocate and Dodson in reply. The question is what is the law applicable to the facts; the case is sui generis: all the cases cited were attended with circumstances leading to a direct presumption of destruction by the testator. The early history shews that the will of 1814 was not a hasty but a mature intention, originating in 1790, consummated in 1814, ad-[298]-hered to till 1821, and for a departure from which there are no probable grounds.

Addams in reply. The main fact set up by the next of kin, viz. the cancellation of the will at a certain time and place having totally failed, their whole reliance is on a subordinate case, which equally fails them. As to the law; it is said the codicil was a republication of the will as altered, and a revocation of the will in its original state; if so, there were then two wills—that of 1814, and the republished will. Unless, therefore, the Court can presume a total oblivion of the will of 1814, there is an end of the question: for a later will, which is not forthcoming, will not operate as a revocation of an earlier will. Goodright v. Harwood (2 Black. Rep. 937. S. C. 3 Wils. 497).

Rickards v. Mumford is also in favour of my position; that where a will is executed in duplicate, and the part in the deceased's own possession cannot be found, the duplicate is not revoked by such absence solely. The doctrine of the civil law is that, where the duplicate is found cancelled, it must be shewn that it was done by the deceased animo cancellandi, and that he intended to die intestate. Dig. 28, 4, 4. So Swinburne, vol. iii. p. 7, s. 16. So Seymour's case. The onus probandi, that the will was cancelled animo revocandi, is on the next of kin, and nothing short of establishing that will suffice.

It has been uniformly held that in this sort of case fraud may be presumed. Swinburne, vol. iii. p. 7, s. 16. If it could not, the plea should have been opposed.

[299] Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The amount of property depending in this cause is of a magnitude so great as to impose a painful responsibility on the individual whose duty it now becomes to pronounce the decision of the Court. The bulk of the evidence introduced into the case, not very disproportionate to the amount of the property, increases at least the labour and attention necessary to the due consideration of its just result: but were it a case in those respects under ordinary circumstances, the points to be decided would not in my judgment be attended with any very considerable difficulty; for after maturely examining the proofs, and weighing the arguments which have been so very ably pressed on this most important case, I should, but for the special circumstances already adverted to, feel little hesitation respecting the judgment which ought to be given.

It will be convenient, first, to state the leading facts, so far as they admit of little controversy, or are established by clear evidence: secondly, to advert to those legal principles applicable to such facts, and which lay the foundation of the decision to which the facts lead: lastly, combining the legal principles and the facts, to state the grounds upon which the Court arrives at the sentence which will be pronounced.

The deceased party, John Farquhar, Esq., died on the night between the 5th and 6th of July, 1826, a bachelor: his nearest relations were nephews and nieces, viz. Mrs. Trezevant, a niece—the daughter of his only brother—consequently also his heiress at law, if under no [300] legal disability to inherit—Mr. Fraser and Lady De La Pole, children of a deceased sister—Mr. James and Mr. George Mortimer, Mrs. Lumley, and Mrs. Aitken, children of another deceased sister. These seven persons, his next of kin, are, if he died intestate, solely entitled in distribution of his personal estate, amounting to about 500,000l.: in addition to which the deceased had realty of about the value of 60,000l.; but the exact amount of either it is not material to ascertain.

In December, 1826, administration was granted to Mr. Fraser—one of the next of kin; and in November, 1827, that administration was called in by Mr. David Colvin, as an executor in an asserted will; the validity of which will and of two codicils thereto is the subject of the present suit.

The preliminary proceedings, for the purpose of getting in all possible testamentary papers, and of calling upon all parties who could have any interest in so large a property, necessarily took up some time. The first plea, which was substantially the commencement of the cause, was given in in February, 1828, and this great cause was brought to a hearing in January, 1829: so that all due dispatch has been used on all sides in pressing the question to a decision.

The will which bears date on the 7th of March, 1814, was executed at Calcutta in duplicate, and the original factum of it is in no degree controverted. The contents are in substance to the following effect:—It bequeaths 500l. a year each to his nephew Mr. Fraser, and to his niece Lady De La Pole—several considerable annuities to friends — salaries to professors of the Universities in Scotland, beginning with Aberdeen, upon [301] certain conditions—it directs two observatories to be erected at Aberdeen—and, lastly, it gives the surplus to the schoolmasters of Scotland, in sums of not less than 10l. annually, and appoints executors.(a)

Such are the contents of this will, executed just before the deceased left India in 1814.

Mr. Farquhar was born in the neighbourhood of Aberdeen about the year 1750, being from seventy-six to seventy-nine at the time of his death: he was educated at the Marischal College for the medical profession, and acquired some knowledge of chemistry; he went to India about the age of nineteen; was first in the army, in which he was wounded—then went to Calcutta, and having a taste for chemistry and science, engaged in the manufacture of gunpowder. In this undertaking his success was very great, and by that, accompanied with strict frugality, he, in the course of a long residence (altogether about forty-five years) in India, amassed an immense fortune; it being supposed on his arrival in this country to have been equal, if not greater, than at his decease: for some of his subsequent speculations were not quite so successful.

During his residence in India, particularly for the last twenty-five years, and after the death of his parents, he appears to have kept up but little direct intercourse with his family. His brother had gone to America about the time or before he went to India; for in a letter to Mr. Wilson, in August, 1785, he says, "He (his brother) went abroad when I was very [302] young—we have never met since—I do not recollect much of him—he has left a daughter, now in London, under the care of his executors resident at Charleston:" and in subsequent letters, near the same period, he expresses much anxiety about the care of that daughter. In one of a still later date, in August, 1789, he speaks of her having gone back to Carolina. His sister, Mrs. Fraser, and her husband were dead, having left an infant son and daughter—two of the parties in this cause. It is not mentioned that Mrs. Mortimer, his other sister, was in correspondence with him. His confidential friend, the late Mr. George Wilson, the King's counsel, was the person with whom he principally communicated upon all concerns, and particularly respecting his family: he was one of the executors named in this will; and a great number of the deceased's letters to him have been laid before the Court; to some of which it may be necessary presently to refer.

In 1814, upon reaching England, Mr. Farquhar took up his abode with Sir William and Lady De La Pole, his niece, formerly Miss Fraser, in Weymouth Street; but he afterwards had a house in Baker Street, and then removed to Gloucester Place, next door to Mr. David Colvin (who appears to have returned from India in the same ship with him); and in 1823 he removed to a house in the New Road, where he died, as already stated, on the 5th or 6th of July, 1826.

(a) The Court here read the will. See supra, p. 267, n.

After his arrival in England he continued his correspondence with Mr. Wilson, who at that time had quitted the English Bar and retired to Edinburgh. In these letters he complained of the want of occupation, and talked of employ-[303]-ing himself with land: and in one of them, dated in 1815, he inquired about the mortmain laws, and whether they extended to Scotland: but he did not say a word of the will executed in India, nor of the disposition it contained. He soon after became a partner in Whitbread's great brewery, and also in the India agency house of Bazett and Co., who were the correspondents of Colvin's house at Calcutta, and that agency house afterwards assumed the firm of Bazett, Farquhar, Crawfurd, and Remington; he treated for, and at length purchased, East Mark estate in Somersetshire, notwithstanding the mortmain acts; and he sent for, or at least received, one part of his will from India.(a)

It seems rather extraordinary that, subsequent to 1816, the deceased in none of his conversations about a will ever mentioned that one duplicate of his will was still remaining in India; neither to his partner Mr. Bazett, nor to his solicitor Mr. Drake, nor to his banker and friend Mr. Barnett, nor to Mr. David Colvin himself; for at the deceased's death it seems clear from the whole conduct of Mr. Colvin that he was ignorant of the existence of that duplicate: and though Mr. Colvin has pleaded that the deceased declared he had a will in India, not a witness is produced to depose to the declaration except Jane Phillips, who, possibly, misapprehended the declaration; for the declaration spoken to by Mr. Wood is equivocal and will bear a different construction.

The fact however is quite clear and incontrovertible that one duplicate of the will was in [304] the possession of the deceased in England in 1816, the other duplicate was not known to be in India during the deceased's lifetime; it was produced there in the Supreme Court six months after his death, and though there may be no reason to suspect that it had not been there from the time of its execution in 1814, yet there is some reason to suppose that the deceased had forgotten the existence of such a duplicate.

In 1816 the deceased paid a visit to Scotland: his confidential friend Mr. Wilson was then dead, and these friends never met after the deceased's return to Europe. Before his journey to Scotland the deceased deposited in the custody of Mr. Bland, one of the partners at the brewery, a paper which he declared to be his will. Mr. Bland thus deposes to it: "Just before the deceased went to Scotland he called at the brewhouse, and speaking to the deponent, who was then alone (and whom the deceased said he wished to speak to alone), he asked for some paper and wax to seal up a paper which he brought with him; the deponent supplied him with the materials, and the deceased then enclosed in a sheet of paper what appeared to be a single sheet of foolscap paper." The copy of the will itself is written upon a single sheet of foolscap paper, and therefore it might very easily have been so folded up. "The deceased sealed the envelope, and as the deponent now best recollects wrote his name upon it without adding any thing further: he then delivered it to the deponent, desiring him to take care of it for him, saying, 'God, sir, you must take care of it; if any thing should happen to me that is my will.'" Mr. Bland [305] then states, "That he put the envelope into an iron safe, and the deceased after his return from Scotland called for it and took it away."

There seems no reason to doubt the sincerity of the deceased upon this occasion, nor that this was his will: there seems no reason to doubt that it was his Indian will; for no trace exists of his having at that time made any other: and here is the Indian will—a single sheet of foolscap paper—out of its original envelope, put into a new envelope, so that there have been at least two envelopes which have at different times inclosed this will: and, finally, here is this will, whatever it was, traced back again into the deceased's possession after his return from Scotland.

While in Scotland in 1816 he was about purchasing an estate—Balgonie—but no purchase took place: he also made inquiries about professors and schools, and the state of education: Mr. Professor Davidson has been examined; and I will state the substance of his evidence.

"The deponent understood from the deceased that he had raised a fortune by means of saltpetre works and the manufacture of gunpowder and by great frugality, which he described as not being natural to him but an acquired and fixed habit; he appeared to be a man of most uncommonly acute mind and of very varied knowledge." He says upon a subsequent article, "The deponent saw the deceased not less than two or three times in each week"—it is mentioned that he continued in Scotland about eight weeks—"the deceased's inquiries were twofold, the one relating to education in Scotland generally, and the other to the [306] system pursued in the college: he inquired respecting the emoluments of the professors and teachers, and respecting the Universities of St. Andrews and Edinburgh (deponent having been at both); and for information respecting the schools in Scotland, not only in Aberdeenshire but in other parts of Scotland." He says, "The limited amount of the emoluments of the schoolmasters excited some surprise, though the deceased did not say that he purposed doing any thing for their benefit, yet he spoke of an increase as that which ought to be done." Upon the 11th article he deposes, "That the deceased repeatedly said he had made a will, though he did not say what the object of it was: the first occasion was when they and Professor Stuart met at dinner at the house of Mr. Burnet: the subject of wills being then introduced, the deceased said 'that he had made a will, but he did not know whether it would be valid.'" And then the deceased referred to a case which he had already mentioned in one of his early letters, of a will that had been set aside because the executors were directed to plant a species of tree with the branches downwards and the roots in the air.

(a) The phrase "Indian will" has reference throughout the judgment to the part transmitted to the deceased from India.

This is the general substance of Professor Davidson's examination: and it thence appears that while the deceased was in Scotland in 1816, he in general terms mentioned that he had made a will, but gave no intimation of the tenor and contents of that will, and even expressed some diffidence of its validity: he made inquiries about professors and schoolmasters, and an observation "that the salaries ought to be increased," [307] but no declaration that he had done any thing or intended to do any thing himself for that purpose; nor entered into any consultation on the best mode and plan of effecting such purpose.

After the deceased's return from Scotland, and after again taking possession of his will, nothing more was seen nor heard of it, nor of any other testamentary act till October, 1821: not heard of; for, though he talked in general terms about the improvement of education in Scotland, he did not specify his plan nor refer to it as provided for by his will. Mr. Bazett, the deceased's partner, after speaking of the deceased's will being written for, and arriving, as he supposes, in the year 1817 or 1818, and of its being in possession of the deceased, goes on to state upon the ninth article: "That the deceased did frequently converse on the system of education in Scotland and the improvement thereof: the Greek language and mathematics were his favorite objects, and the study of the former in priority to the Latin; both these branches of learning the deceased frequently expressed a desire to advance in Scotland: he spoke of the deficiency of education in this respect generally, but more particularly in Scotland, and of his desire to correct and improve it in the schools of that country; it was a subject on which he undoubtedly took a great interest." He says upon the eleventh article, "Deponent never conversed with the deceased on the contents of his will in any respect as regarded the disposition of his property."

Mr. Drake also, his confidential solicitor, deposes on the ninth article, pretty much to the [308] same effect: "Deponent heard the deceased speak of the system of education in Scotland being bad and as that which he wished to see improved; he spoke of such improvements as a subject on which he plainly took an interest, but so he did of education generally, and not particularly in connection with Scotland." He says upon the thirteenth article: "Certainly, on one occasion, the deceased asked the deponent in a loose general way, not as applying to any business before them or as relating to himself or his affairs, whether the statute of mortmain applied to land in Scotland: but the deponent never heard the deceased make any inquiry as to the effect and operation of the statute of mortmain on the disposition of property for the purposes of education."

Here, again, in these confidential conversations was no reference to the will, nor to the specific plan which it contained.

The deceased went on with various speculations, some with profit, some with loss; he completed the purchase of the East Mark estate—with reference to which Mr. Drake mentions a circumstance that occurred in 1818. After stating on the eleventh article "that for the East Mark estate 10,000l. in part was paid in March, 1818, and the total purchase money, including the 10,000l., was 26,100l.: the conveyance was executed on the 14th July, 1820:" he says on the thirteenth article, "That in March, 1818, the deceased and he were coming together from Broad-street: as they passed along the Poultry, deponent, with reference to the purchase of the East Mark estate, men-[309]-tioned to the deceased that it was proper he should make a new will, or republish a will if he had one that would pass real estate, as otherwise that estate would pass to his heir at law: the deceased said, 'My heir at law, Mr. Drake, is a vagabond in the back settlements of North America.'"

"The deponent does not remember the same expression being used by the deceased at any other time; but he had heard the deceased speak several times of his heir at law as being in America, because the deponent remembers having had conversations with him as to the right of such heir at law to inherit property."

So that, in 1818, the deceased was distinctly apprized that an after-purchased estate would not pass under his Indian will, but would go to his heir at law, and he was also aware doubts existed as to the right of that heir at law to inherit. Still, he took no steps upon that information till October, 1821, when, being about to proceed to Paris in company with Mr. Phillips, the auctioneer, a testamentary transaction took place, which it may be proper to detail.

Mr. Drake was at that time at Brighton. On the morning of the second of October, at Mr. Colvin's house, while the carriage was at the door, the deceased produced the Indian will, made alterations in it, and wrote another testamentary instrument disposing of the East Mark estate and some other real estate, and appointing new executors. The exact extent of the alterations in the Indian will or of the contents of the other instrument cannot be ascertained; for one is proved to have been destroyed by the [310] deceased himself, and the Indian will is not forthcoming. The amount of the acts done upon that occasion must be collected in some degree from Mr. Colvin's own statement and from his subsequent conduct. Now, according to his own statement, in the 12th article of his allegation, alterations and obliterations were made in the Indian will—to what extent is not set forth: and whether there were not former obliterations or insertions is not ascertained. It is disputed whether the other instrument was written on the back of that will or on a separate paper: and I shall not further examine that point; merely remarking that the weight of evidence seems to be that it was on a separate paper. It has been called a codicil, but there is no proof that it had any reference whatever to the will: it applied to separate after-purchased landed property. The subscribed witnesses have been examined; and Tosdevin heard nothing about a codicil; "something, he deposes, was said by Mr. Colvin about what the deceased was writing being a part of a will he had made in India;" but Alleguen, the other witness, believes it was a will. "To the deponent's recollection it was a will the deceased then made and executed, for he thinks that it began—'This is my last will and testament;' and he remembers that the deceased's partners (Bazett, Colvin, Crawfurd, and Remington) were nominated executors: though what else it contained he does not remember."

Mr. George Barnett says: "In a conversation he had with Mr. Colvin on the subject of the deceased's will (the deceased being at the time of such conversation resident at Font-[311]-hill), Mr. Colvin remarked, 'Oh, there is no will; there was something of a will, which he made when he went to France, but it has been destroyed.'" Colvin spoke of it therefore as a will, not a codicil. "The deponent observed to him 'that perhaps it was safer or better that it was so, as his property would be divided among his relations:' to which Mr. Colvin made no reply. The conversation deposed to was indelibly impressed on deponent's recollection, by the manner in which the observation he made was received by Mr. Colvin."

I may also in this place state what Mr. Tyrrell says to the same effect. "About May, 1825, deponent went with Mr. Colvin in the 'Enterprize,' steam vessel, and they conversed about the relations of the deceased; when Mr. Colvin told him 'that he need not feel at all uneasy about his friend, Mr. Fraser, who would be very well off, for that the deceased would die intestate, and Mr. Fraser would be a rich man: Mr. Farquhar,' he said, 'cannot be persuaded to make a will.'"

I quote this evidence at present, not so much to shew that Mr. Colvin thought the deceased intestate, as that the instrument of the 2d of October, 1821, was spoken of by him and by the attesting witness as a will. I notice this the more, in order to explain what the deceased probably meant by his having made two wills; for that he had any recollection of the duplicate in India does not appear in these proceedings: in my apprehension, therefore, when he spoke of having two wills, it is probable that he alluded to the Indian will and the will which he made previous to his going to France. How-[312]-ever, the fact admitted is that there were some obliterations and alterations in the Indian will, and that there was another instrument at this time executed, which is not proved to have been a codicil, reviving and confirming the will except so far as it was altered, but a testamentary instrument for a distinct object, viz. the disposition of landed property, and the appointment of a new set of executors.

The transaction having taken place in this hasty mode, the deceased set off for Paris, leaving these testamentary papers in the possession of Mr. Colvin. After his departure, Mr. Colvin, without any authority from the deceased, set about preparing an instrument which should consolidate this altered will and this other will or codicil; he consulted and obtained the assistance of Mr. Drake, the deceased's solicitor, as to the form of the new instrument, and the latter, who had returned to town, wrote Mr. Colvin a full letter of instructions on the 4th of October, 1821.

"My dear Sir,—In reply to your letter requesting some hints for the guidance of your friend in making his own will, I would suggest first, that by an act called the Mortmain Act, many restraints are provided against bequests for public charities, and in particular that devises of houses or land for such purposes, and also of all monies secured by the mortgage of houses or lands are absolutely void. In devises of this nature much professional skill is requisite; and therefore I cannot hope to give you such hints as may safely be relied on; but by way of a general caution, I would advise that your friend, [313] after framing his will in the clearest way he can, for securing the objects of a charitable nature which he has in view, should add a clause something of this sort." And he then inserts the form of a clause which he recommends for the purpose. He afterwards points out that the word "heirs" is necessary in the devise of real property; that there must be three witnesses; and he remarks about a condition for changing the name that caution should be used to devise the property over, and he then recommends a general residuary clause. In short, the letter contains full and intelligible directions and instructions for the guidance of Mr. Colvin and his friend.

There seems also to have been a draft perused and settled by Mr. Drake.

Mr. Colvin at length prepared, first, a sketch and then a draft, which latter he sent to the deceased at Paris, together with Mr. Drake's letter. The draft so transmitted is brought in by Mr. Phillips: it is paper A, allowed to be the paper prepared by Mr. Colvin from the Indian will and the other testamentary instrument, and sent by him to Paris.

It can hardly be supposed that Mr. Colvin would venture to introduce into this instrument, or exclude from it, any thing except as he conceived in accordance with the deceased's intentions; those intentions being either collected from what was left in the old will, and contained in the new will, or gathered from confidential conversation with the deceased.

In this paper A there are many alterations of the Indian will: it begins with the disposition for the improvement of education in Scotland—it [314] alters the disposition of the surplus to the schoolmasters, by confining the bequest to the two counties of Mearns and Aberdeen, instead of the whole of Scotland. Even that plan, then, is in some degree altered, though the time when that alteration was introduced does not appear; it might be before or immediately after the deceased's return from Scotland (see paper A, ante, p. 267, n.).

Other very material and extensive erasures may however be inferred. All the annuitants are omitted; not only those who were dead—not only Mr. Fraser and Lady De La Pole—but all his friends, and even his executors in India. It cannot be presumed, and it would be difficult to suppose, that these annuities were omitted by Mr. Colvin, unless he had found them struck through and erased in the Indian will: and that they were struck through seems to be confirmed from paper A beginning with the education plan and ending with a new set of executors: for not only are all the original executors (except David Colvin) omitted, but a new set, the partners in the house of agency in Broad Street, are substituted, with a blank for the legacy—not the annuity—to be given to each of them.

If all these differences were taken from the Indian will, that instrument must have undergone much obliteration and erasure: there was nothing left of it but the education plan, and even that, I repeat, in some degree altered; slightly, but non constat when, altered: but every relation, every friend, every former executor is struck out. These circumstances will not be immaterial when the Court comes to [315] consider whether the old duplicate can, in point of law, be again set up; and also when it comes to consider the probability or improbability, in point of fact, whether the deceased should or should not himself destroy this instrument.

Among other erasures Lady De La Pole's annuity was erased; so Mr. Colvin expressly states the fact: yet paper A shews that it was not so omitted with the intention to exclude her from any provision, but to substitute a legacy in the place of the annuity; and not only a legacy to Lady De La Pole, but legacies to each of her children It stands thus in paper A: "I give to my niece Lady Pole, wife of Sir William Pole of Shute in Devonshire, the sum of , and to each of her children the sum of , to accumulate for their benefit till they arrive at the age of twenty-one years." So that here is not only an intention to benefit Lady Pole and her family, but those intentions are thus detailed; and not only so, but the deceased intended to give a legacy to his niece in America: for the paper goes on—"I give to my niece Mrs. , in America, the sum of £ ."

This niece, Mrs. Trezevant, was his brother's daughter, his heir at law, if not under a legal incapacity to inherit; and since the deceased had, by devising the landed property to the Mortimers, deprived her of what the law might possibly give her, and had directed them to take the name of Farquhar; he now, it would seem, intended to give this niece a pecuniary legacy; nor was it at all improbable that such should be his intention. But at present I only point out the fact of these alterations, and will [316] hereafter consider their effect upon the real question at issue.

Upon the receipt of this document at Paris the deceased abused Mr. Colvin in no very measured language, if Mr. Phillips, who is Mr. Colvin's own witness, is to be credited; and in this respect his account is not improbable, for the deceased was irritable, and when in anger did not care what he said of, or even to, any person.

Mr. Colvin soon afterwards went to Paris, and he and the deceased were again upon good terms; it might be convenient to both; but the deceased never adopted paper A, nor executed any will to that effect; he never in any manner expressed his approbation of its contents, nor ever did any act again giving effect to the education plan which it contained, or to any other testamentary disposition whatever.

The subsequent history of paper A is not exactly traced; it is in some degree mysterious; it never was seen in the deceased's possession after its receipt at Paris; it has been introduced late into the cause, and no less than six different copies of it have been produced. The precise history bears too little on the main question to require my entering into a further consideration of, or detailing the evidence applying to, it after its arrival at Paris. Mr. Drake's letter, however, which accompanied it, remained in the deceased's possession, and was found among his papers after his death; so that, from the arrival of that letter at least, the deceased was pretty fully aware of the operation of the mortmain laws.

The estate of Marshal Bessières being on sale while the deceased was at Paris, he seems [317] to have entertained some thoughts of becoming the purchaser—whether to avoid the mortmain act; whether to have property in different countries; whether as a mere speculation, and to employ his capital, does not appear; however, the purchase was not made.

Soon after the deceased's return from Paris in January, 1822, the Indian will and the testamentary instrument of October, 1821, were returned to the deceased in his iron chest; the iron chest was sent to his house and the key was delivered to him. Mr. Colvin so pleads the fact and so states it in his affidavit of scripts. Thus, the Indian will is traced back into the deceased's own custody and possession in his iron chest, and it was never afterwards seen by any human being, unless it was on the same paper with the document of October, which it is admitted and proved was afterwards destroyed by the deceased himself. Mr. Bazett gives this account of the destruction of it.

"After Mr. Farquhar's return from France, he, the deponent, and Mr. Colvin were at breakfast together; and the deponent's attention was excited by hearing the deceased say that something (deponent did not hear what) was very absurd: this was an expression which the deceased was continually using: just afterwards, Mr.

Colvin on leaving the room, and in the act of leaving it, turned round and said to the deceased that 'he, the deceased, was very fond of saying how absurd other people were, but that really no person was more absurd on some occasions than himself,' or to that effect; at which the deponent observed immediately that an angry [318] feeling arose in the deceased, who said nothing about it then, but presently afterwards left the house evidently in displeasure. The deponent and Mr. Colvin went together into the city, and he was with him in Broad Street in the room where the partners usually sit when, in the course of an hour or two after they had got there, the deceased came in, to the surprise of the deponent, as he seldom came there. Without noticing Mr. Colvin he came up to the deponent, and telling him that he wished to speak with him, they went together into an adjoining room, where the deceased, producing a paper writing, reminded the deponent of what Mr. Colvin had said at breakfast and expressed a wounded feeling in consequence; he pointed to the paper he held in his hand, and saying, 'You may tell your friend David what he has lost,' he tore the paper several times and threw the pieces into the fire or under the grate."

Mr. Bazett then interfered between those two gentlemen and he reconciled them. He identifies the paper as the instrument of the 2d of October, 1821, by adding, "It was that and that only."

Here, then, the deceased himself at all events destroyed the paper (which, for convenience, I shall call the codicil) of October, 1821; he became intestate as to his real estates; East Mark, and the rest of his landed property, would go to his heir at law; the Mortimers and all his other relations were wholly excluded; the newly appointed executors, his partners in England, were all revoked; if the Indian will, altered and erased as it was in part, was [319] preserved by the deceased. It is admitted to have been in the deceased's own possession and custody at this time; it must have been in his hands on this very occasion and under his notice; for the two instruments were together. The conclusion as to its subsequent existence will depend upon what afterwards took place; it was never, as I before said, again seen, though the deceased lived about four years.

The subsequent acts and conduct of the deceased in regard to his property and to his relations, his declarations and the general presumptions and probabilities of the case, will require to be accurately examined hereafter, but at present the remaining history need only be stated generally.

In the latter end of 1822 the deceased purchased the Fonthill estate at the price of 300,000l., whether upon speculation, whether he ever meant to retain it, whether he afterwards resolved to dispose of it on account of the statutes of mortmain, or for other reasons, cannot be exactly ascertained: he remained in possession of it for three years and contracted for the re-sale of most, if not all, of it in December, 1825. Mr. Drake's account of the purchase of that and other property will be sufficient for the present purpose. "The deceased had (as respondent believes) entered into a legal contract for the sale of the whole of his estate at Fonthill some time previous to 1826; he purchased that estate in the year 1822 and gave for it some such sum as 300,000l. —the first contract for the re-sale, of which he has any knowledge, bears date 22d December, 1825. There were three subsequent contracts on the 27th and 30th [320] December, 1825, and 2d June, 1826. The deceased in May, 1823, purchased a freehold estate of Mr. Benett in Wiltshire and Dorsetshire for the sum of 100,000l. —whether that or any part of it was re-sold respondent knows not. In June, 1824, the deceased lent 2300l. on mortgage: in Oct. 1824, 20,000l.:" Mr. Drake mentions some other assignments of mortgages taken by the deceased.

The purchase of Fonthill seems to have been made through the agency of Mr. Phillips, the auctioneer; he was employed to sell "the splendid ornaments and other valuable effects" in the following year; he also was employed as agent in the management of the estate. In order to secure the performance of an agreement entered into between him and the deceased respecting these concerns, he procured the deceased to execute an instrument prepared by Phillips' own solicitor in the form of a memorandum addressed to the deceased's executors, appointed or to be appointed.

This memorandum, after shortly noticing the purport of the agreement, proceeded: "Now in the event of my death, I do hereby direct that the said agreement and every part thereof shall be carried into effect and be performed by my executors, as well already named as hereafter to be named as fully and effectually as if I had lived; . . .

"I further declare this memorandum shall be considered a codicil to be added and taken as part of my last will and testament either already made or hereafter to be made, notwithstanding the same is not annexed thereto." This instrument addressed, not to any exe-[321]-cutors by name, but any appointed or to be appointed, and called a codicil to a will already made or to be made, and obtained in the manner, and for the purpose, that it was obtained, does not bear materially on the present case; it does not infer the probable existence or previous destruction of any will; it has been mentioned inadvertently, since, if wholly unnoticed, it might seem to have been passed over.

Mr. Farquhar becoming dissatisfied with the conduct of Messrs. Phillips, they were dismissed from the agency at Michaelmas 1824, and suits at law and in equity took place between them and Mr. Farquhar, which continued unsettled down to the death of the latter.

On the dismissal of the Messrs. Phillips he intrusted the management of his concerns at Fonthill to, and seems to have reposed great confidence in, Mr. George Mortimer, one of the devisees of the East Mark estate in the instrument of October, 1821. This nephew was engaged in a woollen manufactory; and the deceased, on going to Paris, gave him a large credit on his bankers. In 1824 he induced him to erect a factory on the Fonthill estate, though it was represented by his friends as very injurious to the property; and he granted him land and lent him money for the undertaking.

The instruments, exhibited in the 19th, 21st, and 23d articles, which are fully confirmed by the depositions, satisfactorily shew these facts.

It appears that in 1823 the deceased removed from Gloucester Place, where he had resided next door to Mr. Colvin, to a house in the New Road, and at that place and at Fonthill he lived till his death. Mr. and Mrs. George [322] Mortimer were inmates at Fonthill; they resided there principally, except that in the spring of 1826 Mrs. Mortimer came up to lie-in at the deceased's house in the New Road, and returned, as soon as it was prudent to travel, to Fonthill. There are exhibited a great number of the deceased's letters, both to Mr. and Mrs. George Mortimer, written quite in that unreserved stile which would naturally belong to such a near and confidential connexion. I should also have mentioned that Mr. James Mortimer, who had engaged in building some houses in Scotland, was also liberally assisted by the deceased with money to carry on that undertaking.(a)

These are some of the facts relating to the conduct of the deceased in respect to his property, and in respect to his relations, between 1822 and his death: and at present it will be sufficient further to state that he went to bed not quite well on the evening of the 5th of July, 1826, and the next morning was found dead in his bed.

His friend and partner, Mr. Colvin, and his solicitor, Mr. Drake, were immediately sent for, and they sealed up all his repositories; and on the next morning those repositories were carefully searched by Mr. Colvin in the presence of Mr. Drake and Mr. Fraser: Mr. and Mrs. Mor-[323]-timer being at Fonthill and not arriving in town till that evening after the search had been made. The deceased's keys were discovered placed in the situation where he usually kept them; two keys, in particular, it was his habit to tie up in separate corners of his handkerchief and place under his pillow; and in that usual situation those two keys were found after his death. No will was found. The only paper, in any degree of a testamentary nature, was an envelope which had contained either "a will" or "the copy of a will."

Four witnesses speak to the finding of that cover: the first is Mr. Drake: "On the day after the death, when search was made, some few papers were found in a cabinet in the deceased's sitting room; one of importance being a bond of David Colvin's: a cover or envelope was there, endorsed 'Will of John Farquhar, Esq.,' which, as well as deponent remembers, was locked up in the drawer." He does not, therefore, speak very positively to the envelope being in a drawer within the cabinet.

Neile, a servant, says: "Deponent was present when the cover of the will was

---

(a) "London, 28th June, 1825.

"Dear James,—Having agreed to pay for the new houses intended to be built at Ferry-hill, I hereby authorize you to contract with the different artificers necessary, and to draw upon me for the charges of the work as it may be necessary for materials and labour.—I am, dear James, yours truly, "J. FARQUHAR."

found after the deceased's death; it was found by Mr. Colvin in a drawer, the upper one or next to it of several drawers on which stood a cabinet."

Hasler, another servant who was present, states, "That the cover of the will was not found in the (brass-bound) cabinet, but was found in one of some drawers, not in a cabinet: the deponent saw the cover, there was written on it 'The will of John Farquhar, Esq.' The room was almost full of cabinets, [324] drawers, tables, boxes, and all kinds of articles."

Blakemore, a carpenter, states, "The envelope of the will was not found in either cabinet but in a drawer in the corner of, and at the other end of, the room, near the outer room."

These are the four witnesses to the finding of this envelope; and the evidence therefore is that it was found, not in the iron chest, not in any cabinet, but in a drawer. That paper has been accidentally not preserved, nor does it appear of much consequence how it was endorsed: whether it was the envelope that covered the will when it came from India, whether it was the envelope in which the deceased inclosed that will in Mr. Bland's presence, whether it was the envelope that accompanied it in the iron chest when returned to the deceased, or the envelope of any other paper, is neither easily ascertained nor of much importance. The deceased himself took the codicil out of the iron chest in order to destroy it; and this envelope was not found where the Indian will was last seen. Whatever envelope it was and in whatever place it was found there is no proof, nor does it seem to me there is just ground to suspect that it was not placed there, or accidentally thrown or left there, by the deceased himself.

Here, then, are some of the leading facts which hardly admit of controversy. The duplicate of the will propounded was never seen after the year 1822, and even then it was materially altered: it was at that time in the possession of the deceased, in an iron chest, of which he had the key: it was not found either there or elsewhere at his death.

[325] Upon these facts it seems proper to consider what is, primâ facie, the presumption of law? Who did the deed? Who was the person primâ facie that destroyed this instrument? and upon that point there appears to be no solid doubt. It was in the deceased's possession—it was not to be found at his death: the first presumption is that the deceased himself destroyed it: if that presumption of fact be not repelled by evidence, then the legal consequence will also primâ facie be, that the duplicate remaining in India is revoked.

This presumption of fact and this legal consequence may be rebutted by satisfactory evidence; but the burthen of proof lies upon the party setting up the will—whether he sets it up by propounding a draft, a duplicate, or a cancelled will; for whether the paper be found cancelled, or whether it be wholly removed and not found at all, still the first presumption as to the person who did the act is the same. The force of the presumption and the weight of the onus may be different according to circumstances; but the Court, in order to pronounce for a draft or a duplicate, or a cancelled will, must be judicially convinced that the absence or cancellation of the paper once in, and not traced out of, the deceased's own possession, was not attributable to the deceased. This negative may be established by a strong combination of circumstances leading to a moral conviction that the deceased did not do the act, or it may be established by direct positive evidence in different ways, such as by proving the existence of the instrument after the testator's death—by proving that he himself destroyed it when of unsound [326] mind, or by error, or under force sine animo revocandi—or by proving that it was fraudulently destroyed by some other person: but under this last supposition the proof must be clearer, because a fresh presumption arises—the presumption in favour of innocence: for if a fraud is charged, it must be clearly proved by facts and circumstances leading to a conclusion of guilt.

All these presumptions, if they come to be analysed, may be resolved into the reasonable probability of fact, deduced from the ordinary practice of mankind and from sound reason. Persons in general keep their wills in places of safety, or, as we here technically express it, "among their papers of moment and concern." They are instruments in their nature revocable: testamentary intention is ambulatory till death; and if the instrument be not found in the repositories of the testator, where he had placed it, the common sense of the matter, primâ facie, is that he himself destroyed it, meaning to revoke it: and if he destroyed the part in his own possession, the common sense of the matter again is that he also intended to destroy the duplicate not in his own possession.

It was argued on behalf of the executor that the burthen of proof lay on the next of kin, that they must shew affirmatively by evidence that the deceased himself destroyed the instrument. The doctrine is new, and no authority was given to support it; and the Court cannot venture to adopt it without authority, and against authority. The passage quoted from Swinburne seems to be quite in the opposite direction: "What if the testament be found cancelled and defaced, but it is not known who did it? [327] To whom is this act of cancelling or defacing to be attributed? to the testator who made it, or to some other, who otherwise, peradventure, might be hindered by it?".

He then puts the arguments and authorities on each side, "It seemeth not to be reputed the act of the testator, for change of mind is not to be presumed, especially where a man has done a thing with deliberation and resolution: on the contrary, it seemeth that it ought not to be accounted the act of any other, for that were to presume a fraud and deceit, which ought not to be presumed unless it be proved." He then proceeds to state his own opinion: "In this controversy, therefore, I suppose that the person in whose custody the testament is found is to be adjudged to have done the act, whether it be the testator or another." (a)

The opinion then of Swinburne is that primâ facie the act is done by the person who is in possession of the instrument: but this primâ facie legal presumption may be rebutted by the circumstances, upon a full examination, creating a stronger presumption the other way; and it seldom happens that cases, which set out upon certain legal presumptions, require to be decided upon the mere presumption: the general circumstances of the case usually lead to a tolerably satisfactory conclusion of the real fact, either by confirming or by repelling the legal presumption. The correctness of Swinburne's principle is affirmed by adjudged cases.

The Court, for personal reasons, is unwilling to [328] rely upon any authority derived from the decisions in this place within the last twenty years. It will be sufficient to say that I see no reason to depart from the doctrines laid down in the cases quoted within that period: but though the point hardly requires authority, I will shortly refer to the decision of Sir William Wynne, in the case of Freeman v. Gibbons, in the Prerogative Court, Easter Term, 1793, stating the words of that learned Judge from my own note.

Per Curiam. "Heads or instructions are propounded by Lydia Gibbons as the residuary legatee, and it is proved that the deceased executed the will on December the 1st, and died on the 10th." So that the will was only made nine days before the death. "But the executed will cannot be produced, and it is said to have been destroyed after the deceased's death: if that can be proved the instructions may be pronounced for. Two witnesses speak to declarations of the deceased, recognizing the existence of the will a short time before his death: this affords strong presumptive evidence that he adhered to the will, but not conclusive proof, for the declaration may have been insincere." The usual want of sincerity in such declarations I shall have occasion again to notice. "The two persons to whom the declarations were made are, one the brother-in-law, the other the son-in-law of Gibbons. The will was deposited in the drawer of the bureau; and it is not alleged that the deceased was not able to go to the bureau after the execution. Recognitions, because they may be insincere, are no proof of the fact that the will was in existence at that time: it may have been destroyed before: [329] it is proved that the deceased was up, and looked out of the window three or four days before his death." Under these circumstances, there being a possibility and ability on the part of the deceased to have destroyed the will, Sir William Wynne pronounced against the instructions propounded.

In Baumgarten v. Pratt, in the Prerogative Court, Easter Term, 1796, the same Judge pronounced a similar decision. In that case there was a draft produced: the Court said; "A draft may be pronounced for; but it must be proved either that the will remained entire at the death, or, if destroyed in the lifetime, that it was done without the knowledge and approbation of the testator: the presumption is that it was destroyed by the deceased:" and in that case the draft was pronounced against.

Now these are authorities which go further back than the last twenty years, deciding that the presumption is, where a will is not found, that it was destroyed by the deceased himself.

(a) Swinburne on Wills, part 7, s. 16, p. 992, 3.

If, however, we should from the evidence arrive at the fact that this will was destroyed by the deceased himself, the legal consequence cannot be disputed that, primâ facie, the duplicate is also destroyed. That point has been settled in a variety of cases: it is hardly necessary to refer to them. It was so decided in Sir Edward Seymour's case: in Limbery v. Mason (2 Comyns, 453), and it is as expressly laid down in Burtenshaw v. Gilbert (1 Cowper, 54), where Mr. Justice Aston, after Lord Mansfield had gone through the case, said, "If the duplicate of the will had still remained [330] in the hand of the person to whose custody it was originally intrusted, yet the cancelling that part which the testator had in his own possession would have been a sufficient cancelling of such duplicate." In Pemberton v. Pemberton (13 Ves. 308) Lord Chief Justice Mansfield, Lord Eldon, and Lord Erskine, in different stages of the cause, all held the same doctrine. So in Welsh v. Gowland, Prerog. Mich. Term, 1804, Sir William Wynne said, "It is an admitted rule that the cancellation of a part, in the testator's possession, would be a cancellation of a duplicate in the hands of another person."

The reason of this rule is obvious; for why should a person destroy or cancel the duplicate of his will if he meant the other part to operate? It may, indeed, be shewn that it was done diverso intuitu, or by accident, or while of unsound mind, or for the sake of peace, and to deceive and impose upon persons who were importuning him; but, primâ facie, the cancellation or destruction of the part in possession infers the revocation of the duplicate.

The main question of fact, then, to be examined is, by whom was this will destroyed? Primâ facie, by the deceased himself, who was in possession of it; and the executor setting up the duplicate must, as I have said, shew either by direct positive evidence, or by circumstances, producing a strong moral conviction that it was not done by the deceased. The executor and his legal advisers seem clearly so to have un-[331]-derstood the case by the very course of conducting this suit: they began not merely by pleading the factum of the will at Calcutta, which was never denied, but by giving a long allegation consisting of twenty-eight articles, setting forth circumstances from which it was to be collected that the deceased had not destroyed the will himself. The allegation commenced with the earlier history of the deceased's intentions, from which his adherence to that will was to be inferred: it pleaded the continuance of his intentions to dispose of his fortune in improving education in Scotland; quarrels with, and disaffection towards, his relations; and declarations recognizing the existence of this will to the very end of his life: from all these circumstances, inferring that the deceased himself would not have revoked this will, and thereby repelling the legal presumption.

But the allegation went further: for it pleaded circumstances to shew that it was destroyed by another person, not by accident, not by fire, not by inadvertence, but by a fraudulent spoliation, by taking it out of the deceased's repositories in his life time; and though no direct act of spoliation was charged, so that it could be met and contradicted, yet without specifying any time or place or circumstance attending the act of spoliation it was insinuated too plainly to be misunderstood that Mr. and Mrs. Mortimer, or rather Mrs. Mortimer, was the person meant to be charged. This is a serious moral offence, and in support of such a charge, pretty clear proof should be adduced: the presumption is in favour of innocence: but if this charge be proved there is an end of the case, and it is [332] of a personal nature so important that I shall first consider the circumstances and evidence in support of such an imputation.

It is alleged that particularly for the last year of his life the deceased was in the habit of leaving his papers and keys about, and his repositories unlocked, and that Mr. and Mrs. Mortimer were often at his house in town when he was at Fonthill. If this were all true, it would prove nothing; for the will may have been destroyed three years before: but the facts are not quite truly laid, for though the deceased might sometimes omit to lock up his papers, yet in general when his papers lay about he locked his room door: if papers of some importance were occasionally left, yet no testamentary paper was ever seen, not even the envelope: and of some of his keys and repositories he was particularly cautious.

What then would these circumstances amount to? That there was a possibility of a spoliation being committed, which possibility cannot and need not be denied: but the possibility of committing a crime, unless followed by acts done, affords not the slightest proof that the crime has been committed. No person was ever observed at the iron chest, where the will was last seen, no person at the brass-bound cabinet, where the envelope is supposed to have been found, if found in any cabinet at all. The charge really comes to the evidence of Mrs. Hurst, who probably was the only cause that it ever was insinuated.

This witness, who is an undertaker and upholsterer, carrying on business near Storey's Gate, and who had been employed in her business by [333] Mr. and Mrs. Mortimer to the amount of 400l. or 500l., and who was in very distressed circumstances, thus deposes: "In December, 1826, whether before or after Christmas she cannot say, but just about the time the administration issued, deponent called upon Mrs. (George) Mortimer, to speak to her on the subject of the administration and sureties: Mrs. Mortimer told her that her husband was out of spirits and wished to decline having any thing to do with it, but that she was averse to this, and told the deponent that it would be doing her the greatest favour if she could prevail on Mr. Mortimer to insist on being joined in the administration. The deponent then asked her 'how Mr. Fraser would feel about it, whether he would be angry;' to which Mrs. Mortimer replied, 'Oh! I don't care about that; they are all indebted to me for every farthing; for I destroyed the will.' These were, as the deponent believes, the precise words: no other person was present, but Mr. Mortimer came into the room immediately afterwards, and the conversation was discontinued. The deponent had no explanation from Mrs. Mortimer at any time whatever of what she meant, but it did not strike the deponent that Mrs. Mortimer did mean to say that she had done anything wrong thereby."

This is a very safe mode of attempting to fasten such an imputation, for it affords no possibility of contradicting it. However doubtful might be the admissibility of such evidence (see note, supra, p. 277), yet the Court considered it an act of injustice [334] to Mrs. Mortimer to get rid of this testimony on that ground.

It seems hardly necessary to state many reasons why the Court cannot venture to give credit to Mrs. Hurst: she is examined as a witness in April, 1828: the words are supposed to have been spoken about Christmas 1826, fifteen months before—yet she pretends to relate the precise words—they are not accompanied with any explanation—there are no circumstances which should prevent misapprehension nor confirm their sincerity—they are spoken just at the end of a conversation, as Mr. Mortimer came into the room. The words themselves are equivocal—they will bear the interpretation that the deceased's regard and sense of Mrs. Mortimer's attentions had induced him to destroy his will, or to make no will, or not to make a will excluding Mr. Fraser.

If Mrs. Mortimer had been guilty of a fraudulent spoliation of this Indian will, or of any other will, it is almost impossible that she should not be aware she had done something wrong; and it is highly improbable she would have disclosed it in this abrupt and unnecessary mode: for there was no inducement. The suggested ground-work and motive to the conversation are improbable and untrue—improbable, that Mrs. Mortimer would employ this distressed upholsterer to try to get security in this large amount; untrue, that it was necessary for Mr. Mortimer to insist upon being joined in the administration; for there was no dispute about the administration at this time: it had been agreed that Mr. Fraser and both the Messrs. Mortimer should take it jointly, and an agreement to that effect [335] had been signed by all parties so long before as the 10th of November preceding, that is, seven weeks before Christmas; whereas Mrs. Hurst says, "whether before or after Christmas she cannot say:" so that it was about Christmas she lays the conversation. This is still further improbable, and must be incorrect, because the administration to Mr. Fraser actually passed the seal on the 15th of December. The whole story is therefore very loose and improbable; and the ground-work of the conversation is apparently unfounded.

What, too, is the credit and character and conduct of this Mrs. Hurst? and how did she act? She states, "it did not strike her that Mrs. Mortimer meant to say she had done any thing wrong." But is it credible that, if she had destroyed this will, she should not have been conscious of having done that which was wrong? the witness indeed could not, at the time, have understood Mrs. Mortimer as intending to say she had fraudulently destroyed the will; nor have thought that any thing improper had been done; for she mentioned nothing on the subject for six or seven months.

This person had, as I have observed, been employed by Mr. Mortimer, as an upholsterer, in fitting up a house: she had been paid her money on account from time to time as the work was going on, so that at the end of it very little was due, and her bill was not quite satisfactory: and in June, 1827, she was in very distressed circumstances, and requested Mr. Mortimer to lend her money on mortgage, and to accept bills for her accommodation, which he declined to do.

[336] There are four of her letters exhibited; three, dated respectively on the 6th and 14th of June and on the 14th of August, 1827, are addressed to Mr. Mortimer; the first requesting his advance of the money on mortgage and offering 10 per cent. interest; the two next pressing him to accept the bills. From the fourth letter, dated the 22d of August, it should seem that Mr. Mortimer not having even returned her an answer, she wrote to Mrs. Mortimer for her good offices; but did not, in the slightest degree, suggest that she was in possession of any secret that might be the means of influencing Mrs. Mortimer. At length, not getting pecuniary assistance from Mr. Mortimer, towards the latter end of October, 1827, an anonymous letter was sent to Mr. Colvin that Mrs. Hurst could give important information about Mr. Farquhar's will; she was applied to by Mr. Colvin's solicitor and was brought forward to give this evidence: her memory is not very accurate, for in answer to the ninety-eighth interrogatory she does not quite recollect her own letters: "She did at one period, but not, as she believes, in 1827, apply to Mr. Mortimer to lend her 400l. on mortgage, offering to pay him an interest of 10 per cent. thereon." Yet here is her own letter making the application and the offer. "Respondent has no recollection of having been in August, 1827, in fear of being arrested by four different persons at the same period of time;" and yet here, again, is her own letter, dated in August, 1827, and stating expressly her fears of being arrested by four different persons. In short, no sort of reliance ought to be placed on her evidence. It is there-[337]-fore a matter of justice due to Mrs. Mortimer to declare, not only that the imputation is not proved, but that she stands wholly acquitted of it.

No direct proof being then adduced that the will was destroyed by some person other than the deceased himself, the case rests upon the general circumstances, in order to shew that the improbability of a destruction of this will by the deceased himself is so great as to lead the Court to a moral conviction that it must have been destroyed by some other means: of which certainly there was a possibility.

To induce the Court to arrive at the conclusion that such was the case, the grounds taken appear to be the following:—First, that, long before making the will, the deceased had conceived so strongly the intention of devoting the bulk of his fortune to the improvement of education in Scotland as to render it highly improbable he should afterwards depart from that intention: secondly, that after his arrival in England he sent for his will from India—went into Scotland to make inquiries, and still expressed the same intentions respecting the improvement of education in that country—quarrelled with Mr. Fraser, and that the will was in existence in the beginning of 1822: and lastly, that though no direct proof can be adduced of its subsequent existence, yet by declarations down to the time of his death the deceased recognized its existence.

Upon the first head—the probability a priori of adherence to this will—it is to be observed that the proof of general intention to promote and improve education in Scotland goes only a part and not the whole length of the case: the [338] fact to be proved is, the existence of the will, and that proof is to be deduced from adherence to this identical disposition, and to the plan contained in this very instrument. It is quite consistent with the destruction of this will that he should alter his plan, meaning still to a certain extent to promote Scotch education, and benefit Aberdeen professors and schoolmasters by the making of another will; but that will might also contain other provisions. The probabilities, therefore, must be examined more closely and with a view to the precise point to be proved.

It is true that in his letter to his friend Mr. Wilson, in November, 1790, he mentions "having wished his father to warn his distant relations against any ridiculous notions of inheriting his fortune, for that he should leave it to a public institution:" and in another letter to him in August, 1791, he adverts to "a scheme he had long had in view to leave his fortune, in case of accident, to the University of Aberdeen, in order to double the professors of what are, in his opinion, the most useful branches of science, so that they might be taught during the whole year." This plan seems to be to double the number of professors, and not to double the salaries of each, though it comes nearer to the disposition of the will than the crude idea in the former letter: it is in this last letter that he adds, "I have stated my project to some of my friends, who treat it with every mark of disapprobation, thinking I should do as great injustice to nephews and nieces, whom I never saw, as if I were to rob them of their birthright."

He was therefore not much confirmed in his intentions by the opinions of his friends in India, [339] nor does he seem to have had more encouragement from his friend Mr. George Wilson; since he did not mention nor allude to the subject again for near ten years—till January, 1800, and then not directly nor explicitly. He then mentions intending to leave his niece an annuity of 500l. rather than a sum of money; this may reasonably infer his intention to leave the bulk of his fortune to other objects—to Scotch education: but he also says, "That your opinions should have changed I own surprises me, but I must wait until we meet to learn the extent of the change: I certainly have looked forward to our meeting as one of the happiest objects of my life." That meeting never did take place: but there is strong reason to suppose that Mr. Wilson concurred with his other friends in disapprobation of the plan, from this circumstance, viz. that the deceased never again wrote to him upon the subject, though he remained fourteen years longer in India.

The fact, however, is that just before his departure from India he put his plan into the form and shape of this will, expressly stating that he was "about to embark for Europe;" and Mr. Colvin in his answers thus describes the mode of preparing this will: "That one part of the will and codicil was written from the dictation of the deceased by Alexander Colvin (to whom the deceased enjoined the greatest secrecy as to the contents), and that the other part thereof was immediately copied by the said Alexander Colvin therefrom."

There seems then to have been but little previous preparation for making this will; and though the subject may have been long floating [340] loosely in his mind, it appears to have been done rather hastily at the last. How had his plan been digested and matured? He had been absent from Scotland forty-five years—left it when a youth of nineteen—in 1800 he mentioned a scheme of "doubling the professors"—his friends disapproved his plan as injurious to his relations; he made no inquiries, as far as appears, about the actual state of education in Scotland or at Aberdeen in particular; but with his own crude recollections and notions—upon the point of embarking—he dictated this will containing his scheme for devoting to this plan his immense fortune—giving the whole of it away from his family, except two annuities of 500l. each to a nephew and a niece whom he had educated.

Resting here, this will modo et formâ was not very likely to be adhered to in all its details when he came to Europe, and had an opportunity of further consideration and of more exact inquiries upon the spot: on the other hand, although in his letter of 1791 he did not admit the rights of his nephews and nieces "whom he had never seen;" and that in 1800 he talked of leaving his niece, Miss Fraser, only 500l. a year—when it must be remembered his fortune was of course much less; yet he was not by any means destitute of family affections: his letters to Mr. Wilson, from 1784 to the very time of his leaving India, fully prove this: he furnished supplies to his father and mother so long as either of them lived: upon hearing of his brother's death in America, leaving an only daughter—the present Mrs. Trezevant, who had come to England for her education—he was very anxious for her protection: his sister Mrs. Fraser, and her hus-[341]-band, were both dead, leaving two children, now Mr. Fraser and Lady De La Pole—he took charge of their education—he intrusted this to his friend Mr. Wilson, not in a cold and niggardly way, but in a manner that shewed strong natural affection for them.

I do not think it necessary to quote the numerous letters from the deceased to Mr. Wilson; they were pointed out in argument; and a reference to a very few passages will for the present purpose be sufficient. In a letter of the 6th of March, 1800, he thus writes: "I wish my niece might be sent to Bath in order to avoid the inconvenience you mentioned to me. Mrs. Bebb has been so good as to say that she would see her. I hope, when you send her, you will take care that her dress be suitable to the niece of a person of my fortune."

In 1808 he writes, "Should my nephew have made any considerable proficiency in the mathematics and have an inclination for the army, I do not know whether an appointment for the Engineer Corps here would not be the best line for him. But should he wish to remain at home I hope you will act respecting him as you would in the case of my decease."

Again, in 1810, "I need not trouble you respecting my nephew and niece, hoping to be so soon with you, but should I not arrive I request you will act for them as you would for your own children, and I give you, as I have always done, the fullest powers."

Now, these letters mark the affection subsisting, even in India, towards his nephews and nieces, when he "had never seen them." What took place when he came to England? He went to Lady De La Pole's house, and domesticated [342] there for a whole year: she soon after was confined, and he stood godfather to her child; and his letters to Wilson shew that he was quite satisfied not only with her, but also with his nephew Mr. Fraser, and with his progress and diligence in his profession. To Wilson, in a letter of the 10th of December, 1814, he thus expressed himself: "Lady Pole wrote to you some days since—she feels great gratitude for your attention to her. John seems studious, and, although at a distant time, will I hope succeed in his profession; he however much regrets the loss of your advice and assistance." He therefore did not disapprove of their conduct, nor was he disappointed in his first impressions.

Mixing thus in family society, satisfied hitherto with the behaviour of his nephew and niece, engaging in the concerns of this country, in the brewery, in his agency partnership, and in various speculations to employ himself and his great capital, observing the conduct of, and the example set him by the rest of the world, and that great institutions for the benefit of society were erected and supported by the small contributions of the many, and not by the sacrifices of a single individual to the exclusion of the claims of family connexions; is it at all improbable that he should begin to doubt and hesitate about the execution, in all its details, of that plan to which his Indian will had devoted his property? For what did he do? he sent for his will from India—he, in 1815, treated for the East Mark estate—he went to Aberdeen in 1816, his friend Wilson being then dead—he made inquiries about professorships and schools; but he did not in the slightest degree impart his [343] plan, nor confirm his intentions; nay, though he mentioned incidentally that he had made a will, yet he did not disclose even its general object. All these circumstances tend to render it by no means improbable that he meant at least to revise and reconsider, and did not contemplate an exact adherence to what he had already done.

From 1816 to 1821 there was nothing done in furtherance and confirmation of this will, though to his friends he spoke in general terms in favour of improving education in Scotland, so as to shew he had not given up all his ideas upon that subject; yet to none of them did he impart the detailed provisions of this will, or recognize the scheme which it contained, or the extent to which he meant to devote his fortune to that object; but he did acts inconsistent with its contents—he invested part of his property in the purchase of land, of East Mark and other property, notwithstanding he was aware that such property would not pass under his Indian will; for Mr. Drake fully apprized him of that in 1818, and for three years he remained absolutely intestate as to that property, which would have gone to his heir at law in America, if she were capable of taking.

In 1821 he made alterations in the will by erasing at least some part, and he executed another instrument by which he became testate as to his real estate, and deprived his education plan at least of that part of his property. This was a departure to that extent by a direct testamentary act: but that instrument he afterwards destroyed.

Now, what is the effect of this destruction, even taking it to have been a codicil? If by a codicil [344] he had altered the will, the destruction of the codicil afterwards might be supposed to set up those parts of the will which were altered by such codicil; but the destruction of the codicil cannot have the legal effect of setting up those parts of the wills destroyed by erasure. How much of the will was erased and what were the exact testamentary intentions in October, 1821, cannot with positive certainty be ascertained: as far, however, as they can be inferred from paper A, all the annuities were revoked, all the executors were revoked, and new executors appointed by the codicil. How then is it possible that the destruction of the codicil should again set up the whole of the Indian will as now propounded, even if there were proof that this will was not destroyed by the deceased himself?

But, without considering that legal consequence, what is the effect of the destruction of this codicil upon the main subject of inquiry, whether the deceased did or did not destroy the remainder of this partly erased and partly revoked will? He was again intestate as to his landed property; Messrs. Mortimer, who were to have it, and to perpetuate the name of Farquhar, were wholly cut off; his other relations in England were wholly excluded; he was without the new executors in England: whether he intended to die intestate or not, he at least was intestate in these respects from that time till his death.

It is not to my mind in any degree improbable that at the time he took out the codicil and carried it in a moment of irritation to Broad Street to destroy it, in the presence of Mr. Colvin, he should at the same time have taken the will, altered and erased as it was, and [345] thrown it into the fire: looking to the character and temper of the deceased, there is no improbability that both instruments coming under his notice together at that time, he should, under the same feelings that he carried the will of October to Broad Street to destroy it, have in the first place thrown the Indian will into his own fire; whether possibly with the intention, in that humour, of never making another and of dying intestate, or whether with the intention of revising and considering the whole of his testamentary disposition, need not be conjectured: the destruction of the will at that period was much more probable than that he should allow a will to remain, which could not operate on his landed estate; and should consent to remain intestate as to that property, depriving the Messrs. Mortimer to whom he had given it by the paper he now destroyed, and permitting the heir at law in America, alone of all his relations, to be benefited by his wealth.

Now, from that time till his death there was no one act of the deceased, and no part of his conduct, tending to confirm and support the existence of this will: the probability of its existence depends wholly and entirely upon declarations, and declarations only.

Declarations alone unsupported by circumstances strongly marking their sincerity and confirming their probability, would of themselves be very unsafe and insufficient to repel the presumption of law. All declarations, where you are to rely on the exact words of a casual exprcs-[346]-sion, are liable to be misapprehended—to be misrecollected—to be misrepresented: a slight bias in the mind of the hearer will render the apprehension and the recollection incorrect: the slightest alteration of the expression by a word, or almost a letter, may vary the whole import of the declarations: an alteration from "I have" to "I had" a will, would completely change the bearing of the words; the one signifying the existence of the will, the other its being no longer in existence: but, above all, the possible insincerity of declarations, particularly about wills, increases the danger of relying upon them. This has always been the doctrine, not only of these Courts but of all other Courts. Sir William Wynne stated in Freeman and Gibbons, as I have already mentioned, that recognitions of a will, even a few days before the testator's death, were no proof of the fact of its existence, because the declarations might be insecure. The doctrine is the same in all other Courts.

Thus, Lord Eldon, in the case of Pemberton v. Pemberton, to which I have before referred, expresses himself:—

"Few declarations deserve less credit than those of men as to what they have done by their wills. The wish to silence importunity, to elude questions from persons who take upon them to judge of their own claims, must be taken into consideration; with a fair regard to the primâ facie import, and the possible intention connected with all other circumstances" (13 Ves. 301).

So, again, Lord Erskine (then become Lord [347] Chancellor) in the same case. "After all this evidence the loose declarations of the testator, under circumstances imposing on him no obligation of veracity, are nothing" (13 Ves. 313).

And in Ex parte Pye (18 Ves. 148) Lord Eldon quotes Lord Thurlow's authority upon the subject.

"His Lordship (Lord Thurlow) also made another observation of great weight, that having raised the presumption from the fact, you beat it down by declarations, which, from the very nature of mankind, deserve very little credit, viz. what a man has done, or will do, by his will; how much shall stand and how much shall not; declarations are intended generally to mislead: but the primâ facie presumption is established beyond all controversy."

Applying, then, this doctrine to the present case: here the primâ facie presumption, arising from the will being in the possession of the deceased, is, that he himself destroyed it; and declarations alone to beat that presumption down, unless connected with other strong circumstances leading to the same conclusion, would be very unsafe evidence. If, however, the declarations relied upon in support of the existence of the will be examined, they will all of them be found exposed to considerable suspicion of insincerity.

In the seventeenth article Mr. Colvin pleads, generally, declarations made after the deceased returned from France in the beginning of 1822. "That the deceased frequently declared to various persons that he had a will or two wills which he had made in India; that one re-[348]-mained in India, and the other in his own possession; that he kept the latter in the cabinet, and that David Colvin and Dr. Fleming were two of the executors." In subsequent articles Mr. Colvin pleads specific declarations to Mr. Drake in 1823, to Mr. Hume in 1825 and 1826, and to the Phillips' a few days before Mr. Farquhar's death.

It is to be recollected that various persons were anxious that the deceased should make a will; and for different reasons: his partners wished there should be executors to settle the partnership accounts: Mr. Drake very properly thought it his duty to remind the deceased that after-purchased estates would not pass under any will, but would go to the heir at law: the Phillips' had obtained a sort of memorandum or codicil, addressed to the executors of "any will made or to be made," to carry a certain agreement into effect; and consequently if there were no executors, there were no persons to whom this directory instrument could be addressed: they were not aware that a revocatory instrument had been executed by the deceased, as a precaution, on the 7th of January, 1825.

Here were, therefore, different persons for different reasons urging the deceased to make a will, and he for different reasons would wish to evade, parry, and get rid of the subject: he might not, and probably did not, at least for a considerable portion of the time between 1822 and his death, mean to die intestate; but he might be in a state of intestacy, and clearly was in a state of intestacy as to his real estate—the great bulk of his property; for from 1822 to 1825 above 400,000l. was so invested: yet he did [349] no testamentary act; he might not be able to make up his mind as to arranging the disposition of his great property, and he might, therefore, have evaded the subject, either by saying he had a will, or that the law would make a good will for him: and in point of character it appears sufficiently from the evidence that he was not so very scrupulous about veracity as never to sacrifice truth in order to evade questions which he was not bound or was unwilling to answer.

After these observations it may be hardly necessary to travel very minutely through the various declarations: but, in a case so important on account of the great amount of property at issue, the Court is unwilling to pass over, without a full examination, any part of the evidence that has been relied upon.

Mr. Bazett, his partner, with whom he was intimate, and whom he met so frequently, yet says that "the deponent never conversed with the deceased on the contents of his will in any respect as regarded the disposition of his property: the deponent spoke to him about leaving a will of some sort, and as desirous that he should leave executors to settle his affairs with the deponent's house: the deceased told him not to be anxious; 'There is a will'—pointing to some place where it was deposited—and he said, 'Our friend David and a Dr. Fleming are executors.' To particular times the witness cannot depose, excepting it was at the deceased's house in the New Road, where he lived from 1823."

Here there was a manifest object, detracting much from the sincerity of the declaration. Be-[350]-sides, if paper "A" contained a correct representation of what remained in the Indian will, the appointment of Dr. Fleming as executor was revoked, and that of David Colvin also, by the codicil which the deceased had destroyed.

Mr. Bazett says, on a further article, "that he did not know during the deceased's lifetime that he had a will in India: the deceased did not mention that; but he told the deponent that he had a will, and this more than once after he had gone into his house in the New Road. His reason for naming the subject of his will to the deceased was from an anxiety that he should have executors, and he had some misgivings in his mind, from what he had heard Mr. Colvin say about it, that there might be a question as to whether the validity of the will received from India was affected by any alterations he might have made in it: and, further, deponent knowing the great changes his property had undergone, was desirous he should make a will adapted to meet such changes: but the reason deponent put forward to the deceased was the promise which the deceased had given him, that he would leave a will appointing executors." At least, then, Mr. Bazett's impression was, at this time, an impression derived partly from conversations with his partner, Colvin, that at the periods of which he has deposed the deceased had no existing will containing an appointment of executors.

Hence, it is clear, the will in India was never mentioned: the deceased had either forgotten that he had any duplicate made, or he supposed the whole was sent over in 1816. Mr. Colvin also was equally ignorant respecting the will in [351] India; he had his misgivings that the will in the deceased's possession was so altered as to be inoperative; and well he might; for, according to Mr. Colvin's own paper A, the executors in the Indian will had been revoked. It is obvious that these persons were urging the deceased to make a will, and that, when he said "there is a will, and there are executors appointed," he was evading their attacks; for in 1823 or 1824 his talking of having a will, when between 400,000l. and 500,000l. were vested in real property, could hardly by possibility be sincere, as in allusion to his Indian will.

The next witness is Mr. Drake, and to him the same observations apply: he states:—

"On the 6th of February, 1823 (deponent has referred to his books), he saw the deceased at his house, not in the New Road: he found him in a room at the very top of the house where he usually sat." This interview, then, was, I think, in his house in Gloucester Place, where the deceased sat in a room at the top of his house. "After their business was over, and just as deponent was coming away, he told the deceased there was one subject on which he wished to speak to him: viz. 'that having often troubled him on the subject of his will, he had determined not to mention it again, but that the purchase of Fonthill made so great a change in the nature of his property that deponent felt it his duty again to remind him that freehold property would not pass by a will made previous to the purchase.' The deceased said, 'Mr. Drake, I have a will in a drawer in one of these cabinets,' holding out his arm to a range of cabinets; 'Dr. [352] Fleming and David Colvin are executors.' The deponent told him 'that what he wished him to bear in mind was, that such will would not avail for the real property subsequently purchased, and which would, therefore, go to his heir at law.' The deceased said 'he intended to sell it again:' deponent suggested that 'in the event of death it would be proper to have a will which would pass that estate.' Deceased replied, 'he would think of it, or attend to it another time;' and deponent left him."

Such is the mode by which the deceased attempted to evade the subject: his saying "that he had executors" was no answer to Mr. Drake, though it was to his own partner; and when Mr. Drake pressed him further, he said "he would think of it;" he did not produce any will: he did not enter into the subject, or into any particulars, relating to that will, with his confidential solicitor; but he parried him at last by saying "he would think of it."

The next witness is Mr. Joseph Hume; and the declarations to that gentleman are still more exposed to the suspicion of insincerity. The parties had a slight acquaintance in India: in February, 1825, they met accidentally at Mr. Fairlie's funeral; Mr. Hume began the subject, by telling the deceased "that he intended to call on him respecting a plan for rebuilding the Marischal College at Aberdeen, that it was to cost 22,000l., one-third of which it was proposed to raise by subscription." Mr. Hume developed his plan to the deceased, and states "that he solicited his assistance." Here was a subscription solicited—the deceased approved his [353] plans; but said "he had other improvements in view by his will, and if he would call upon him he would shew him its provisions." Mr. Hume had begun by saying he intended to call upon him. Mr. Hume did call; carried his plans, and proposed that the deceased should rebuild the college at his own expence, without applying to government for assistance. A discussion then ensued on the various points: the deceased said "there was one objection; there was one part of the statutes which provided for the performance of particular religious duties:" and, after discussing the various points at considerable length, the conversation was interrupted by some person coming in, and the interview ended. It ended therefore without obtaining a subscription, or a sight of the will.

Now a considerable suspicion arises that the deceased was insincere in the whole of these declarations; that he only asserted the existence of the will, and talked of the improvement of the professorships, in order to evade the subscription and the rebuilding of the Marischal College. Here were the fact and the deceased's conduct; the will was not produced.

Mr. Hume paid him a visit for another purpose—to solicit a subscription for the London University, the deceased being supposed, and professing himself to be, a great friend to education in general. Mr. Hume now proposed various offers—that the deceased should take a hundred shares—that a professorship should be established which would perpetuate his name: the difficulty which had occurred respecting Aberdeen, of "the statutes requiring a particular form of religious worship" was here re-[354]-moved, by stating that "the absence of religious tests" was a part of the plan. The only obstacle, the witness says, suggested by the deceased was, "that it might interfere with the objects he had in view to promote at Aberdeen:" and though Mr. Hume was afterwards supported by two other gentlemen, as a deputation, from the London University, the deceased fenced and parried and defeated all three; for instead of one hundred shares he finally decided to take four; that is four per cent. Here then is strong reason to suspect that the objects at Aberdeen were only hinted at (for there was no reference to the will upon this occasion) as an excuse for avoiding a larger subscription to the London University.

Ann Rogers, the maid servant, proves at once how little the sincerity of the deceased was to be relied upon: for she deposes to the deceased having told her that he had provided for her: "The deceased never told deponent he had a will; though he told her at Fonthill he had left her enough to keep her: she had heard him say that he had a will; when quarrelling with his nephew Mr. George Mortimer, the deceased told him very significantly he had a will: on some occasion or other she heard him speak of three wills, and say he had three."

Either then the deceased had no regard to truth, or the witness was mistaken; for there is no suggestion, nor probability of any other than the Indian will and the will of October, 1821; nor consequently of any provision for this witness.

Mr. Robert Hume merely deposes to the deceased having told him what had passed between him and Phillips: "the deceased was speak-[355]-ing in reprobation of the conduct of Harry Phillips, and he more particularly mentioned Mr. Phillips having had the impertinence to interfere on the subject of the disposal of his property by will; but that he did not want his assistance—he had two wills: whether the deceased said he had two wills at the time he was speaking, or that he had two wills at the time Mr. Phillips was speaking to him, the deponent is not sure, but he believes the former; for he thinks the deceased said 'I have two wills'—this passed either in the spring of 1825 or of 1826."

This witness, with a very proper caution, does not attempt either to fix the precise words, or the time: his difficulty and hesitation shew with how much reserve exact words are to be relied upon, and how uncertainly time is fixed by mere memory unaccompanied by some circumstance enabling a witness to mark it.

The only remaining declarations are those to the Phillips': without entering into any consideration of the degree of credit to which those witnesses are entitled, but, assuming that the declarations are correctly related, to what do they amount? It is clear that they were not confidentially made. The meeting to which Harry Phillips deposes was not of that character; for it appears that the deceased went to him for the purpose of endeavouring to make some arrangement about his suit in Chancery. He thus states: "They talked over the bill in Chancery; the deceased said, 'We will have no more lawyers, you and I can settle every thing.' They talked over the Fonthill property, the estate purchased of Mr. Be-[356]-nett, the East Mark estate, and the situation of his property generally. . . . While talking over his affairs the deponent again mentioned the subject of his will, telling him, as he had often done before, 'that if he did not make a will the estates would go to his heir at law:' He said, 'He had no heir at law:' the deponent told him, 'He certainly must have one, and represented to him what a pity it would be to let his property get into the hands of the lawyers.' The deceased said, 'Why, I have two wills—I have told you so a hundred times.' He, deponent, said no more about it: and they talked about various other matters till they parted."

The sincerity of the deceased during any part of this conversation is, I think, extremely questionable.

In respect to what Miss Jane Phillips says about two wills, one in England, the other in India, as she is the only witness that supports the allegation in that particular, or ever heard the deceased mention that he had a will remaining in India, she must, I think, as I have already remarked, have misapprehended what passed.

If the case rested here, the evidence of these declarations would in my opinion be insufficient to repel the presumption of law that the deceased himself had destroyed the Indian will; for there is nothing in his conduct to render it improbable. After his inquiries in 1816 he took no steps to give it effect; after 1822 he was repeatedly pressed to make a will and the necessity of it was pointed out to him: but he [357] did nothing of a testamentary kind—he evaded the questions and advice by saying, "I have made two wills"—"I have a will there"—pointing to the cabinet—"in which Dr. Fleming and Mr. Colvin are executors;" a will which, even if existing at that time, would not answer the purpose, and of this he was well aware: so that his conduct and these evasive answers are quite consistent with his having destroyed this will, and with his being aware that he was in a state of intestacy, and even with an intention either from spleen or from indolence of dying intestate.

But if the Court is to look to the facts and circumstances of a tendency not consistent with the existence of this Indian will, how does the case stand? It is true that a presumption of law does not require to be supported by evidence; but when the evidence offered to repel the presumption is itself met and rebutted by stronger evidence inclining to support the presumption, the conclusion of fact becomes more decisive and satisfactory.

In this case the legal presumption is confirmed: first, by the general probability already adverted to: secondly, by Mr. Farquhar's conduct in respect to his property: thirdly, by his conduct in respect to his relations, particularly towards Mr. George Mortimer: and, lastly, by declarations in strict unison with, and supported by, these previous circumstances.

It is unnecessary again to go over the general ground of probability that a person situated as the deceased was in India, forming these sort of notions about applying his great acquisitions to some scheme of general utility in his native [358] country, and who, even in India, by his correspondence with Mr. Wilson, shewed he was not wanting in the feelings of nature towards his relations, should upon his return—associating with his family and their rising offspring—satisfied with the attentions and conduct of several of them, mixing in the general society of this country, engaging in the other great concerns of life and in the employment of his capital—at length find out that devoting his whole fortune to such an undertaking, and in exclusion of his near and dear connexions, was a plan to be much altered and mitigated if not entirely laid aside; and should at an advanced period of life, and after inquiries upon the subject, discover that his scheme would require much modification, and therefore, though he might sometimes talk of it, should never set about it.

But how greatly is the probability of his departure from the Indian will increased, when his conduct in respect to his property alone is considered; he was aware of the statutes of mortmain, he was aware that landed property purchased after the making of a will would not pass under it; yet he bought real estates; he bought East Mark and other property; and in 1821, conscious that these estates would not pass under his Indian will, he disposed of them by a testamentary instrument; he afterwards destroyed that instrument; not from disaffection to the devisee of the East Mark estate, but in resentment against Colvin, knowing that his real estate would devolve upon his supposed heir at law, whom he had never seen, and at that time described as "a vagabond in America." He afterwards purchased estates to an immense amount: [359] for Fonthill he gave 300,000l.; for Mr. Benett's property 100,000l.: he took assignments of mortgages, lent 100,000l. on mortgage, that sum was paid off, but he offered to leave it at the same interest, and again lent 20,000l. on mortgage; he well knew that none of this would pass under his Indian will: he was an extremely acute, clever man, though fanciful, capricious, irritable, and passionate: yet, aware that this Indian will could not operate, and urged and pressed to make a will, no new will was made—no testamentary act was done. Such was his conduct in respect to his property: true, he might not wish his heir at law to have it, but he seems latterly to have considered its value only as it contributed to his amusement in the management of it—in buying, selling, and speculating—reckless of what became of it afterwards. His conduct then in respect to his property would lead to a high probability that he had abandoned his Indian will, and would either make a new will or die intestate.

If this is followed up by considering his behaviour to his relations after his return to England, the probability of his destroying the Indian will is still further increased. Lady De La Pole, an orphan niece, whom he had educated, brought up, and in some degree provided for by this will, received him in her house at his arrival: he stayed with her and her husband a whole year; was godfather to one of her children; and continued his intercourse with her. Lady De La Pole and her family left London in 1819, and retired into Devonshire: and Miller on the sixteenth article says, "That when the family were about leaving London, the deceased [360] took leave of Lady De La Pole most kindly; he was quite affected at parting. The deponent knows that the deceased and Lady De La Pole corresponded by letter." In 1823 Sir William De La Pole proposed to pay a visit at Fonthill; and Mr. Farquhar wrote an easy and civil answer in return that he should be happy to see him. He talked also of visiting them in Devonshire: for Mr. Alderman Wood says, "The deceased, shortly before his death, told the deponent of his intention to go into Devonshire to see Lady De La Pole, a promise long made, as he said, and which he should certainly perform." Is it possible then that he could mean to exclude this niece entirely? for even the pittance given her in the Indian will was taken away in 1821.

Mr. Fraser, whom he had also educated, the only son of a deceased sister, though he had irritated his uncle in 1817, not by immoral conduct, nor by inattention to his professional pursuits, but by an independence of mind, not dishonourable to him, though offensive to the deceased, and such as induced the deceased to withdraw his allowance; yet Mr. Fraser was afterwards treated with kindness by his uncle; was received at his house; was met by him in society without any appearance of distance and resentment; he visited at Fonthill for several days together, and was an hour with him at his house in town on the very day before his death; it is not probable that the deceased would allow a will to stand that would cut off even Mr. Fraser without a farthing out of his great property.

But the deceased's conduct towards the Mor-[361]-timers, particularly towards Mr. George Mortimer, is irreconcileable with the supposition of the existence and intended operation of the Indian will: he not only devised the East Mark estate to him in October, 1821, but his whole conduct to him from that time to his death was that of increasing confidence and kindness: he and his family were inmates in the deceased's houses; the care and management of the Fonthill estate were intrusted to him; the deceased assisted him in his manufactory with an almost unlimited credit; he made large advances of money to him, and engaged him in erecting a manufactory on the Fonthill property; and yet if this will was intended to be adhered to, not only would the real estate devolve under the mortmain acts, even East Mark and all—not only would Mr. George Mortimer be excluded from the personalty by this will (for whether any of the mortgages would devolve upon the next of kin could hardly be in the deceased's contemplation), but Mr. George Mortimer would be a debtor to the estate for all the monies advanced to him. The adherence, on the part of the deceased, to a testamentary disposition producing these effects is not more improbable than it would be unjust, and is utterly at variance with the treatment this particular relation experienced from the deceased in all the latter years of his life.

With these foundations of probability—built on the treatment of his property and of his relations—that the deceased should have de-[362]-stroyed the old will, how stand his declarations? Declarations coupled with conduct and with acts, and consistent with them, are of weight in proof of intention: declarations also, not depending upon the precise words of a particular expression, but connected with extended conversation, and more especially if not liable to much suspicion of insincerity, have greater effect; but even still more when made, not upon a single occasion, but repeatedly in the course and current of confidential communications: such declarations are entitled to full attention.

Here is the declaration in 1822 to Mr. Hart Davis, naturally connected with what was the subject of conversation—not easily liable to any misapprehension, nor exposed to the suspicion of being insincere: "In the course of conversation the deceased talked to deponent about his property, and told him of the investment he had made in the house of Whitbread and Co., which, he said, 'had paid him well.' And having gone into several particulars respecting his affairs;" which shewed the deceased was in a communicative mood; "the deponent observed to him 'that it was very extraordinary the world generally supposed that he had made no will, and that with his immense property it could not be so.' The deceased replied 'that he had made wills,' or 'had had wills.' The deponent said, 'It did not matter what he had had, but what he then had.'" So that there could be no doubt as to the substance of this conversation. The deceased replied, "Oh! the law will make the best will, or a very good will for me." And as this conversation passed after the codicil of [363] October, 1821, was destroyed, and before the purchase of the Fonthill estate, the great bulk of his real property, if the Indian will were destroyed, would at that time have been distributable among his relations. "The deponent added; 'Yes, but at a pretty considerable expence.' What then passed was to that effect."

Now, whether this declaration was sincere or not as to "the law making the best will for him," he certainly was intestate as to his real property in 1822; there seems not much reason to question its sincerity as to his having at that time no will, and being in a state of total intestacy, even though he might intend to make a will if he could persuade himself to set about it: he does not deny the fact that he is without a will; but excuses it.

The declarations to Mr. Alderman Wood are still more distinct and decisive: they are, if believed (and there is not the least ground to disbelieve them), quite direct to the very point at issue. "He first knew the deceased soon after his arrival: the deceased dined with him frequently; he was in some degree in his confidence; the deceased consulted him on the affairs of the brewery, and shewed deponent the account of the profits."

"Early in 1825 the deceased spoke to deponent several times on the subject of his affairs; the general tenor of his conversation and declarations was the same; in fact, he repeated what he said again and again: deponent certainly did not introduce the subject to him; he thinks it was in some way or other through Dr. Fleming having expressed great anxiety that the deceased should make a will;" [364] so that Dr. Fleming was of opinion the deceased had no will. "The deceased said 'it was not material that he should make a will, for his property would be divided among his relations, and that he wished it to go as the law would dispose of it; the law would make a very good will for him.' . . . The deceased spoke of his heir at law as his great nephew, who was living at Charleston." It is clear, therefore, that he had been making some inquiries for his heir at law. "That he had never seen him, and knew nothing of him, and that he scarcely knew his brother from whom his heir at law sprung; that they had gone to different colleges, and had left home very early, one for America and the other for India." And this history is confirmed by the letters to Mr. George Wilson. "In speaking of his testamentary intentions he told the deponent that it had been at one time his intention to establish a sort of Unitarian College, but that he had found some difficulties in the way, and had abandoned the idea:" which corresponds with what passed between the deceased and Mr. Joseph Hume as to the particular forms of religion required by the Aberdeen statutes: "That he had then made a will in India, bequeathing his property to the schools in Scotland, but that when he made that will he was entirely unacquainted with his family:" and in his letter to Mr. Wilson, when he mentions that his friends disapproved of his education plan, the deceased says "he had never seen his family," "and that being a friend to education and not knowing his relations, he then thought it the best mode of disposing of his property: [365] but that since he came to England and had become acquainted with his family, he had considered it right to destroy that will, and that he had destroyed it." Here is an express declaration of the fact: "but he did not enter into any particulars as to the circumstances, or the time when he did so; the deceased, however, distinctly said that he had destroyed that will, and that he had then no will." (a)

He says further: "The deponent spoke to the deceased very freely, urging him, in

---

(a) At this part of Mr. Alderman Wood's evidence are the following passages: in the last sentence is the declaration referred to supra, p. 303 :—

"In speaking on the subject of education, and of the will he had made in India, Mr. Farquhar said 'that it was not the kind of will which he should then make or allow to stand, even if he had not destroyed it for other reasons, because it was inapplicable to the then state of his property.' The deponent believes that the deceased spoke of having made more than one copy of that will, and that he had left one in India, as it was customary for persons to do when coming to England."

consideration of the peculiar circumstances of his property, its magnitude and nature, and the difficulties that might arise out of it, and his declared intention of favoring his relations, that he should make a will, and after some hesitation he said, 'I believe you are right,' and added, 'that he would make one.' Conversations to the effect now deposed of were repeated, and, after the deceased had once said 'that he would make a will,' he never allowed the deponent to leave him without an assurance that he would do so."

Here, then, are declarations deposed to by a witness of unimpeached credit, not depending upon the precise words of a single declaration, [366] nor on any transient impression; but the general tenor of the deceased's conversation repeated again and again, "that his property would go among his relations, and he wished it to go as the law would dispose of it." In this respect he might possibly speak with insincerity, and be merely excusing his own indolence or indecision as to the disposal of his property: but in relating past conduct there is less reason to suspect his truth and sincerity, because established facts concur with the declarations, and corroborate a great part of what he discloses; when, however, he said that "he had made a will, and being a friend to education, and then entirely unacquainted with his family, he at that time thought it the best mode of disposing of his property, but that since he had come to England and had become acquainted with his family, he had considered it right to destroy that will, and had destroyed it;" this was a declaration clear, distinct, and direct to the very point at issue, and quite consistent with the whole of his conduct, with the res gesta, and with all rational probability.

Upon the whole view, then, of this important case, and after all the consideration to which it is entitled, my opinion is clear and without any doubt resting in my mind. Here was a will executed in India in 1814, just before the deceased finally left that country without any intention of returning there—it was executed in duplicate; one part remained there till after the testator's death, the other part is admitted to have been in the deceased's own custody and possession in England; it was never seen after [367] the year 1822; on the deceased's death in 1826 a careful search was made and no will found: the presumptions of law are—first, that the duplicate in his own possession was destroyed by the deceased himself; secondly, that, by destroying the duplicate, he intended the revocation of the other duplicate not in his own possession: to negative these presumptions the burthen of proof lies upon the executors setting up the duplicate; the evidence adduced for that purpose appears to my judgment quite insufficient to repel the legal presumptions.

On the other hand, the legal presumptions are strongly supported by the probability of the fact that the deceased himself would destroy and revoke this will by his conduct in regard to his property, by his intercourse with and treatment of his family, and by his confidential declarations.

The Court must, therefore, pronounce against the will propounded, and that, so far as appears, the deceased is dead intestate.

In respect to costs, I think that I cannot upon principle decree them to be paid out of the estate. The administration had gone out, and was in part acted upon, even by Mr. Colvin himself. When an administration is so called in, an executor proceeds at his peril, certainly at his own risk: here are many facts pleaded which are not precisely proved; here are charges insinuated of a very serious colour, which are not supported by facts; here are great expences occasioned, and great suspence and anxiety at all events excited in the relations: it would be contrary to principle to allow, under such cir-[368]-cumstances, the executor's costs out of the estate. If the executor had made fair inquiry, he must have been satisfied that this will had been destroyed by the deceased himself; indeed, according to the evidence, such were his own impression and belief. Being satisfied of that fact, he could not have been misled as to the law—that the duplicate in India was revoked. He was, then, under no obligation to bring the case before the Court.

With regard to the parties cited to see proceedings, they need not have appeared at all; and it would be a dangerous precedent if, when an executor—the person intrusted by the testator to see his will executed—is before the Court, legatees are to interpose and have their costs out of the estate.

I must, therefore, leave these several parties to the consideration of the next of kin. The Court, having no right to indulge its liberality in disposing of their property, because it happens to be of great amount, would not be justified in decreeing that the costs should be made a charge upon the estate, unless the sound principles of public justice require it. In the present case the Court makes no order respecting costs.

[369] GOODALL AND GRAY v. WHITMORE AND FENN. Consistory Court of London, Michaelmas Term, 4th Session, 1828.—In a suit for subtraction of church-rate the Court will not, at the prayer of the defendants, issue a monition for the production of parish books, which are not shewn to apply immediately to the question at issue: and on the merits, the rate being pronounced for, the defendants condemned in costs.—In questions of subtraction of church-rate the Court having jurisdiction on the subject-matter is bound, unless stopped by a prohibition, to proceed to the trial of a select vestry by which the rate was made. —Costs, though in the discretion of the Court, are in its legal discretion guided by former precedents, and are almost universally decreed in suits for church-rates, where the rate is pronounced to be subtracted.

This was a cause of subtraction of church-rate, promoted by the churchwardens of the parish of St. Martin in the Fields against two parishioners and inhabitants of the same parish.

In Michaelmas Term, 1824, the libel was admitted without opposition: it pleaded the refusal of the defendants to pay a church-rate, to which they had been legally assessed by the select vestry. To this libel the defendants gave in their personal answers; and on their behalf, in Easter Term, 1825, an allegation (denying the legality of the select vestry) was brought in: the admission of which stood over till Trinity Term, 1828, when, on the fourth session, it was admitted.(a) Upon this allegation answers were [370] not called for, nor was a single witness produced.

Dodson and Addams for the defendants. It would be useless to discuss the principal merits: the expectation of establishing a defence, by cross-examining the most important witnesses on the libel, has failed; the Court being of opinion that we had debarred ourselves in point of time from administering interrogatories. The order for the production of the parish books being confined to this precise rate, has defeated the object of applying for them: viz. to shew, from the books generally, that the select vestry had no good nor legal foundation. We again apply for their production, and that this case may not be decided without our being allowed to inspect them. If however the Court should now proceed to give sentence, we submit that, under these circumstances, the defendants ought not to be condemned in costs: they are individuals contending against the [371] officers of a parish in possession of large funds.

The King's advocate and Phillimore contrà. Goodall and Gray are not the present churchwardens: they have proved their case, and are entitled to costs; and no sufficient ground has been stated to take this case out of the general rule. The defendants were bound to pay the rate; and the parish is not to incur the expence of enforcing it. The legality of the select vestry had been established by a jury; and these defendants were parties to the suit.

(a) In this allegation the illegality of the rate was pleaded, "by reason that it was made by a number of persons falsely styling themselves and pretending to be a set or select vestry; that there was not any lawful select vestry established either by act of parliament, immemorial usage, or prescription within the parish; and that the persons who attempted to make the rate had unduly and illegally assumed to themselves the authority of a select vestry." The admission of this allegation was directed to stand over under the following circumstances:—

Previous to the institution of this suit the defendant, Fenn, had cited the present and past churchwardens of St. Martin's parish to bring into the registry of the Consistory Court an account of their receipts and disbursements, as churchwardens for the years 1820, 1821, and 1822: an appearance was given for the churchwardens under protest, upon the ground that the accounts had been audited, allowed, and passed by the vestry (being a select vestry) of the parish: the legality of this vestry was, on the other hand, denied; a prohibition was then applied for by the churchwardens, upon which the proceedings in the Consistory Court were stayed, and, in Easter Term, 1828, finally stopped by the rule for a prohibition being made absolute, in consequence of a verdict having established that the select vestry was legally constituted. See Golding v. Fenn, 7 B. & C. 765.

Judgment—Dr. Lushington. This suit was instituted in Michaelmas Term, 1823, by the then churchwardens of St. Martin in the Fields against two inhabitants of that parish for the payment of church-rate. A libel, in the usual form, was admitted; and the cause then stood over for a very considerable period, in consequence of a prohibition having been obtained in another suit that had been brought in this Court upon the same question as was likely to arise in this proceeding, viz. whether the vestry of the parish of St. Martin in the Fields was a legally constituted select vestry: the jury found in the affirmative, and the prohibition having thereby become final, that cause was disposed of. An allegation on the part of the defendants was then offered in the present suit: the admission of that defensive plea was opposed, partly on the ground of the verdict in [372] the other suit having, as alleged, settled the question: but the Court was of opinion that it could not refuse to proceed with the cause; and therefore admitted the allegation, except as to that portion of the first article which set forth the misappropriation of former rates.

The defensive allegation, thus reformed, may be comprised in a few words: it pleaded, first, that the select vestry was not legally constituted; secondly, that no repairs were necessary: and in supply of proof two exhibits were annexed; (a)[1] but no answers have been given to, nor evidence taken upon, this allegation: the case of the defendants, then, rests wholly upon averment. If, however, the plea had been instructed with proof, this Court must have gone on to a decision, notwithstanding the prohibition in the former suit, to which I have adverted. For, in questions of church-rate, the Court has unquestionably jurisdiction: and the prohibition being granted in another suit, propter defectum triationis only, upon an incidental point, would not justify the Court in declining to take cognizance of all questions arising in this suit. It would be analogous to a tithe cause in which a modus was alleged, but where, in the particular suit, no prohibition had issued: so here, if the defendants had gone into evidence, nothing but a prohibition in this suit would have authorized the Court to refrain from entering into the merits of the question.

[373] The witnesses on the libel were examined in the long vacation: on the first session of this term an application for their re-production, in order to administer interrogatories, was rejected by the Court. (a)[2]

On the third session, after publication had passed, the cause having, on the preceding session, been concluded at the petition of both proctors, the application was renewed, and again rejected. It is too late now to discuss the reasons on which the Court came to that decision; but it is sufficient to state that if those motions had not been rejected, the Court would have departed from its ordinary rules, and introduced a laxity of practice very injurious to suitors. The Court is now asked to direct the parish books collectively to be brought in, so that the churchwardens may specify the entries on which they intend to rely: on the last session a similar application was so far acceded to that the production of those books, connected with the rate pleaded in the libel, was ordered: but it is now urged that the books from a very early period should be produced for inspection, in order that the parties [374] may, from their contents, make out their defence; that defence being—the non-existence in this parish of a select vestry legally constituted.

I conceive, for many reasons, it is impossible to grant this application. If the inspection of these books is necessary, the proper way is to apply to the Court of King's Bench for an order to inspect—an order always granted when conformable to law. And if such an order had been made, this Court would feel no hesitation in shaping its proceedings so as to give full effect to such an order. But there is another difficulty. Here is no averment in the allegation, no statement by counsel, that the inspection of these books would effectually avail the defendants. I should, then, greatly exceed my duty if, merely for an experimental investigation, I were to direct all the parish books to be attended with in this case. The question whether this select vestry be legal or not, does not come before me in a shape to enable me to give any opinion upon it. If such a question had been duly submitted to my consideration, I should have endeavoured to have arrived at a just conclusion; remembering, on the one hand, that a select vestry, being in derogation of the common rights of parishioners, can only be sustained by immemorial custom or by act of parliament; and on the other hand, that established custom is not lightly to be disturbed.

---

(a)[1] Viz. a copy of two faculties for the appointment and regulation of a select vestry in St. Martin's parish: the first dated 28th June, 1662; the other, October, 1673.

(a)[2] Five witnesses were examined on the libel, viz. on the 31st of October, 1828, Mr. Fynmore, the vestry clerk of the parish; on the 1st of November, Mr. Jennings, a clerk in his office; on the 3rd of November, Mr. Cobbett, a parishioner, who had served the office of churchwarden: on the 7th of November, Mr. Stutely, surveyor of pavements in the parish, an office he had held for twenty-two years, but who was not a vestry-man; and on the 8th of November, Mr. Robert Nixon, an inhabitant of St. Martin's, but who held no office in the parish. To the two last witnesses interrogatories had been addressed.

On the merits of the principal cause it is now admitted the suit cannot be defended: but it is said that, in respect to the costs, the Court may exercise a discretion: and that is true as a general principle, but the expression must not be [375] understood to mean that it is in the power of the Court to give or withhold costs as it pleases: but it means that costs are in the legal discretion of the Court, adhering to general rules and former precedents. Now, it is almost the universal rule to accompany with costs a sentence in favour of churchwardens in a suit for subtraction of church-rate. Are there, then, any circumstances justifiably to induce me to deviate from that rule? The Court cannot proceed on the suggestion that the suit is against private individuals; so it is in all suits of this description; and if such were a true principle, it would amount to this, that costs should never be given in cases of church-rate; which would be contrary to the practice of these Courts, sanctioned and confirmed by the superior Court.

There is, then, in my opinion, no circumstance demanding a departure from the general rule; but, on the other hand, there was sufficient to have induced the defendants to have stopped the suit in last Trinity Term, if they had not intended to bring the real question, viz. the legality of the constitution of the vestry, before the Court. The trial of that question, certainly, would have been attended with considerable risks, remembering that it had been decided upon by a jury. Under these circumstances I pronounce for the rate, and condemn the defendants in costs.

[376] HARRIS v. HARRIS. Consistory Court of London, Hilary Term, February 23rd, 1829.—The wife having failed in a charge of adultery, and a recriminatory plea on the husband's part being proved; cruelty, and the introduction of his wife to a female of loose character (the wife's guilt not being connected with such introduction), form no bar to his prayer for divorce.—Where the wife is charged with adultery, her conduct and declarations, on a confession of guilt by the alleged particeps criminis being communicated to her, are admissible evidence on behalf of the husband.

[Affirmed, p. 511, post. Referred to, Dillon v. Dillon, 1841, 3 Curt. 93; Otway v. Otway, 1888, 13 P. D. 149; Hodgson v. Hodgson, [1905] P. 240.]

This suit commenced by a citation on the part of the wife, who charged the husband with adultery: the libel, consisting of twelve articles and an exhibit, having been debated and admitted; an allegation of twenty-six articles, with six exhibits annexed, was admitted, on behalf of the husband. This allegation contradicted and denied the principal averments of the libel, accused the wife of adultery, and concluded with a prayer for a divorce. A responsive allegation was then admitted, which, among other things, pleaded "that Captain Harris soon after his marriage neglected and exposed his wife to improper and unbecoming situations, and to the influence of pernicious society; and that, regardless of her honor and character, he caused her to visit and associate with persons of a character and description altogether improper for her society, and by various means promoted an intimacy between them." In a further allegation, admitted on the part of Captain Harris, these averments were expressly denied.

These several allegations were admitted without opposition; and, on the evidence taken upon them and upon the libel, the cause came on for hearing.

Phillimore and Addams for the wife.

The King's advocate and Dodson contrà.

[377] Judgment—Dr. Lushington. This is a suit for a divorce by reason of adultery. The parties in the cause are Anna Maria Harris and Captain George Harris of the Royal Navy; they were married on the 29th November, 1821, and the issue of this marriage has been two children, both of whom are now living. After the marriage the parties cohabited at different places, and particularly at a cottage situated on Fulmer Heath, in Middlesex.

In the spring of the year 1823 Captain Harris was appointed to the command of the "Hussar" frigate, and in January, 1824, proceeded to the West Indies: he remained on that station until the month of July, 1826, when the "Hussar" was ordered home, and arrived at Portsmouth on the 13th of October in the same year. The cohabitation between these parties was then renewed, and continued at various places, particularly at a house taken by Captain Harris at Brompton, until the month of February, 1827, when Captain Harris deemed it necessary to abstain from cohabitation with his wife; who, on the 20th of March following, quitted the house of her husband and proceeded to join her parents in France, under circumstances to which I shall hereafter more particularly advert.

In June, 1827, Mrs. Harris instituted a suit for a separation by reason of her husband's adultery, as alleged in the libel given in on her behalf. In February, 1828, an allegation on the part of Captain Harris was admitted, in which he denied the charge of adultery imputed to him in the libel, recriminated on his wife, [378] and in conclusion prayed a separation. Mrs. Harris, in another allegation, then accused her husband with culpable inattention towards her, and that he had been wanting in a just regard to the preservation of her purity and of his own honour. And by means of interrogatory, but not by averment in plea, she has imputed to her husband unjustifiable severity.

It appears, therefore, that there are several distinct questions in the cause, and the Court will proceed to consider those questions nearly in the order in which they arise and have already been stated.

The first question is, as to the adultery alleged against Captain Harris, and the substance of the proof adduced in support of it. The first charge of adultery against Captain Harris is in relation to a Mrs. Waverly, in 1824, when he was in the command of the "Hussar" frigate, and stationed in the neighbourhood of Vera Cruz. The libel, indeed, contains a general charge—"that Captain Harris whilst in command of the 'Hussar' in the West Indies, and on the coast of America, when on shore at different places, formed an adulterous intercourse with divers strange women:" but the evidence, I think, is confined to the single charge of adultery with this person of the name of Waverly, or who seems to have passed by that name; for it is not very clear whether it was her real or only an assumed name.

It is established in evidence that this Mrs. Waverly was received on board the frigate some time in 1824; and that she did prove to be a woman of bad character is quite clear from the testimony of the surgeon, Mr. Galloway: it is [379] equally clear that if Captain Harris and this woman were so disposed, they must have had full and convenient opportunities, whilst this person was on board the "Hussar," to have committed adultery. From the disposition of the cabins, or, indeed, from any disposition of the cabins that could have been made, no one can doubt that there must have been ample facilities for the commission of such an offence. But then, before the Court can affix guilt on Captain Harris, it must be satisfied that there was something more than opportunity. There must be some overt acts or some circumstances to shew that he was disposed to avail himself of the opportunity to commit adultery, and that he actually did so.

Now, if there was the slightest proof of any indecent familiarity between the parties, or if the Court was in any way satisfied that undue intimacy subsisted between them, then the Court would travel much more easily to the conclusion that where the facilities were so great, and the opportunity of access so easy, the crime of adultery might have been committed: there is not the least proof, however, of any indecent familiarity nor improper intimacy between the parties, nor of any conduct approaching towards it, and I cannot come to the conclusion that they did commit the crime of adultery without disbelieving the evidence of Galloway, the surgeon, and Wilcocks, the clerk on board the frigate, who were examined to support the charge, but both of whom declare their disbelief in it; and Wilcocks, in particular, states it to be his strong and firm conviction that no improper intercourse was carried on between Cap-[380]-tain Harris and this Mrs. Waverly whilst she was on board the "Hussar." It further appears that this person was only on board the "Hussar" for a few days, and that she came with Mr. Hall, a merchant, who was in the ship at the same time, and who afterwards died there. Her passage to England, it would seem, was taken in a merchant vessel lying in the roads, and which was waiting for dispatches; and when that vessel was ready, Mrs. Waverly quitted the "Hussar." This is nearly the whole of the evidence in relation to the charge of adultery between Captain Harris and Mrs. Waverly, and the Court has no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that there has been a failure of proof as to this first charge.

The next charge has been truly represented as the most serious in the case, at least so far as regards Captain Harris. That charge is, that for a long series of time Captain Harris carried on a criminal intercourse with the wife of a gallant officer who commanded the Royal Engineers stationed at Barbadoes and the adjacent islands, when Captain Harris was stationed with the "Hussar" in the West Indies. It appears that Captain Harris became acquainted with this officer at Barbadoes on some occasion when the "Hussar" touched at that island, in the spring of the year 1825. The exact period when this acquaintance commenced is not, I think, very clearly stated; but in May, 1826, this officer being desirous of making, what the witnesses call, a tour of inspection to the Leeward Islands, in the fulfilment of his military duties, embarked on board the "Hussar," and was then accompanied by his wife. After visiting seve-[381]-ral of the Leeward Islands they returned to Barbadoes, in July, 1826; and the "Hussar" shortly after being about to proceed to Jamaica, and thence to England, Captain Harris offered the wife of this officer a passage on board his ship.

It is established in evidence that at this time the lady of this officer was suffering under ill health. As to what may have been the precise extent to which she was affected by illness is not by any means material: it is a point on which opinions might very naturally differ, and it is of no further importance in this proceeding than as it shews that this offer of a passage to England arose from that cause, and that her ill health was not stated as a pretence merely. I think it appears from the evidence of Galloway, the surgeon, that she was at this time suffering under dyspepsia and other complaints; and that upon a consultation taking place, she was recommended by her medical advisers to try the effect of a visit to England: and under these circumstances Captain Harris offered her a passage on board his vessel to England.

So far, the Court is of opinion that there was no imputation on any of the parties. There was no impropriety in such an offer having been made, nor in such an offer being accepted. There was no reason, as it appears to me, why the wife of a British officer should not accept of a passage on board a British man-of-war, and prefer the superior accommodation of a king's ship; and there was the less reason when she was an invalid, and when the commander of that ship was a married man and the friend of her husband. The most innocent and useful inter-[382]-course which takes place in society would be destroyed, and great and unnecessary inconvenience would arise, if it was held that a circumstance of this description conveyed any thing in the nature of an imputation on the character of a party. The Court is of opinion that the honour and character of this lady were, and ought to be, considered as safe at least in a vessel of war as in a private ship; and that she would there be protected, at least as effectually as if she had taken her passage home in a packet, or any other description of vessel.

It is true, however, that though this acceptance of her passage to England in Captain Harris' frigate may have originated in perfect innocence, yet the intercourse thus produced may have acquired an illicit and criminal character in its progress; and it therefore becomes the duty of the Court to scrutinize the facts and circumstances given in evidence, and to see whether evil might not have subsequently been engrafted on what was in itself innocent, and whether the consequences were such as have been suggested.

When the "Hussar" arrived at Jamaica her course was varied, and it was ordered that she should procced to Vera Cruz and thence to England, so that the voyage was necessarily prolonged. Now this was a misfortune in no degree attributable to either of the parties whose conduct the Court is now considering, and the circumstance did not, in my opinion, impose any obligation on the lady to quit the "Hussar." She was not called upon, because the voyage was altered and somewhat prolonged, to undergo the inconvenience of a change to another vessel, [383] and to waive the advantage of the superior accommodation of a king's ship. Even if she had evinced no desire, and if no attempt had been made, to procure a passage for her on board another vessel, I do not think there would have been any imputation resting on her upon that account:

but it is in evidence that she was much disappointed upon being informed that the "Hussar" was to proceed to Vera Cruz, and that her arrival in England would be postponed; that she was most anxious to avail herself of another opportunity of returning to this country, and that exertions were made to procure a passage for her in another vessel, but without success. Nothing whatever, therefore, prejudicial to the character of this lady can be inferred from the circumstance of her remaining on board the "Hussar" after the arrival of the ship at Jamaica, and the alteration which was directed to be made in the voyage to England.

What, then, are the circumstances during the voyage home, that are to lead the Court to the conclusion that adultery was committed by these parties when on board the frigate? The counsel for Mrs. Harris argued the case as if they thought that unless what occurred on board the vessel should take its complexion from subsequent circumstances the Court could not conclude that adultery was committed on board the vessel; but that subsequent circumstances gave such a complexion to those which had taken place on board the vessel that the Court must conclude that the adultery did occur there.

In support of this view of the case, it has been said that there was great facility of access, and I think it is so proved; but then this fa-[384]-cility of access was not purposely made; it is incidental to the state of a ship; and it is quite evident that on board a vessel, difficulty of access, even when desired, can seldom be effected. If it appeared, however, that any undue familiarity was observed between the parties, or that any improper attentions were paid by Captain Harris to this lady during the voyage to England, the Court would then find less difficulty in coming to the conclusion that, where access was so easy, the parties had availed themselves of the opportunities thus afforded. Upon looking to the evidence, however, the Court sees no one fact or circumstance which could justify it in drawing such a conclusion. The behaviour of the parties in public appears to have been perfectly proper and quite unexceptionable; for no circumstance is stated tending to throw the slightest suspicion on any part of their conduct during the voyage. It is impossible that, because it is in evidence that this lady was a pretty woman, or a vain woman, the Court should suppose that she was criminal, or that it should impute to Captain Harris, without further evidence, the crime that has been charged against him.

It appears that a female servant of the name of O'Brien, and a little black girl, were in the service of this lady, and accompanied her to England; and that for some time after the ship left Barbadoes they used to sleep at her cabin door. However, from the statement of the witnesses who have deposed to the fact, it seems that O'Brien and the black girl did not always sleep at their mistress' door; that their berths were removed for the purpose of accommodating [385] the Mexican Minister and his suite, who were on board. Any inference, therefore, which could be drawn from the circumstances of the servants changing their berths is explained away, the fact being thus satisfactorily accounted for: and there is no other occurrence during the voyage to which it is necessary the Court should advert.

The Court is therefore of opinion that there is no foundation for any suspicion that a criminal intercourse took place between this lady and Captain Harris on board the "Hussar;" and it has great satisfaction in arriving at this conclusion; for if otherwise, the Court would have deeply lamented that so distinguished an officer as Captain Harris, whilst on board his own vessel, should have so much forgotten what he owed to himself as well as the sacred duty imposed upon him of protecting the honour of his friend's wife. A lady so committing herself, and being so committed by her husband, as this lady was, to the care of Captain Harris, stood towards him in a relation nearly as close as a ward to a guardian; and any breach of this sacred trust or any violation of confidence on his part would deserve to be reprobated with more than ordinary severity. The Court has great satisfaction, therefore, in relieving Captain Harris from the imputation on his honour which was conveyed by this part of the charge.

The "Hussar" arrived at Portsmouth on the 13th of October, 1826, and nothing occurred at Portsmouth which could lead the Court to the conclusion that an improper intimacy was carried on between these parties. So far the Court is of opinion that this charge of adultery is wholly [386] unsupported. As to the circumstances alleged to have taken place at Portsmouth, and the attentions stated to have been paid by Captain Harris to this lady subsequent to her arrival in that port, and before he set out for London, the Court does not consider it necessary to enter upon them with any minuteness. As proof of a charge of adultery they amount to nothing, and the Court will therefore pass them over and proceed to the next branch of the case.

This lady came to London from Portsmouth on or about the 17th October, 1826, and was lodged in a house situated in the Regent's Circus. At those lodgings she was visited by Captain Harris. The Court cannot but feel that the previously existing state of things was now changed, and that the subsequent intercourse between these parties must be examined by different rules, and is subject to different considerations, from those which were applicable when this lady was a passenger on board Captain Harris' ship. She had now arrived in England, and there was no longer any occasion for the protection or services of Captain Harris: she had a father and mother who were living in or near London: and the intimacy which had necessarily subsisted previously between these parties was no longer called for by the situation in which they were now placed, or by the circumstances of the case. I think therefore that during the remainder of his intimacy with this lady the Court is bound to consider that Captain Harris was divested of his former character, and to apply different principles to his conduct.

The intercourse between these parties must now be judged of by the ordinary rules and [387] principles applied to the conduct of married persons on shore. That a considerable intimacy did continue to subsist, and to an extent which ought to awaken the vigilance of the Court, cannot, I think, be denied. It behoves the Court then, scrupulously to consider and to weigh all the facts, so as to ascertain, if possible, the true character of the intimacy between these parties; whether it was criminal or innocent; whether it was only carried on with heedlessness and a want of due caution, or whether it was carried on with any real intention of committing the crime of adultery.

The fact principally relied on is that Captain Harris slept one night at the before-mentioned lodgings whilst this lady occupied them. It is also in evidence that he slept on another occasion at a house in Sloane-street, to which this lady had removed; but the Court is at present confining itself to a consideration of what took place in the Regent's Circus. Much discussion has taken place as to the period when Captain Harris did sleep at these lodgings; but I think the only result which the Court can come to from the evidence is that Captain Harris did sleep there on a night in the latter end of the month of October, 1826. Whether he had an opportunity of sleeping at Mrs. Cary's house in Berkeley-street, on this occasion, does not very clearly appear; but the admitted circumstances are, that he slept on a sofa in the drawing-room, and that this lady slept up stairs on another floor; that the night was wet, and that Captain Harris went away very early in the morning. This is the amount of the evidence, and nothing further is proved in reference to [388] that night. If the Court were to conclude that adultery was committed on this occasion, it must infer it from the circumstances that I have just stated, for there are no others connected with this part of the transaction distinctly proved.

It has been argued, however, that Captain Harris slept at the lodgings in the Regent's Circus on two separate occasions; and if that fact had been proved in the case, even though it should have come out incidentally in the course of the evidence, and had not been pleaded, the Court would undoubtedly have considered it a circumstance replete with suspicion, and would perhaps have judged it right to afford an opportunity of counter-pleading it, even after publication, so as to give Captain Harris an opportunity of explaining it, if he was so disposed, or if the circumstance appeared to him to be capable of explanation. But it appears to be the result of the evidence on this point that there is no sufficient proof that Captain Harris slept at the lodgings in the Regent's Circus on any occasion but one.

The point arose on the evidence of Mrs. Pinker, a witness disposed to give her testimony with perfect fairness; but I think the Court cannot trust much to her memory, which appears to be exceeding loose as to facts. The circumstances to which she has been called upon to depose were not of such importance in her mind when they occurred as to enable her afterwards to give a detailed account of them, with all the precision which might be desired. I have no doubt, however, I repeat, that this witness meant to depose with perfect fairness.

[389] Before coming to a full determination, or rather a full expression of the opinion of the Court on the evidence as to what occurred at the lodgings in the Regent's Circus, I shall proceed to consider some subsequent circumstances which have been deposed to, as occurring after this lady removed to the lodgings in Sloane-street from the Regent's Circus.

On the 30th of November, 1826, this lady took possession of her lodgings in Sloane-street, and it appears that Captain Harris also slept there one night. The evidence is that on the evening she entered her new lodgings Captain Harris visited her; that he was engaged for some time in taking an inventory of the furniture; that the night was inclement, and that he remained there till morning. Now, I think it is admitted that at this period Captain Harris had an opportunity of sleeping at Berkeley-street if he had so chosen; that I think is in proof; and the Court undoubtedly cannot find for itself any strong reason why Captain Harris did not avail himself of that opportunity: it has great difficulty satisfactorily to account for the circumstance, or to explain, why Captain Harris did not proceed on this night to Fulham, or to Berkeley-street, to either of which the distance was not great. The mere fact of the night being bad, or the season being inclement, was not sufficient to have deterred an officer, like Captain Harris, from repairing to his home if he had been so disposed. The fact, however, is distinctly proved that Captain Harris slept at these lodgings on this night; and if the evidence of Mary Ann Payne is entitled to credit there is no doubt that the Court is bound to hold [390] the adultery as proved to have been committed on that occasion.

But there are many circumstances why the Court should not rely on what has been deposed to by this witness. Her testimony is improbable, and even incredible in many parts, on the face of it. The circumstances to which she deposes could not have occurred, even if the parties were ever so well disposed, in the manner she has stated. She has been contradicted also upon the most material facts by Anne O'Brien, and by the same witness and by Mrs. Aldridge upon other facts, and also by Miss Stewart. The contradictions are of such a nature that the Court cannot attribute the failure of truth, which appears in the testimony of Payne, to a mere accidental lapse of memory or to unintentional variation; but I must conclude that something remains behind, and that this witness was actuated by secret motives, which induced her to forge the tale. That there was something influencing her to state more than she knew or than she could truly state is, I think, clearly established. The Court is obliged to make an election between her and the other witnesses; for it is impossible that the Court could give credit to the testimony of Mary Ann Payne and of the other witnesses also; between these alternatives therefore I must decide, and I think I am bound to discredit her testimony rather than that of the other witnesses.

It cannot be necessary for the Court to travel through all the circumstances adverted to by counsel to prove in what instances the testimony of this witness varies from that of the [391] other witnesses, or in how many instances she has shewn herself to be undeserving of credit in this case, and to have deposed to what was not true: it is enough to say that the Court gives her no credit at all. But though the Court gives no credit to the testimony of Mary Ann Payne, yet the fact remains that on the night of the 30th of November Captain Harris slept in Sloane Street, in a room adjoining that occupied by this lady as a sleeping-room: and I think it is proved that he went to Berkeley Street early the next morning, in search of his dog.

There are one or two circumstances which the Court has considered with no small share of anxiety, as tending to throw a light on the conduct of these parties. And, first, it has looked with great attention to the evidence in support of the allegation, that these parties represented themselves as relations, or cousins, in either of the lodgings. If they had so represented themselves, I think it would be an important fact in the cause. Now the evidence is that Mrs. O'Brien did so represent the parties; this fact we have from several witnesses; but there is no evidence in the cause to shew that any such representation was ever made by either of the parties themselves, or that it was ever made at all with their knowledge or concurrence; and I think, in a question of extreme importance, it would be too much to presume that any such representation was made with their connivance, unless it was established by evidence nearly as clear as if the representation had come from the mouth of one or the other.

These then are the undisputed facts, and I [392] may say the only facts, on which the Court is called upon to conclude the adultery was committed: I mean the facts which are in proof—that on two occasions Captain Harris slept in the same house with this lady. There is not any improper familiarity proved, upon credible testimony, to have passed between them: there is no indelicacy, no one act demanding of the Court to conclude that adultery had been committed, or that the parties had availed themselves of those convenient opportunities from which the Court might infer that an adulterous intercourse was carried on between them.

Such being the state of the case, it is not unimportant to consider what would have been the natural conduct of this lady if (as is suggested) she had fallen a victim to the seduction of Captain Harris. It is reasonable, I apprehend, that in such an event she should have been desirous of availing herself of undisturbed opportunities, in which her guilty passion might be indulged. But does she do so? It appears to the Court that she did not; for soon after she commenced her residence in Sloane Street she took Miss Stewart, a young lady, who was seventeen years of age when examined, and who might have been about sixteen at the time I allude to, as her companion. Now, the very circumstance of taking a person of this age and in this situation into the house, which was not an extensive house, but only a lodging-house, must of itself have thrown frequent difficulties and obstacles in the way of any illicit intercourse: and not only this, but it must also have afforded a great probability of detection. Captain Harris then is fully entitled to the benefit of this [393] fact, and the impression of the Court is that it is irreconcileable with actual guilt.

There are other facts which tend to lead the mind of the Court to the same conclusion. Mrs. Harris, though well acquainted with this lady, clearly had no suspicion that she and her husband were actually carrying on an adulterous intercourse. Mrs. Cary, indeed, states that Mrs. Harris felt, or pretended to feel, some jealousy at the attentions which Captain Harris paid to the lady in question; but it is quite evident that Mrs. Harris herself kept up a constant acquaintance with her, and that she never thought, or never mentioned at least, that she suspected any impropriety between them. It appears further that when Mrs. Harris was confined to her bed-room and was in trouble, and wanted a confidante and friend, after her husband expressed his determination of separating from her unless she could explain her conduct, she sent for this very lady, and required her interposition with Captain Harris. Now it is not at all likely—it is scarcely possible, I think—that if Mrs. Harris entertained an idea that her husband and this lady were criminally connected that she would have chosen her to effect a reconciliation with Captain Harris. Another circumstance is that this lady's husband returned to this country in March, 1827, and it is quite clear that no suspicion had entered into his mind as to the conduct of his wife with Captain Harris, for he continues on terms of confidence and intimacy with him.

The alleged adultery between Captain Harris and this lady then, I think, is unproved by any other circumstances than the facts to which [394] I have already adverted, of Captain Harris sleeping in the same house, and the consequent opportunity afforded to the parties if they were disposed to avail themselves of it.

The Court does think that the character of a British naval officer goes some way to explain these facts. Persons on board ship are less accustomed to attend to their personal comfort and convenience—much less than persons who reside on shore—and, perhaps, naval men are less attentive to minute points of decorum. The evidence is that, at the lodgings in the Regent's Circus, Captain Harris had thrown himself on the sofa with as great a disregard for personal convenience as might well be conceived. It is possible, too, I think, that the idea of impropriety, where there is no improper feeling, might not enter into his mind so readily, under such circumstances, as it would be supposed to do into the mind of a person accustomed to a different mode of life. Persons who are accustomed to a sea life are used to the slightest accommodation, and the slightest separation in their sleeping-places; and as their feelings on those matters are somewhat different from persons living on shore, their conduct, in respect to them, should be judged of upon rather different principles. But, however innocent such conduct may have been, and innocent the Court believes it to have been, it cannot be deemed very prudent conduct on the part of Captain Harris. The Court, whilst it acquits him of the charge of criminality, cannot absolve him from the charge of indiscretion, by which he might have implicated the character of the wife of his friend, as well as have [395] endangered his own honour and his rights as a husband.

Being of opinion, then, that Mrs. Harris has failed in her proof on the charge of adultery against her husband, the Court must now proceed to consider her own conduct and behaviour, and, in doing so, it is only necessary that it should refer to what occurred at Portsmouth when Mrs. Harris visited that place in the month of September, 1826. There is a great deal of general levity of conduct and very gross behaviour on the part of Mrs. Harris; into the particulars of which it is not necessary that the Court should descend. The substantive charge is that an act of adultery was committed by her with Captain Latouche, on the 13th September, in Stanstead-wood, in the neighbourhood of Portsmouth. The most material witness in support of this charge is Mrs. Donald, and, supposing for a moment that the Court ought to give implicit credit to her testimony, I am bound to say that the facts to which she deposes, as having occurred on this excursion to Stanstead-wood, afford full and complete proof of the adultery charged against Mrs. Harris.

After stating the names of the persons of whom this party was composed, Mrs. Donald deposes as follows, on the eighteenth article:—"After breakfasting at an inn, near the woods, the party set out thither. Mrs. Harris evidently wished to remain behind, and did so. She was uneasy at not having Captain Latouche all to herself, as he sometimes walked with Miss Mottley. As the party neared the wood Mrs. Harris took deponent's arm, and [396] still hung behind, and at length proposed to deponent that they should hide away from the rest of the party. Deponent at first objected to it; but Mrs. Harris said 'she would not give a farthing for a party of that kind without some adventure in it;' and they then got over a bank into a private part of the wood, not open to the public, and out of sight from the rest of the party. While there, Mrs. Harris cried out 'whoop,' like a child at play, and sat herself down on the bank while deponent was gathering some nuts hard by. Mrs. Harris at length attracted Captain Latouche by her calling, and he got over the bank and sat down by her on it, deponent remaining behind. Deponent saw them both reclining on the bank, his arm round Mrs. Harris' waist, whispering together, and seeing it, she called to Mrs. Harris, saying, 'that she (deponent) was not going to stop there all day, and begged her to come away.' Mrs. Harris did not pay any attention to deponent, who proceeded over the bank again from the private wood towards the point where she expected to meet the rest of the party."

Now, surely, if any belief is to be given to the testimony of this witness, the Court really knows not what further proof it would have to convince it that a fact of adultery did occur on this occasion. Here the parties were left together, at the very moment when they are seen in the fact of an indecent familiarity, reclining on a bank, his arm round her waist, and whispering together. After they are thus left they have ample opportunity of committing an act of adultery if they were so disposed. Mrs. Har-[397]-ris is called upon by the witness to come away; she refuses to do so; she does not come; and the Court can arrive at no other conclusion but that the adultery had almost begun at the time that this witness quitted the scene.

But it is said that implicit credit ought not to be given to the evidence of Mrs. Donald, nor indeed to the evidence given by any of the parties, as to the manner in which Mrs. Harris conducted herself on this occasion. The Court is certainly of opinion that, as far as the observation applies to the testimony of Mrs. Mottley, Mrs. Mathews, and Mrs. Donald, it is bound not to receive their evidence without a nice examination. The Court does not consider the whole of the representations contained in the evidence of Mrs. Donald as positively proved; but yet the Court does not suppose that this witness came forward with an intention of giving a false colour to the transactions of which she deposes, still her evidence appears to have been given with a feeling disadvantageous to Mrs. Harris, and therefore, if the case rested on her evidence alone, the Court might have had a difficulty in forming a satisfactory opinion. The Court does not think, however, that Mrs. Donald is at all contradicted by the other witnesses on any essential point: on the contrary, her evidence is confirmed by them all, on that fact which is perhaps the most material in the case, namely, the continued absence of Mrs. Harris and Captain Latouche from the rest of the company.

What, then, are the other facts of the case which lead the Court to the conclusion that adultery was committed on this occasion, and [398] which render it probable that the parties availed themselves of the opportunity thus afforded? In the first place, then, there was an avowed attachment on the part of Mrs. Harris, a married woman, to Captain Latouche, who was an unmarried man. This appears upon the evidence of several of the witnesses. There are other circumstances, too, which are not entirely to be left out of the case, as proving the disposition of Mrs. Harris to commit the crime of adultery. The letters which have been exhibited are of this nature.

Now if it had appeared that before this transaction the mind of Mrs. Harris was pure, and her conduct unexceptionable, the Court would have much more difficulty in coming to the conclusion that she had yielded at once to temptation and given a licence to her passions. The improbability of her at once yielding to licentiousness, and forgetting what was due to common decency, as well as to her moral and religious obligations, would then be much greater. But when the Court read the letters exhibited in the case (I allude particularly to that one marked No. 5), it was impossible they should leave any doubt upon my judgment that a mind more depraved, a disposition more likely to be led into temptation, could scarcely exist in any person than must have existed in the writer of that letter. It will not be necessary for the Court to read any part of those exhibits now; but having read them, I am not prepared to say that more depravity of mind, or principles more completely undermined, could be expected to be found in any situation of life, or any rank of society. The Court does not think that a per-[399]-son, who could have written the letter to which I have already referred, and given it to a young lady of fifteen or sixteen years of age to read, as Mrs. Harris is proved to have done, could have possessed any scruples of decency or delicacy which would prevent her from indulging a criminal passion, whenever a convenient and practicable opportunity offered.

The Court is of opinion, therefore, that the disposition and mind of Mrs. Harris, as proved by those letters, tend greatly to corroborate the evidence of Mrs. Donald, and to render the conclusion come to upon her evidence, that Mrs. Harris did commit the offence charged against her, the more probable.

A declaration alleged to have been made by Mrs. Harris to Mrs. Mottley, some weeks after the excursion to Stanstead, has been observed upon as further proof that adultery was then committed. The declaration was not pleaded; nor is the Court inclined to ascribe to it much weight, certainly not all that weight which the counsel for Captain Harris have in argument demanded for it. There is another part of the case, however, which is of great importance as satisfying the mind of the Court upon this part of the case; I refer to the evidence of Mr. Mottley on the twenty-second article of the husband's first allegation.(a) The real and [400] true question

(a) In the twenty-second article of Captain Harris' first allegation it was pleaded: "That George Harris, having been in the early part of February, 1827, at Portsmouth, and there, for the first time, informed of some part of the conduct of Anna Maria Harris, his wife, while she was at Portsmouth, prior to and after his return from sea, did, on his return home to Brompton Crescent on the 13th of February, depute a friend to inform Anna Maria Harris, 'that such her misconduct had come to his knowledge, and that he would not again have any intercourse with or see her until she was able to clear up her character;' and that he, from such time, wholly ceased to live and cohabit with his wife: and that on the 22d of the same month he sent his children away. That Anna Maria Harris continued to reside in her husband's house, occupying apartments separate from his, until the 20th of March following, when Thomas Mottley, with whom she had been staying at Portsmouth (as before pleaded), having been sent for by her, informed her, 'that he had been made acquainted with every particular of her conduct during her stay at Portsmouth, and especially with all that had occurred in Stanstead Wood between herself and Captain Robert Latouche.' That Anna Maria Harris asked Thomas Mottley 'from whom he had heard the same?' when he replied, 'from the said Robert Latouche himself.' That Anna Maria Harris did not deny the said charge of Thomas Mottley, but exclaimed 'that Robert Latouche was a dirty scoundrel or dirty blackguard,' or to that effect; and asked Mottley 'whether her husband had been informed of her conduct with Robert Latouche?' That on being told by Mottley 'that he had not then communicated the same to George Harris,' she declared 'that, if he would not tell the same to him, she would immediately leave his house and go to her parents in France:' and she thereupon did quit his house attended by Mottley, and proceed to join her parents in France. That a long negociation afterwards took place in respect to a formal deed of separation, but which was broken off by George Harris. That the present suit was shortly afterwards instituted by Anna Maria Harris, and George Harris was after- arising upon this evidence is whether it does or does not prove a confession of adultery; and in my opinion the evidence [401] of Mr. Mottley proves that or it proves nothing.

Before referring to his testimony the Court [402] may observe that it sees no reason to suppose that this witness has not given a fair and accu-[403]-rate account of the transaction to which he deposes. Indeed, the fact that he did not communicate what had occurred at Portsmouth, at an earlier period than he did, to Captain Harris proves very clearly, I think, that he was not actuated by malignant or improper feelings towards Mrs. Harris. There is no reason, therefore, to suppose that the account which he has given of what took place between him and Mrs. Harris is too highly coloured or given with any improper bias. As the Court attaches considerable importance to this conversation it may be necessary to refer to it more at length than the Court has done in respect to other parts of the evidence. The witness Mottley states: "That in March, 1827, in consequence of a [404] letter from Captain Harris intimating a desire to see him, to consult with him upon the then existing wards for the first time informed by the said Thomas Mottley of the actual adultery of his wife with Robert Latouche."

---

At the hearing of the cause the deposition of Mr. Mottley to the two parts of the above article (which are printed in italics) was objected to. His deposition upon the second part, and the continuation of the first, are subjoined, the evidence to the first part being detailed in the judgment.

"The deponent, as also Mrs. Harris, remained at the house of Captain Harris until the morning of the 20th March, when they left it together; she to proceed to Dover and he to Portsmouth: deponent saw her to the White Horse Cellar. In the intermediate time between the 15th and 20th of March Mrs. Harris and Captain Harris lived separately, she keeping entirely in her own bed-room, where, at her desire, deponent had several further interviews with her, which ended in an arrangement (deponent acting by authority of Captain Harris) that she should proceed to her mother and father in France, and deponent furnished her with money for the purpose on account of Captain Harris. In the previous month of February, 1827, Captain Harris came down to the house of the deponent alone, and told deponent that he had come in consequence of his brother, Mr. Henry Harris, having informed him that he had received intelligence of a variety of improprieties committed by his (Captain Harris') wife, while she was staying at the house of the deponent: the deponent then informed Captain Harris all that deponent had heard at that time of the conduct of Mrs. Harris, and which he believed to be true, namely, of her walking the streets in a conspicuous manner, her writing notes to different officers, and of her general conduct having been the opposite to what it ought to have been; and Captain Harris was, in deponent's presence, informed of a variety of circumstances, specifying general acts of Mrs. Harris' misconduct, by Mrs. Mottley and deponent's daughter, now Mrs. Mathews, from whom deponent had chiefly received the information he at that time gave Captain Harris. The deponent had not, at that time, received any information respecting the adultery of Mrs. Harris. The deponent (Mottley) continued to communicate with Captain Harris from time to time (after he left London in March, 1827), on the subject of the separation; and was, by letter from Captain Harris, informed that a suit of divorce had been instituted against him by his said wife by reason of adultery: it was then for the first time that the deponent, by letter, communicated to Captain Harris that he (the deponent) had been informed by Captain Robert Latouche that he (Latouche) had, after dinner on the 13th of September, 1826, in the wood at Stanstead, carnal connection with Mrs. Harris while they were separated from the rest of the party. The information which the deponent so communicated to Captain Harris, he was in possession of on the 15th of March, 1827, at the time of his interview with Mrs. Harris predeposed of; and it was to that information the defendant alluded in the conversation which he had in the morning of that day with Mrs. Harris already set forth; and the deponent, from the expression of resentment against Captain Latouche which Mrs. Harris uttered on that occasion, and other her conversation deposed of, did at the time, and still does, believe that Mrs. Harris understood that the deponent alluded to an act of adultery committed in the wood at Stanstead after dinner."

Upon reading Mr. Mottley's evidence an objection was taken to the declaration differences between Captain Harris and his wife, the deponent came up to town from Portsmouth, and whilst he was at breakfast with Captain Harris at his house in Brompton Crescent he received a note from Mrs. Harris"—which is annexed to the witness' deposition—"expressing a wish to see him, she then occupying separate apartments from Captain Harris. After breakfast the deponent went up to Mrs. Harris, who, referring to the state of separation in which she was living from her husband, 'complained that she had been very ill, that her friends had deserted her, and that she had not a friend in the world, and did not know what to do.' She also acknowledged in general terms that she had been very culpable, but did not advert to any particular fact or to any particular person."

Now, thus far the declarations of Mrs. Harris appear to be quite in accordance with the letter which she had previously addressed to her husband, and which is annexed as an exhibit to his allegation. In that letter also she acknowledged herself generally to have been very imprudent, but her actual criminality she strongly and solemnly denied.(a) In the same manner [405] the witness, Mr. Mottley, says "that deposed upon this article: that the first declaration was general; that it applied to no specific transaction and furnished no inference of criminal conduct; nor that Mrs. Harris knew to what Mottley alluded: and that the witness' communication by letter to Captain Harris was no evidence of the guilt imputed to his wife; that Captain Latouche himself should have been examined.

---

On the other hand: the twenty-second article was explanatory, and the purport of it was to shew the conduct of the husband on being informed of his wife's guilt, and that a communication upon that subject was made at the time and in the manner pleaded. Even supposing that the declarations were not altogether admissible as evidence of Mrs. Harris' misconduct, yet still (whatever might be their effect) her observations were quite admissible: and they proved knowledge of Mottley's allusion. Why was this article of the plea not opposed?

Per Curiam. The objection to this witness' deposition applies to two parts: in both it is founded on the same principle—viz. that the examiner has taken down hearsay, and therefore what is not properly admissible as evidence. But the Court has no doubt that the conversation which passed in Mrs. Harris' presence, and was not denied by her, is evidence: it cannot be considered as hearsay; for the declaration was addressed to her, and she acquiesced in it. In respect of the communication towards the end of Mr. Mottley's deposition on the same article, it certainly would have been more convenient if the examiner had confined himself to the language of the plea, and taken down the deposition in more general terms. But the question is whether it is evidence at all, and if it be so, whether it is evidence as against Mrs. Harris. Now it cannot be received as evidence against her: the communication was introduced, in plea, alio intuitu; and on principle must be rejected as proof of the wife's guilt: nor is it required as explanatory of the husband's conduct: still, however, the Court has some difficulty in striking out the whole of this part of the deposition; it would, by such a course, be doing an injustice to the husband, since the Court has no power of substituting that which would be more general in its terms: it must, therefore, admit this communication to be evidence of the manner in which Captain Harris was first informed of his wife's alleged guilt, but of guilt it is no proof whatever.

(a) This letter, pleaded in the 23rd article of Captain Harris' allegation, was received by him two or three days after he had ceased to cohabit with his wife in February, 1827; it was as follows:—

"My mind is so distracted I must write: to see you I have not strength; or if you turned me from you I would attempt it. Oh, Harris! what can I say, what can I do? Have you no love for me left, none that will urge you to consider my wretched state? I own to you I have been foolishly, thoughtlessly imprudent; but as to guilt, not even in thought—by all that I have to hope for in Heaven: never, never have I injured you. My God can witness how deep is my sorrow for my faults; but did you know my heart you would not spurn it. Oh, Harris! I ask you in the name of my blessed children and poor father to forgive me. Was I begging salvation, I could not implore it with more sorrow for my faults, or with a more broken and penitent heart than I now feel. Hear me, hear me, George, thou best of beings; and every hour of my life shall be for your future happiness. I feel my heart so nearly broken I care not for myself, but, my children, they are dearer to me than my heart's blood:

she acknowledged herself generally to have been very [406] culpable, but that she did not advert to any particular transaction, or to any particular person."

Afterwards, however, "the deponent, addressing Mrs. Harris, said, 'You must not deceive yourself, I know every particular transaction that took place during your stay at Portsmouth, particularly what took place between yourself and Latouche in the wood at Stanstead after dinner, when you were absent from the party.' Mrs. Harris looked surprised, and said, 'Did Latouche tell you?' Deponent replied 'Yes.' Mrs. Harris then in great anger said, 'He' (meaning the articulate Robert Latouche) 'is a dirty scoundrel,' or used epithets towards him of the like tenor and effect. Mrs. Harris asked, 'Does George' (meaning her husband) 'know it?' Deponent said 'he did not.' Mrs. Harris then said 'that [407] she knew it was impossible for her, after what had happened, to live with Captain Harris again as his wife, and that if the deponent would undertake that no further investigation of her conduct either in London or in Portsmouth should take place, she would quit his (her husband's) house.'"

Now it is, in my judgment, quite immaterial in what manner this conversation was introduced; the question is, under what impression Mrs. Harris made this declaration. It is no matter, as it appears to me, whether it was from the declarations of Captain Latouche himself or from any other quarter that Mr. Mottley derived his information, or whether he had any information at all on the point. The real and substantial question that arises upon the evidence of Mr. Mottley is, whether Mrs. Harris did in fact adopt what was said by that gentleman as to the occurrences in the woods at Stanstead, so as, in effect, to admit that she had been guilty of adultery. It is quite clear, I think, that the evidence of Mr. Mottley is admissible for this purpose. In the case of Burgess v. Burgess (2 Hagg. Con. 233, 4) a declaration of this kind was given in evidence, and that evidence, though objected to, was received by Lord Stowell. In the same case, in reference to a letter which was not in evidence at all, but which oh, think of them, look at my poor Jessie—your own image, and pardon her poor mother for her poor sake in years to come. Turn me not from you to the scorn of a heartless world which would brand me with adultery; and what has been my fault? lightness of conduct, and that to no extent. No, Harris, your honour by me was never injured, or I would not ask you to look over what is past. You will find plenty to urge you to think ill of me, you have all your friends near you, I stand alone without one friend in England, without one to take my part or give me one word of comfort; even Eliza has deserted me. Oh, my blessed father, what would be his feelings did he know the state of his poor favorite child whose conduct from her infancy he has prided himself upon. He loves you, Harris, with pride and affection: then break not his poor heart by taking further steps against me; forgive me, take me once more to your bosom. I love you, George, but you will not believe me; I have acted without thought, but I have never injured you. God protect you for your goodness to me since my illness: think not I have no heart to feel and honour your noble conduct; still do I hate to be a burden upon you, nor would I, till I get your pardon, be in the house; but my heart will not let me leave my poor children. I know I am innocent of all crime, I defy all my bitter enemies to prove that I have ever once, during my stay at Mottley's, been out of his house for one minute alone, or any man to say I ever held one instant private conversation: this, as I hope for your and my children's eternal happiness and my own, I swear: After this a woman may have acted thoughtlessly but not guilty: this is all I say to vindicate; see me, George, oh, in your heart you cannot quite hate me. I have seen since your return a coldness in your manners: this I, with agony to my heart, thought arose from your affections being placed on another; but you say you knew of my conduct. Oh! had I known this, all should have been explained; think not, above all, this letter is studied or planned to draw your compassion, it is the impulse of my distracted heart. See me, hear me, once more on my knees I vow my love for you and ask your pardon with a true and fervent heart. Oh, George, could you ever ask mine and be refused? For pity sake have mercy on your poor Anna.

---

"I have tried to read this over, but it ill explains one half my sorrow for you, or one half my penitence for my faults, but I am too ill to write more.

"Once more receive me, and the blessings of one who has ever loved you."

the party, charged with adultery, had received from the person with whom the alleged adultery was committed, and which she had shewed to her maid-servant, Lord Stowell said, when admitting the allegation in which this transaction was pleaded, "It may be of consequence to [408] know how she (meaning the wife) expressed herself on this occasion; there may be something of joint acknowledgment:" and a little lower down the learned Judge—after stating that the husband had informed his wife of the confession of her paramour, and that she admitted "it was too true:" says, "By this acknowledgment she adopts the confession, which was the same as if she had confessed it originally herself" (Burgess v. Burgess, 2 Hagg. Con. 235, notis).

In the present case it is not what Captain Latouche said, or whether he said any thing: it is what Mrs. Harris said, either directly to Mr. Mottley, or by way of inference. When Mr. Mottley informed Mrs. Harris "that she must not deceive herself, for that he knew every thing that took place whilst she was at Portsmouth, and particularly in the wood at Stanstead; she looked surprised, and asked whether Latouche had told him; and upon Mr. Mottley giving her to understand that he had, she said, in great anger, that Latouche was a dirty scoundrel." Now, the anger which Mrs. Harris evinced on this occasion may be somewhat doubtful. There may have been some familiarity short of adultery in the wood at Stanstead, and which she was indignant that Captain Latouche should have disclosed; but she goes on to ask, "Does George (meaning Captain Harris) know it?" and immediately after she says, "Now I know it is impossible for me ever again to live with my husband as his wife, I must quit his house, and I am ready to do so now if you will undertake that there shall be no further investigation of my conduct."

[409] Previous to the declaration thus made to Mr. Mottley, Mrs. Harris had acknowledged that she had been guilty of levity, and had committed repeated improprieties. These admissions are to be found in her letter addressed to Captain Harris, to which I have already adverted: up to this moment she had denied that the ultimate result had occurred; and because the ultimate result had not occurred she continued to entertain hopes of a reconciliation with her husband; but when she was given to believe that what passed with Captain Latouche in the wood was known to Mr. Mottley, and probably to her husband, she abandoned all hope of a reconciliation; and said "it was impossible that she and her husband should come together again, or that he should ever again receive her as his wife after what had happened, and that she was prepared to quit his house." Now, it is the opinion of the Court that Mrs. Harris would never have so expressed herself—that she would never have abandoned the idea of being reconciled to her husband, and taken again to live with him as a wife—if she had not thought that there was proof of her having committed actual adultery, and that her husband had discovered, or was sure to discover, that proof. I think that the whole of her conduct corroborates this view of the case, and more particularly the circumstance of her leaving her husband's house forthwith and proceeding to join her relations in France.

This is the evidence of Mr. Mottley; and, if it be considered to amount to a confession, it leaves no doubt remaining on this part of the case. It has been held that confession, when [410] perfectly free from all taint of collusion, when confirmed by circumstances and conduct, as this admission is, ranks amongst the highest species of evidence. It has been so held on different occasions. It was most truly stated by Lord Stowell, in the case of Mortimer v. Mortimer (2 Hagg. Con. 315), "that the Court was inclined to view confession, when not affected by collusion, as evidence of the greatest importance;" and the grounds upon which the Court laid down this principle are too obvious to need any explanation.

Upon a combination, then, of all the various circumstances of the present case—Mrs. Harris' want of regard for her husband—her repeatedly avowed attachment to Captain Latouche—their absence from the rest of the company during the visit to Stanstead Wood—the total want of moral feeling on the part of Mrs. Harris, her disposition—so clearly pourtrayed by her letters and conduct, if not to devote herself to the gratification of her passions, at least to act in a manner inconsistent with the preservation of her purity of mind; taking, then, all these circumstances into consideration, together with the letters proved to have been written by Mrs. Harris; her declarations, her admissions, and the situation in which Mrs. Harris and Captain Latouche were left in the wood at Stanstead, amounting, as I have already remarked, almost to an incipient act of adultery, the Court does not hesitate in pronouncing that the accusation of adultery against Mrs. Harris has been fully and satisfactorily substantiated.

The Court has now then to consider whether any circumstances have been proved in the case [411] which are sufficient to prevent the husband from obtaining that remedy which the law, in the absence of any such circumstances, would afford to him? Captain Harris has been accused of cruelty and of criminal neglect. These are the charges against him, and I must here observe that the first of those charges has been introduced at a late period into the case. The charge of cruelty was no part of the original gravamen. The citation states the suit to have been brought by the wife for adultery alone. The charge of cruelty, therefore, was not pleaded in the libel, nor could it indeed have been pleaded responsively to the allegation, admitted on behalf of the husband, charging Mrs. Harris with adultery; for there is no point, as it appears to me, more settled, than that cruelty cannot be pleaded in bar of a charge of adultery. The charge of cruelty, then, in this case arose incidentally upon interrogatories put to one of the witnesses, viz. Sarah Saunders, the cook; and having arisen in this way, Captain Harris had no opportunity of defending himself against it. As I before observed, even if this charge were proved, it would not be sufficient to repel the adultery committed by the wife; and such being the case, the Court, I think, is relieved from the necessity of entering into a further investigation of this charge.

With respect to the next charge, that of criminal neglect, pleaded to have begun nearly at the commencement of the married life of these parties, the Court, upon considering the whole of the evidence adduced in support of this charge, is of opinion that it is an antiquated charge, and wholly unsustained by suffi-[412]-cient testimony. This charge is founded upon the reception of Captain Vincent, an old and intimate friend of Captain Harris (who was present at the marriage of the parties), at his cottage, at Fulmer, after this officer had been confined with a severe rheumatic attack. It is alleged that at this period Captain Harris was guilty of criminal negligence, by leaving his wife in this cottage, which was very small, alone with Captain Vincent for days and nights together; but it is proved by Captain Vincent, to whom the Court does give credit, that during his stay with the parties at Fulmer, Captain Harris never slept away from home on any occasion. The Court is of opinion, then, that there is no foundation for any part of this charge; nor does it think there is any foundation for charging him with any want of due consideration and caution in regard to his wife's comfort and accommodation at a subsequent period.

When Captain Harris was appointed to the command of the "Hussar" frigate, his public duty obliged him to proceed to the West Indies, and it is in evidence that he then left Mrs. Harris living at Fulmer Heath, and in the neighbourhood, and under the protection of, her own parents. Captain Harris, therefore, was not to blame if a separation between Mrs. Harris and her parents afterwards became necessary under any circumstances, nor was it incumbent upon him to grant permission for his wife to proceed to France, even if he could have perceived or anticipated the catastrophe which did occur, and which induced the parents of Mrs. Harris to leave this country. The conduct of Captain Harris, therefore, in this particular, does not, as it appears [413] to my mind, justly subject him to any imputation.

The most serious consideration, as regards the conduct of Captain Harris towards his wife, still remains behind. It has been alleged, and it is in proof, that Captain Harris introduced his wife to Mrs. Cary, who was at that time actually living in a situation which the Court must consider highly immoral and improper, and which could not have rendered her a fit acquaintance for the wife of a British officer.

To what extent Captain Harris wished this intimacy to go between his wife and Mrs. Cary does not, I think, very clearly appear, though it has been a matter of much discussion. It has been contended on the part of Captain Harris that he wished to restrain the acquaintance within very narrow limits. But if such were his wishes on the subject, it appears that his conduct was not quite in unison with them; for we find that, having introduced Mrs. Cary to his wife before he left England, upon his return from the West Indies he and Mrs. Harris took up their residence at her house, where they remained for a considerable time—it is immaterial to state precisely how long, but the evidence shews that Captain Harris and his wife resided there for several weeks. It is true that Captain Harris had been acquainted with Mrs. Cary for many years, and that his brother, with his children, was residing under the same roof.

On this state of facts, the next consideration is the law applicable to those facts. Upon this point, and upon the inference arising from the application of the law to such facts, I have no [414] hesitation in saying that the Court has bestowed much and painful consideration. On the one hand, the Court is most desirous not to relax the obligation, which the law imposes upon the husband, cautiously to protect and guard his wife from all associations that might expose her purity to hazard: or, by lowering her standard of female virtue, prepare the way for the inroads of the seducer. If indeed the Court is not sufficiently alert in maintaining the necessity, on the part of the husband, of jealously watching over the society, conduct, and habits of his wife, it may occasion an irreparable injury to the great bonds of domestic happiness and peace. On the other hand, the Court is equally anxious to introduce no new rule of law, and not to strain any admitted principle of law beyond those limits which have been affixed by the wisdom of its predecessors, and by the Judges of superior courts. If there be defects or inconveniences in the present state of the law, it is infinitely better they should be left apparent for the wisdom of competent authority to remedy, than that individual Judges should accommodate the law to their own notions of convenience, and by compromising admitted principles leave all in doubt and uncertainty. The conduct of Captain Harris in introducing his wife to Mrs. Cary has been termed criminal neglect, but this expression is much too indefinite to enable the Court with any precision to measure out the legal consequences of such conduct.

The principle which I find established, as applicable to the present case, is, that connivance and collusion destroy all claim to a [415] remedy by way of divorce. This was held in the case of Forster v. Forster (1 Hagg. Con. 144) and in a variety of other cases; and it is founded on the obvious principle that no man has a right to ask relief from a Court of Justice for an injury which he was chiefly instrumental in effecting himself. Volenti non fit injuria. This principle is very clearly established; but what degree of neglect, however culpable, short of an actual and voluntary exposure of the wife to the seduction of an adulterer, would be sufficient, in order to bar a suit for divorce by reason of adultery, is nowhere laid down, at least with that distinctness and precision which would furnish a safe guide for the Court to act upon. The Court certainly does not recollect any case of the kind; but it can conceive that a case might arise of such wilful neglect, or rather exposure, as might, without proving actual connivance, possibly bar the husband of all remedy by a divorce. A husband might introduce his wife to society so abandoned, and expose her to risques so great, as to render a deviation from the paths of chastity the most probable, if not the necessary, consequence. Under such circumstances, perhaps, the Court would not wait for proof of actual connivance on the part of the husband, but would hold him to the consequences of his own conduct, when the adulterous connexion arose from the society and temptations to which he had introduced his wife.

In the present case, beyond the fact that Mrs. Cary was living in a condition which the law can never sanction, however high the con-[416]-nexion may be, there is nothing proved to her disparagement. There is no evidence to shew that through her introduction, or under her roof, Mrs. Harris experienced any contamination of mind from loose conversation, or was exposed to the wiles of a seducer. The adultery of which the Court has pronounced her guilty is wholly unconnected with her acquaintance with this lady; it neither emanated from her directly nor indirectly; if it had, the case might be subject to very different considerations. Under such circumstances, the Court feels it too much to presume that to this acquaintance is to be attributed Mrs. Harris' dereliction of her connubial duties: it cannot find any principle or precedent which would warrant it in saying that the introduction to such an acquaintance alone amounts to connivance, or gives the wife a licence to indulge her criminal passions without affording to the husband such relief as this Court can administer.

The Court cannot but lament that Captain Harris should not have entertained a nicer sense of the delicacy due to the character of his wife: but it does not conceive that, under all the circumstances, the law visits his want of caution with so serious a penalty as to leave him without remedy for her profligacy.

Taking, then, the whole of this case into consideration, I am of opinion that the libel charging Captain Harris with adultery has not been proved; but that Captain Harris has proved the fact of adultery charged against his wife in his allegation, and I therefore pronounce that he is entitled to the separation which he prays.

[417] BUTT v. JONES. Arches Court, Easter Term, 4th Session, 1829.—A faculty (for annexing a pew to a messuage) obtained by surprise and undue contrivance may be revoked.

[Applied, Re St. George-in-the-East, 1876, L. R. 1 P. D. 314; Re St. Nicholas Cole Abbey, [1893] P. 68; Vicar of St. James, Norland v. Parishioners, [1894] P. 257; St. Andrew, Romford v. All Persons having Interest, [1894] P. 223; In re Plumstead Burial Ground, [1895] P. 241; Vicar of St. John Baptist, Cardiff v. Parishioners, [1898] P. 156; London County Council v. Dundas, [1904] P. 31.]

On appeal.

This was an appeal from the Consistory Court of the diocese of Gloucester. The suit commenced in October, 1828, when, at the instance of Henry Butt, one of the churchwardens of the parish of Upton Saint Leonard's in the county of Gloucester, a citation was served upon George Jones, a farmer and parishioner thereof, calling upon him to shew cause "why a certain faculty, bearing date the 21st of August, 1828, and granted to him for erecting and appropriating a seat or pew in the parish church of Upton St. Leonard's, should not be annulled."

On the 16th of January, 1829, a libel and exhibit were given in: the libel pleaded:—

1. That Henry Butt and George Jones were, on the 7th of April preceding, duly elected churchwardens of the parish of Upton St. Leonard's.

[418] 2. That the population of the parish was very great, and much inconvenience had been for a long time felt, and complained of, for want of seat room, to remedy which the subject of new pewing the church had been frequently discussed.

3. That George Jones now occupies, and hath for some years occupied, a dwelling-house and estate called Wheatley Court; in right whereof, and as appropriated thereto, he hath been in the habit of using a very commodious pew in the said parish church.

4. That it is the uniform practice of this Court to require that, previous to any application for a faculty to erect and appropriate a pew to a messuage, the minister, churchwardens, and parishioners should be convened in vestry, and the sense of such meeting taken thereon; and that no proclamation for a faculty should pass the seal until a map or plan of the seat be thereto annexed.

5. That, in this case, the proclamation issued, but without a plan, and was read in the parish church, calling upon the minister, churchwardens, and parishioners to shew cause "why a faculty should not be granted to George Jones to enable him to remove two open pews, and erect, on the site thereof, a pew in the said church."

6. That when the proclamation was published the proposal in respect to the said pews had not been submitted to the vestry; that the said two open pews were used by certain poor parishioners; and that the messuage to which it was intended to appropriate the new pew had [419] been for many years past, and now was, occupied by Jones' labourers; that immediately upon the issuing of the said proclamation the minister and other parishioners were much aggrieved at the proceeding, and in respect thereof convened a vestry.

7. That on the 7th of August a vestry meeting was accordingly held; when Jones was remonstrated with; and on its being proposed that the propriety of new pewing the church and providing further seat room should be considered on the 14th of August, Jones agreed that a notice should be given on Sunday, 10th of August, to that effect, and all proceedings upon the proclamation suspended till after that day.

8. That just previous to divine service on the 10th of August a paper writing was delivered, by the desire of Mr. Gardner, to Mr. Butt: it was as follows:—"Mr. George Jones wishes Mr. Butt not to give notice about the meeting to-day." That Butt, supposing that something had occurred to make the day fixed for the vestry inconvenient to Jones, and that he would fix a future day, complied with his request.

9. Exhibited the paper writing; and pleaded that it was in the handwriting of Thomas Gardner, the deputy registrar of the diocese of Gloucester.

10. That about a fortnight afterwards, Jones told Butt that it was Mr. Gardner who had advised the vestry meeting should not be held, and had written the note in order to put a stop to it.

11. That, to the surprise of the parishioners, on the 22d of August a workman was employed by Jones to remove the two pews and erect a [420] new pew, and he stated that a faculty authorised him so to do: that on the first Sunday after the pew was finished, Jones and Gardner sat therein during service, and that Gardner had since occupied it. That at a vestry meeting, held on the 7th of September, Jones produced a faculty, under the seal of the Episcopal Consistorial Court of Gloucester, bearing date the 22d of August preceding, "authorising the removal of the said two pews and the erection of a new one, and confirming the same, when so erected, to George Jones and the future owners and occupiers of a messuage and premises called New House, in the parish of Upton St. Leonard's." That Jones did not deny that he had agreed to stay proceedings, and he also admitted his conduct looked like deception; but laughed with a kind of exultation and said, "They might apply to the bishop if they pleased to set aside the faculty, but it was granted, and could not now be altered."

12. That on the 2d of October a resolution of vestry was passed "to apply to the ecclesiastical court in the diocese of Gloucester for a faculty to empower the parishioners of Upton St. Leonard's to alter the pews and sittings in their church for the better accommodation of the inhabitants, and also to do away the faculty obtained by Jones."

13. Exhibits.

14. That, in respect to the grant of this faculty, Gardner had acted contrary to the injunctions of the 123d canon.

15. Exhibited the faculty.

16. That twenty-two days only elapsed be-[421]-tween the proclamation for the faculty and the grant thereof.

17 and 18. Formal articles.

19. That the faculty heretofore granted to George Jones, as aforesaid, might be annulled and rescinded, and that Jones be condemned in costs.

Before this libel was admitted an allegation on the part of Jones was given in: it set forth:—

1. That the libel was frivolous and vexatious.

2. That he, Jones, was the owner and occupier of a messuage and good estate in the parish of Upton; and that the faculty was to enable him to take down two open seats occupied by paupers, and, in lieu thereof, secure one for the use of the present and future inhabitants of the said mansion and estate, he and they having no seat or other place in the church belonging thereto.

3, 4, and 5. That the proclamation duly issued; was affixed to the church door, publicly read, and duly certified by the officiating minister of the parish: and, after the usual proceedings, the faculty was decreed.

6. That it being stated in the proclamation that the expences of removing and erecting the said pew would be defrayed by George Jones, and not by the parishioners, a vestry meeting was unnecessary.

7. That no opposition having been offered to the grant of the faculty, and it having been granted in the proper and legal terms, it was not competent to the judge to rescind or revoke the same.

[422] 8. That the libel should be rejected with costs.

On the 12th of March the Judge, having heard objections on both sides, rejected the libel and allegation, and condemned Butt in costs. From this decree the present appeal was instituted.

Dodson and Addams for the respondent. A faculty once granted by a competent court cannot be revoked by the authority of the same court. In Fuller v. Lane it was held "that a faculty, once issued, is good and valid even against the ordinary himself" (2 Add. 431). A faculty is analogous to a grant of administration; if decreed to a wrong person the grant may be repealed; but if to a person duly entitled, the Court cannot revoke and issue it to another in equal degree, though the second applicant may be more fit. Much inconvenience would arise if a faculty, once granted by competent authority, should be annulled. We admit that if the second article of the libel were proved, it would furnish good reasons why the present faculty should not, originally, have issued, but they cannot avail for the purpose of revoking it.

Per Curiam. For the purposes of the present question I must take the libel as true; but not the allegation—that is given loco responsi, and is merely [423] equal to verbal statement. The faculty, in this case, I perceive, is annexed to a messuage; is there any modern instance of an annexation of a pew by faculty to a messuage? No grant of that kind, I apprehend, has been made, in modern times, by the superior Court.

Argument resumed.

Though the Court has on several occasions laid down the proper and correct mode of granting faculties for pews, yet it has never gone so far as to decide that if granted in another form the faculties would not be valid.

The King's advocate and Lushington for the appellant were stopped by the Court.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is an appeal from the Consistory Court of Gloucester, where the suit was instituted in order to revoke a faculty; a libel was there offered stating grounds to induce the Court to annul it, and the defendant, instead of objecting ore tenus by his counsel or proctor to the admissibility of that libel, gave in an allegation setting forth in the shape of a written statement his grounds of opposition. The Judge of the Court below, after deliberating, rejected the whole proceedings, and thereby confirmed the faculty: from this decision the present appeal has been prosecuted.

For the purpose of considering the admissibility of the original libel the matters therein alleged must be taken as true; and then the [424] question is whether, if they be true, this faculty ought to be revoked; and I am of opinion that it ought to be revoked on account, both of the extent of the grant and of the irregular mode in which it has been obtained.

Faculties are to be granted at the discretion of the ordinary, but it must be a sound discretion, having a due regard to times and circumstances, and to the rights and interests of all parties concerned: if an unsound discretion be exercised a party may appeal to a superior tribunal.

Here the faculty, at least primâ facie, is unusual and vicious; it appropriates a seat to a messuage by taking down two pews where the poor were accommodated. Now all pews are for the accommodation of the whole parish, although in ancient times they seem to have been sometimes appropriated by faculty to a messuage, yet in modern times the utmost extent granted is, "to a man and his family so long as they continue inhabitants of the parish." The view taken by the Court of the general law and general doctrine on this subject was stated in the case of Fuller v. Lane (2 Add. 425, 431); and the Court sees no reason to depart from the opinion it then expressed.

In the present times, and with the increased population of the country, a parish must be very singularly circumstanced to induce and justify an ordinary in granting a faculty of any sort for a pew, so as to preclude the parish from improving the church-accommodation, particularly for the lower classes: but here the Chancellor [425] of Gloucester does not appear to have made any inquiry into the special state of the parish and its church-room; but upon a formal proclamation, or decree with intimation, having issued, being read in church, affixed to the church-door, returned into court, and no appearance nor opposition given, this faculty was granted, and to this great extent, which in modern times, I repeat, is become quite obsolete and injurious. Moreover, it is stated in the libel that the parish is very populous; that the parishioners are desirous of altering the church for the purpose of affording more accommodation, and that the two open pews, allowed to be taken down and removed, were occupied by the poor: yet notwithstanding all this, and without inquiring into these matters, the Court granted the faculty. The vigilance and sound discretion of the Judge have been surprized: and from some circumstances alleged in the libel it would seem that his deputy-registrar has been a party in putting that surprise upon him.

By whom also was this faculty obtained? By Jones at the time he was one of the churchwardens, and as such a sort of trustee and guardian whom it especially behoved to protect the interests of the parish at large, and not in this manner obtain a special grant for his own exclusive benefit.

To what messuage is the pew to be appropriated? Not to the house in which Jones resides, but to a farm in which one of his labourers is placed; nor is it for his necessary accommodation; for he has another seat appropriated to the house in which he and his family dwell.

[426] And how was this faculty obtained? Not by any prior consent of the parish in vestry, nor real acquiescence on their part; but on a mere formal proclamation, the nature of which few of the inhabitants would understand as binding them to a real consent. However, the fact is that, when it came to the knowledge of the parishioners, they proposed calling a vestry; they met on the 7th of August; Jones undertook to postpone the proceedings; a notice of a vestry to be convened on the 14th was fixed to be announced on Sunday the 10th, which, by the advice of the deputy-registrar, Jones procured to be stopped; and in the mean time, by the contrivance of the same individual, the faculty passed the seal. If that part of the history of this transaction be accurately stated this faculty was fraudulently and surreptitiously obtained: and if the whole be true, the deputy-registrar ought to be removed from his office: that, however, is not the object of the present proceedings.

The question for my consideration is whether upon the matters here stated this faculty ought to be revoked; and upon that question there seems to be no room for judicial doubt: and if the averments are likely to be proved, the respondent will do well to give an affirmative issue, and, before they become heavier, to pay all the costs that have been incurred. If, indeed, he has acted upon the suggestions, and under the advice of the deputy-registrar, they must settle the matter of costs between themselves; but it is my duty to pronounce for the appeal, and to admit the libel. I shall also give the costs of the ap-[427]-peal, reserving the costs in the court below to the hearing of the cause.

On the first session of Trinity Term an affirmative issue was given to the libel; when the Court condemned the respondent in the costs incurred in the Court of Gloucester, and decreed a monition against him to restore the pews that he had caused to be removed.

[428] GLYNN v. OGLANDER. Prerogative Court, Easter Term, 2nd Session, 1829. —Probate cannot be granted of a paper having nothing to give it a testamentary character, not intended to operate upon the death of the writer; but to effect a gift inter vivos.

On admission of an allegation.

Jane Mary Oglander, late of Oxford, died on the 27th of January, 1829, a widow. She left her last will bearing date the 21st of November, 1825, and also a testamentary paper writing of the tenor following:—

"My dear Sir,—Wish to contribute something to those poor children of the two destitute families I do beg you to in the bes mode of doing so I would sell out 5000."

[The remaining three lines could not be deciphered with accuracy; but they were conjectured to be: "thousand pounds for that purpose, which I beg you to divide between them. I rejoice that the Hays will be here so soon."]—"Much yours,

"J. M. O."

[429] "Female children or all the children (a) of Robert Bathurst and Mrs. De Crespigny 500 or (b) 5000 $\frac{\text{3 per cents}}{\text{A}}$ stock to be sold for their benefit."

Superscribed "WM. BRAGGE, Esq."

This paper writing was propounded as a codicil by Susanna Margaret Glynn, an executrix of the deceased's will. The allegation, in substance, pleaded:—

1. The death of Mrs. Oglander; and that by her will, dated the 21st of November, 1825, she specifically bequeathed £1690 four per cents.; £33,500 three per cent. reduced annuities, leaving £6100 of the same stock, and the residue of her other effects, being at the date of her will, about £4000, chargeable under her will, with annuities of £175; and other legacies and charges to Frances Dorothea Oglander and Susanna Margaret Glynn. That, after the date of the will, she invested in the three per cent. reduced annuities about £3000.

2. That the Reverend Robert Bathurst died suddenly on the 24th of December, 1828, leaving a widow, two sons, and eight daughters, almost destitute; that Mrs. De Crespigny (Mr. Bathurst's sister), the god-daughter of Mrs. Oglander, was also in distressed circumstances, and had two infant sons, and was pregnant at the time of the deceased's death. That on the 12th or 13th of January last the deceased ex-[430]-pressed to Mr. Bragge, their cousin, compassion for the destitute condition of the two families.

3. That on the 16th of January the deceased, who was in the 72d year of her age, having been previously indisposed, was confined to her bed; Miss Gray, her friend, attending her. That on the evening of the 25th the deceased desired writing materials to be brought to her; that she was raised in bed, and then wrote part of the paper writing propounded, which by her directions Miss Gray sealed and addressed to Mr. Bragge, the deceased observing "that it was not so urgent as to be sent immediately; that to-morrow morning would be time enough."

---

(a), (b) The words and figures in italics were struck through with a pen. See the 4th article of the allegation.

4. That on the morning of the 26th Mr. Bragge called and requested Miss Gray to inform the deceased that he required further instructions; that the deceased declined seeing Mr. Bragge, but informed him through Miss Gray "that the money was intended for the two poor families of the late Robert Bathurst and Mrs. De Crespigny;" that Miss Gray then wrote in Mr. Bragge's presence, at the foot of the deceased's note, "female children or all the children of Robert Bathurst and Mrs. De Crespigny 500 or 5000 stock to be sold for their benefit;" which memorandum she afterwards altered, by erasures and by an interlineation, upon further inquiries of, and explanations from, the deceased. That the deceased then directed Mr. Bragge to send for a power of attorney for the sale of the stock; and added, "I feel most for the poor Robert Bathursts; but Caroline (Mrs. De Crespigny) is my god-daughter:" and in the afternoon of the same [431] day, alluding to same subject, she said, "The stocks are very high, it will produce a good sum." It was further pleaded that the deceased (it was believed) did not, neither did Mr. Bragge nor Miss Gray, know that Mrs. De Crespigny had not a female child.

5. That the deceased thought her illness likely to be of long continuance; that she gradually became weaker and died about six o'clock on the following morning, viz. the 27th of January. That on the 26th Mr. Bragge wrote to Snow & Co., the deceased's bankers, for a power of attorney, which arrived by return of post.

6. Pleaded the hand-writing of the deceased; and exhibited Mr. Bragge's letter and the power of attorney. The allegation concluded with a prayer that the paper writing propounded might be pronounced for as a codicil to the deceased's will.

Lushington for the allegation.

The King's advocate contrà.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. Considerable difficulties present themselves in this case, arising from the form and contents of the instrument propounded. Courts of probate have gone considerable lengths to give effect to instruments, as testamentary, notwithstanding their form, where the intention that they should take effect upon death, has been manifest. But I do not recollect a case (and the learned counsel in support of the allegation admits he is not able to point one out) where a paper, not made to depend on that event as necessary to [432] give it consummation, has been admitted to probate.

Here, the paper propounded is in the form of a letter to a friend, the writer wishing to do something for the benefit of two families who are there mentioned. The instrument itself is hardly intelligible for that purpose; but, independent of that circumstance, the whole history and extrinsic evidence, as laid in the plea, shew that it was not a testamentary act, but a sale of stock for some immediate purpose, and to take place inter vivos. If the former were intended, why should the deceased have directed a power of attorney to be sent for? The parol declarations pleaded in the fourth article are full and detailed; but they are of no effect except as explanatory of the objects and amount of her intended bounty: the character of the paper must depend on the paper itself; it is not addressed to her executors; it has no reference to the will; no reference to her death. The whole tenor of the conversations and explanations is that the benefit was intended as a present gift.

There are some circumstances in this case from which the Court would feel strongly disposed to wish it could give effect to the instrument propounded; but the Court must indulge no such wishes at the expense of the residuary legatee. To pronounce for this paper would be going a step beyond any former case. An instrument conveying a benefit, whatever form it may assume, if it has the character of a testamentary paper to be consummated by death, may be admitted to probate (see Masterman v. Maberly, supra, 235, et seq.). In the [433] present instance the whole substance of the transaction is to sell stock for the benefit of the parties named in the paper; and this sale is to take place not by her executors, but by herself; not on her death, but immediately—as soon as the power of attorney could effect it. Upon these grounds I cannot consider this paper as testamentary; and I therefore reject the allegation.

Allegation rejected.

GROOM AND EVANS v. THOMAS AND THOMAS. Prerogative Court, Easter Term, 4th Session, 1829.—Where the deceased was admitted to have been insane before the execution of two asserted wills, and where there was evidence of delusion and other indicia of derangement existing shortly before, as well as subsequent to, the acts, proof of calmness, and of his doing formal matters of business, under the sanction of his family, are not sufficient to rebut the presumption against the papers.—Every person is presumed sane till shewn to have become insane: the presumption then changes, and a party setting up any instrument executed after the existence of insanity, has the burthen of proof cast on him, and must shew the mind perfectly restored, and delusion removed.—In civil suits the law avoids every act done during the period of lunacy, even though such act cannot be connected with the influence of the insanity.

[Discussed, Sutton v. Sadler, 1857, 3 C. B. (N. S.) 94.]

Robert Thomas, late of Fleet Street, silk mercer, the party deceased, died on the 16th of January, 1828: and the present suit was instituted by Thomas Groom and Robert Evans, executors named in a will of the deceased bearing date the 4th of July, 1826, against John Thomas, brother, and Thomas Thomas, nephew of the deceased, two of the executors named in a former will dated the 27th of August, 1825.

Lushington and Pickard in support of the will dated the 4th of July, 1826.

The King's advocate and Addams contrà.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The point in this cause is the sanity or insanity of the testator, a sort of case which always depends on its own particular circum-[434]-stances. The principle of law applicable to such a question admits of no controversy. Every person is presumed to be sane until it is shewn that he has become insane: the presumption then changes: it is presumed that he continues of unsound mind, and the party setting up any instrument executed after insanity has manifested itself has the burthen of proof cast upon him: he must shew recovery, and he must shew not merely that the party, whose act is the subject of inquiry, was restored to a state of calmness, and to the ability of holding rational conversation on some topics, but that his mind, having shaken off the disease, was again become perfect, was sound upon all subjects, and that no delusion remained.

It is sometimes supposed that rules respecting testamentary law prevail in this court different from the principles held in other courts; but that is not so: and, to shew the concurrence of opinion in all courts upon the present subject, I will refer at some length to the report of the case of The Attorney General v. Parnther (3 Brown's C. C. 441). The very marginal title, "general principles on cases of insanity," shews that the observations contained in it are of very extended applicability.

The case stated "That Frances Barker, by power of attorney duly executed on the 14th of December, 1780, impowered John Barker, her late husband, to receive certain dividends; that before that day she was of unsound mind, had ever since continued so, and was kept in confinement; that the husband received the [435] dividends, made his will, and appointed the defendant executor; that a commission of lunacy had issued against Frances Barker, and that it was found she had been a lunatic, without lucid intervals, from the 17th of December, 1783."

So that this verdict did not embrace the time when the power of attorney was made, the validity of which was in dispute.

"The prayer was for an account of the dividends received by the late husband under the letter of attorney: and the defendants admitted that they knew Frances Barker had been occasionally, before the execution of the power of attorney, disordered in her mind, but that she appeared to the subscribing witnesses, at the execution thereof, to have the use and enjoyment of her senses and mental faculties sufficiently strong to fully understand and comprehend the nature of the acts she then did; and that before she executed it they explained the nature and effect of it, and expressly asked her if she did it with her free will and consent, which she readily answered she did. On an issue at law being directed, the cause was tried before Lord Kenyon and a special jury. A great deal of evidence was given, by Mrs. Barker's attendants, to prove general derangement, though with intervals of sense. On the other hand, her being perfectly sound and competent at the time of the execution of the instrument was spoken to by the subscribing witnesses and others, in habits of intimacy with her, that she had also frequent intervals in which she was perfectly competent to do any ra-[436]-tional act." There was, therefore, strong evidence of general competency, and of the absence of derangement when the instrument was executed: and the jury, without hesitation, found that Mrs. Barker was of perfectly sound mind at the execution of the power of attorney. Lord Kenyon, however, differed from the jury: he thought there was not proof of a sound mind; and upon an application for a new trial the case was very elaborately argued; and in delivering his opinion, Lord Chancellor Thurlow entered very fully into the question; a new trial was granted; and upon the second trial the instrument was held to be invalid.(a)

The case, then, of The Attorney General v. Parnther clearly shews that Lord Kenyon (who differed from the jury) and Lord Thurlow (sitting in a court of equity)—two great authorities—laid down principles and doctrines precisely such as are held in these Courts, and must govern the case before me. Another rule of law is that, in civil suits, it is not necessary to trace or connect the morbid imagination with the act itself. If the mind is unsound the act is void. The law avoids every act of the lunatic during the period of the lunacy, although the act to be avoided cannot be connected with the influence of the insanity, and may be proper in itself. This, indeed, is also to be collected from the case that I have already quoted.

In the present instance the fact is admitted and is proved that the deceased had been ac-[437]-tually insane before any testamentary act was done, or, as far as appears, ever was proposed by him. In the spring of 1825, being subject to fits, he became so deranged that he was attended by a keeper procured from a lunatic asylum. The question, then, is whether before the testamentary acts he had recovered a state of sound and perfect mind: for becoming calm so as no longer to require restraint and coercion; and being so far rational as to be able to converse sensibly upon many or even most topics will not be sufficiently conclusive. There are many persons decidedly lunatic who yet have the entire dominion over themselves and their affairs, and pass in ordinary society as persons of perfectly sound mind. Was this deceased, then, completely restored?

The deceased was Robert Thomas: he died in January, 1828, leaving a widow, no children, three brothers, two sisters, two nephews and a niece by a deceased brother. His real property is estimated at 2500l., and his personalty at 5000l.: this property was acquired by him in trade as a haberdasher in Fleet Street, which business latterly had been managed by his nephew Thomas Thomas. John, the deceased's brother, is his heir at law.

The will propounded by Groom and Evans, the executors, is dated the 4th of July, 1826, and it is opposed by his brother John and his nephew Thomas, two of the executors named in a former will of the 27th of August, 1825: that former will is in a cancelled state, and was so cancelled when the deceased executed the latter will: the former will is not propounded as against the widow and other next of kin.

[438] The deceased's sanity at the time of the execution of the former will is of course set up by the executors of that will, though they maintain that he was insane when he cancelled it, and when he executed the latter will; while the executors of this latter instrument have an interest in admitting and holding out that at the execution of the former he was sane; for his sanity at that time would lay the foundation for his sanity at the execution of the latter. Under these circumstances, though both these parties allege his recovery in August, 1825, yet that admission does not bind other parties entitled as next of kin, or in distribution. The Court, though it has only to decide, directly, upon the validity of the latter will, yet for that purpose must look at the whole case, and must not assume, upon the admission of the present parties, that the deceased had actually recovered a testamentary capacity after the avowed insanity in the spring of 1825. The onus probandi lies on the executors of each will.

Mr. Vincent, an eminent surgeon, and a man of high respectability, gives this account:

"The deponent attended the deceased professionally during the winter and spring of the year 1825; he had known the deceased for several years previous to that time; he the deceased having been in the habit of coming to the deponent's house to consult him for various complaints. In 1825 the deponent attended the deceased at his house in Chancery Lane in conjunction with Mr. Proctor of Fleet Street, who is a general medical practitioner, and for the most part saw him twice during each week from the commencement of his attendance until the deceased went to Richmond [439] in the latter part of the month of July in the said year: the deponent attended him on account of eruptions and sores which he had about him, and not on account of the fits to which the deceased was also subject, as the deponent understood at the time, but cannot depose thereto, as he never saw him in any such fit or under the immediate effects of epileptic attacks, though from his knowledge of the constitution and habit of body of the deceased the deponent apprehends the deceased was subject to determination of blood to the head, which rendered him liable to fits; that during the whole of his attendance upon the deceased, as aforesaid, the deceased was in a state of mental derangement and insane, although during the latter part of it, just previous to his going to Richmond, he was more tranquil in his mind than before. The deceased during such period laboured under delusion of mind; he imagined he was haunted by a fiend, and he had a perverted apprehension of facts before him: the deponent did not again professionally attend the deceased from the aforesaid month of July, until the latter end of September, 1826, and only once saw him during the intervening time, which was very shortly before and within a few days, as he now best recollects, of the 29th of September, when the deceased called alone on the deponent in Lincoln's Inn Fields, and of his own accord, gave the deponent a cheque on his bankers for the sum of five pounds in part payment of the deponent's previous professional attendance on him, for which the deponent had not received his fees: the deceased [440] only remained a few minutes on that occasion with the deponent, and nothing passed of any moment: the deceased only gave the cheque and talked of his complaints." [The witness afterwards refers to his books, and, on interrogatory, corrects the date, and says it was on the 10th of May, 1826, that he received this cheque.] "The deponent further saith that he again attended the deceased on or about the 29th of September. The deceased was then resident in lodgings in Hyde Street, Bloomsbury, and from thence the deponent continued to attend him so long as he remained there, and subsequently at the house of Mrs. Chevalier in South Audley Street, to which place he removed, and also at Pentonville (where he resided in lodgings, after he quitted Mrs. Chevalier) until February, 1827. During the said period, [that is, from the latter end of September, 1826], the deponent attended him twice each week on an average: the deceased did not on any occasion, during the last mentioned period that deponent attended on him, exhibit any symptoms of insanity: on all the occasions that deponent saw him in the said several lodgings, and on the aforesaid occasion when he called on the deponent, he, the deceased, conducted himself and talked and discoursed in a rational manner and was in the full possession of his mental faculties." All this, it must be remembered, was long subsequent to the execution of the latter will. He says further: "The deceased was a passionate and irritable man, and in the habit of expressing himself impetuously with respect to other persons in [441] his conversation, but the deponent never observed him to be violent in his conduct and behaviour; he was usually in a state of nervous excitement, especially if any subject likely to make an impression on his nerves was brought forward: the deponent observed him particularly excited on some occasions when he spoke of his wife (Elizabeth Thomas), and also on other occasions when he spoke of his brother John Thomas."

(a) The Court read, nearly verbatim, Lord Thurlow's judgment, as reported in Brown's Chancery Cases, vol. iii. p. 442.

On this account several observations arise. Mr. Vincent did not attend the deceased for mental disorders, but as a surgeon for bodily disorders: from July, 1825, to September, 1826, he never saw the deceased, except at one very short interview. This period includes both wills. The deceased was subject to fits and determination of blood to the head; but they were not the object of Mr. Vincent's attendance. Some observations were made in argument on the nature and effects of epileptic fits, that they were not likely to produce insanity.(a) I do not exactly comprehend the line of demarcation between fits of different sorts—epilepsy, convulsions, apoplexy, paralysis, and other nervous affections: but I apprehend that all attacks upon the brain produce effects upon the understanding according to their degree, and the part of the brain attacked and under pressure. Persons may be subject to epilepsy of a mild sort—the mere falling sickness, which, when sensation is restored, produces scarcely any permanent effect upon the mind; while [442] other fits of a severer sort produce very different consequences—sometimes paralysis, sometimes delirium and derangement, and sometimes, by a repetition, they reduce the patient to imbecility and idiotcy. But here we have the consequences; here is derangement—here is insanity in its essential quality, viz. delusion. The deceased fancied "he was haunted by a fiend, and had a perverted apprehension of facts before him." Before he went to Richmond he became more calm; but according to Mr. Vincent he continued insane till he went to that place in the latter end of July: and yet during this very period Mr. Young, ignorant of his insanity, prepared a will for him. After the deceased's return to town, when Mr. Vincent saw him in September, 1826, and subsequently, he thought him sane: but Mr. Vincent was not peculiarly accustomed to insane patients, nor to the study and observation of mental disorders: his attention was never directed to ascertain whether the deceased continued to have "delusions in his mind and perverted apprehension of facts."

(a) The observations were quoted from Dr. Burrows' Commentaries on Insanity, pp. 155, 6, 7.

From repeated cases and high medical authorities which have, from time to time, been laid before this Court, it is clear that persons essentially insane may be calm, may do acts, hold conversations, and even pass in general society as perfectly sane. It often requires close examination by persons skilled in the disorder to discover and ascertain whether or not the mental derangement is removed, and the mind again become perfectly sound. When there is calmness, when there is rationality on ordinary subjects, those who see the party usually conclude [443] that his recovery is perfect; and the family and those around the unfortunate person, partly from ignorance of the nature of the disorder, partly from delicacy in interfering, partly from their own wishes to believe him well again, form very incorrect opinions upon the subject.

The Court, then, is rather to look to facts, and to the conduct of the deceased, than to such opinions.

There are many circumstances which, though not of themselves establishing actual insanity, which had not before become decided, are still strong indicia of its continuance, such as great irritability, violent passions, occasionally deep depression, eccentric habits, suspiciousness, inconsistency, changeableness, and the like. If actual insanity never has existed, many or most of these circumstances may occur, and yet not establish positive derangement: but where actual derangement has previously existed, lighter things become confirmations; or, as Swinburne, for another purpose, expresses it, "if there be but one word sounding to folly, it is presumed that the testator was not of sound mind" (Swinburne on Wills, part ii. s. 3).

The Court has fully read the account given by the several witnesses as to the different periods of time, and it is unnecessary to detail all the circumstances to which they depose; they are strongly symptomatic of unsoundness of mind; some of them, indeed, direct proof of it.

In the summer of 1825, as I have before stated, the deceased went to Richmond for change of air, and his wife resided there with him. Before he went he took up the idea of will-making, and [444] gave instructions for a will to Mr. Young, his solicitor, who prepared a draft for the deceased's consideration and sent it to him on the 4th of June, 1825. This clearly seems to have been the deceased's own act, and to have originated with himself: but the question which I shall examine presently is, whether it was a sane act, for insane persons are, from depression, often will-makers.

Mr. Young thus deposes, on the third interrogatory: "Early in August (1825) John Thomas called upon the respondent and requested that he would go to the deceased, who was at Richmond and unwell, for the purpose of completing the draft of his will: the respondent went to and saw the deceased, who postponed going into the business of his will at such time. On the 25th of November, 1825, he attended the deceased again, and then found that he had made a will when at Richmond."

At Richmond, then, this will was made, though when Mr. Young first called the deceased postponed the matter.

While the deceased was at Richmond, at the latter end of the summer of 1825, he had another violent fit of apoplexy: from that fit, however, he recovered so far as to execute the will of the 27th of August, 1825, prepared there by a solicitor. On the morning of that day the instructions for the will were taken by the deceased's brother to the solicitor's office; in the afternoon the will was sent for the deceased's approval; and in the evening it was executed: so that the whole matter was done in haste on the same day; the execution was a mere formal act, and the solicitor hardly saw the deceased.

This is slender evidence in order to shew re-[445]-stored soundness of mind so soon after a fit, more especially as no persons are before the Court competent to question its validity. But the history of these different testamentary acts may tend to illustrate each other, and I will consider them presently.

The deceased having returned from Richmond at the latter end of 1825 had subsequently a recurrence of his fits. In March of the following year he went down to Birmingham to visit his friend Groom; this was much against the wishes and inclination of the deceased's family; his brother was at that time from home, but the family begged the guard of the coach, by which the deceased travelled, to look to him. On the road it appears he conducted himself strangely; at Birmingham he was again taken ill; his brother went down there, and accompanied the deceased back to town. In May, or rather later, his shop and business were sold off, and in July he went to lodge in Hyde Street, Bloomsbury; there he continued till the latter end of the year, when he removed to Mrs. Chevalier's in South Audley Street, and afterwards to Pentonville. I have thus passed over the general history very rapidly, because the state of the deceased during May, June, and July, 1826, the most material period in respect to his continued insanity or perfect recovery, is deposed to by a great number of witnesses; and considering their evidence—not merely their opinions, but the circumstances which they relate—it is difficult to believe that the deceased's mind had been restored to a state of soundness.

It has been relied upon that he was treated as a person of sound mind; that he executed in-[446]-struments, powers of attorney, deeds of assignment, drafts on bankers; but is his recovery correctly to be inferred from these circumstances? It is necessarily the case where the person is in the hands of his family, who are unwilling to take out a commission of lunacy that, under their sanction, such formal acts should be done and such instruments signed; but it seems that the person and the concerns of the deceased were managed by his wife, his brother, and his nephew, and not by himself. Though they did not coerce his person (except, indeed, when excited into violent paroxysms of passion), yet they watched him closely; they humoured and pleased him by bringing the servant (or rather the apothecary, the brother of the person who was recommended as his attendant), and allowing the deceased apparently to engage him; and they carried him to see the lodgings in Hyde Street; but it was the family and Mr. Young, the solicitor, who managed him and his concerns; they had a general power of attorney to dispose of his business and his property; and though the deceased executed the formal instrument, and the assignments and the drafts, it is quite manifest that the wife, the brothers and the nephew, as I before mentioned, sanctioned by Mr. Young, very naturally and very properly conducted every thing; they, considering it unnecessary to take out a commission of lunacy, as the deceased was very calm, acted for him; they placed him in lodgings in Hyde Street, and they removed him when Mrs. Strutt and her other lodgers would no longer suffer him to remain.

Just previous to his going into these lodgings the deceased fancied that his nephew would be-[447]-come insane and wish to murder him: the nephew, to humour the deceased's fancy, and not excite irritation, for a time left the house; still, so strong was the delusion that the deceased would have the house searched at night, and secured in order to protect him from this nephew, "who looked wild and was becoming insane." And yet, with the inconsistency not unusual with insane persons, he suffered this nephew to be one of the persons to dispose of his concerns under the power of attorney. What I have been referring to was about the very period when he was making this will, viz. in June, 1826. The day before the execution of this will he was lodging in Hyde Street; and the account of his general conduct while there strongly marks a continuance of his disorder: among other circumstances, there was one of manifest delusion: the deceased fancied that the statue at the top of Bloomsbury church often nodded at him, and could not be dissuaded from it, nor convinced that it was fancy only. It was, as I have stated, about this period that he again commenced will-making.

It was argued that the deceased was not insane when he made this will because he benefited by it his wife, his brother John, and his nephew; so that it was said there was no evidence of delusion affecting his testamentary disposition: but an inconsistency of that kind is no proof of the absence of disorder. He suffered his brother and his nephew to manage his concerns; and he suffered his nephew to drive him out in his gig. Insane persons are not consistent with themselves in every particular, nor does the same delusion always haunt them. [448] Without, then, entering minutely into the circumstances, I am satisfied by the evidence that the deceased had not recovered into a state of perfectly sound mind, but that his derangement continued generally during these months, so as to require a clear and decided lucid interval to be proved, if indeed it could be established: for where there is not actual recovery, and a return to the management of himself and his concerns by the unfortunate individual, the proof of a lucid interval is extremely difficult.

Insane persons, who have an object to effect, will often set about it with method, and in a manner apparently rational: it is difficult, even for experienced persons, to detect their insanity. It is no reflection, then, upon the solicitor that he was deceived, and did not discover the deceased's derangement. Mr. Young states that he received from the deceased his testamentary instructions; and he seems not to have suspected his sanity; he therefore took no means to ascertain the fact, and why? because he was ignorant of the delusion under which the deceased had previously, and at that very time, laboured, and also of the particulars of his general conduct. Mr. Young himself gives an account of behaviour not far distant from unsoundness of mind: it is thus that he deposes on the ninth interrogatory: "He does not believe that the deceased was at times, either previous or subsequent to the execution of the will of the 4th of July, 1826, of unsound mind: the respondent did not at any time in June and July, 1826, or for several months either before or after the execution of the said will; neither did his fellow-witnesses, or either of [449] them to his knowledge or belief, treat the said deceased as a person of deranged intellect or unsound mind:" and yet there is clear proof of it in 1825, by the deceased having been attended by a keeper. "The respondent not being upon terms of intimacy with the deceased, does not know how his family treated him." So that Mr. Young was only resorted to in order to advise the family on formal legal proceedings. Further on, upon the same interrogatory, in reference to some declarations, he says: "After a meeting (the date of which he does not recollect) between the deceased and John Thomas, at which they had quarrelled upon the subject of the affairs of the testator's father, which subject frequently led to violent language between them; the respondent upon that occasion may have said 'that the deceased was not fit to be talked to on business after such disputes,' or to that effect: the respondent always finding that after such disputes the deceased was, from irritability of temper, apt to revert to the immediate cause of the dispute rather than confine his consideration to the business in discussion before the dispute arose. That at different times the respondent has refused to proceed in conversations of business with the deceased, whilst under excitement originating from such disputes with John Thomas and other members of his family; and, at others, respondent, by representing to him that he would not sanction violent language between relations, and if it were persisted in would postpone further conversation, has succeeded in obtaining the deceased to attend to the ori-[450]-ginal subject of meeting. He does not know that the deceased was otherwise than of sound mind during June and July, 1826."

The witness, therefore, it is clear, knew nothing of the deceased's delusion as to the statue upon the top of Bloomsbury church, nor in respect to his fancied apprehensions from his nephew.

Again, on the thirteenth interrogatory, Mr. Young thus deposes: "He does in his conscience, so far as his intercourse (limited as it was) with the deceased enabled him to judge, disbelieve that the mind of the deceased was always, after the month of April, 1826, in some degree deranged: respondent scarcely ever having occasion to converse with the deceased except on matters of business, and making allowance for ill health, and allowing him more time for collecting his thoughts and expressing his sentiments than a person in good health would require, found him competent to business: but it has occurred upon several occasions, when the respondent has attended the deceased by appointment upon business, that respondent has considered it right to defer such business either from the deceased being feeble from ill health, or under irritation arising from causes into which respondent did not consider it incumbent upon him to inquire; upon all occasions being aware that the deceased was not upon friendly terms with his family in general. The respondent does not recollect to have heard that the deceased was in June, 1826, labouring under a delusion that his nephew, Thomas Thomas, would cut his, the deceased's, throat, or that his brother, John Thomas, [451] would murder him: but respondent has heard and believes that Thomas Thomas, who for many years lived in the deceased's house, did in or about the said month of June quit the same in consequence of some disagreement with the deceased, but he does not know and cannot form any belief as to the particular circumstances or grounds of such disagreement."

The whole account, therefore, of this gentleman shews that he was quite ignorant of the cause of the deceased's condition, nor did he inquire into it. I infer, then, from Mr. Young's own evidence, that the deceased had not recovered, and that not being intimately acquainted with his family, Mr. Young did not ascertain what was the real state of his mind.

The Court sees no reason to doubt the fairness and sincerity of Mr. Young's conduct and testimony; but he had not before him the whole facts relative to the deceased's condition of mind, and he formed an erroneous judgment.

But what passed in the preceding year? In May, 1825, the deceased went and gave instructions for a will. Mr. Young did not then detect any disorder of mind: he prepared the draft of the will; he sent it to him on the 4th of June; and yet from Groom's and Evans' own witness, Mr. Vincent, it appears the deceased, in May, June, and July, 1825, was in a state of decided insanity; and during a great part of the time was under the care of a keeper, which Mr. Young neither knew nor discovered.

A strong symptom of insanity is fluctuation of mind—unsteadiness—changeableness. Here are three instruments—the draft of June, 1825, [452] the will of August, 1825, and the will propounded of the 4th of July, 1826: and there are considerable variations in each. Several of the legacies in the draft of June are omitted, or altered, or added to in the will of August. Not only are the legacies varied in many respects, and without any apparent reason, but some omissions were supplied at the time of execution. Such are the two legacies, the one of 100*l.* to his sister, Elinor Evison, and another to his sister-in-law, Mrs. Wenlock: these two legacies were interlined at the time of the execution. Here are also the legacies to the executors increased from 100*l.* to 150*l.*; and the other alterations are very material. In the will of August, 1825, the wife has an annuity of 150*l.* and a legacy of 100*l.*; but in the will of July, 1826, the annuity is reduced to 120*l.* and the legacy to 50*l.* And the residue, instead of being given, as under the will of August, to his brothers John and Francis Thomas, and his nephew Thomas Thomas, equally, is left to his brothers Francis and Arthur, and to his nephew John, son of Richard, a deceased brother. The legacy also to John Thomas, the brother, is reduced from 500*l.* to 250*l.* It is not then, I think, probable, that as Young had had several interviews with the deceased, that there would have been any fluctuations at the time of executing the will, if his mind had been steady, and sound, and settled.

These circumstances, therefore, strongly mark the unsettled state of the deceased's mind. Let it not, however, be supposed that the Court holds change of mind, and interlineations in a testamentary instrument, to be, per se, a proof of insanity, but, coupled with the previous insa-[453]-nity and the general description of the deceased's conduct, they are circumstances carrying symptoms of disorder into the act itself. What says the great poet of Nature and master of the passions upon the subject? What is one of the tests of madness that he suggests? Hamlet, being charged with "coinage of the brain," answers:—

> "It is not madness
> That I have uttered; bring me to the test,
> And I the matter will re-word; which madness
> Would gambol from."

Madness, then, varies and fluctuates; it cannot "re-word"—if the poet's observation be well founded; and though the Court would not at all rely upon it as authority, yet it knows from the information of a most eminent physician that this test of madness suggested by this passage was found, by experiment in a recent case, to be strictly applicable, and discovered the lurking disease.(a)

(a) The Court was understood to allude to the case referred to in a note to page 242 of the tenth number of the new series of the Quarterly Journal of Sciences and the Arts. London, 1829.

In this case the deceased did not "re-word;" he varied and added and omitted without any change of circumstances to account for these fluctuations of intention. He assigned no reason, he was asked no reason, for these alterations and changes. It is impossible to surmise what fancies a deluded imagination may take up and act upon; and, on that very account, the law has wisely ordained that, where any delusion exists at the time, it is not necessary [454] to connect that delusion with the act done, and which it is sought to avoid.

Here, indeed, the fancies of the deceased were not wholly unconnected with the testamentary disposition; he fancied his nephew wanted to murder him; he quarrelled with his brother: they were displaced from being executors and residuary legatees, and they have a very inferior benefit; he might not be perfectly consistent in leaving them any thing; and, in doing the act itself, he might be so apparently rational as not to expose his derangement of mind to the solicitor, who had no previous suspicion of it.

Upon the whole, then, for the deceased, after the execution of the will propounded, never once adverted to it in any way, although he lived so long after the act, the Court is of opinion that the will is invalid.

The deceased had been decidedly insane in the spring of 1825; the account given of his subsequent conduct and condition tend strongly to shew that no real recovery had at any time taken place, notwithstanding he had become calmer and could converse rationally upon some matters, yet there were many symptoms of continued disorder; and in the months of May, June, and July he was subject to delusions of mind.

These testamentary acts, first taken up after actual insanity and during its decided existence, are varying and fluctuating, without any change of circumstances or reasonable cause to account for them. I am, therefore, led to conclude that the presumed unsoundness of mind continued, and that the deceased was not in a state of testable capacity, but was non compos [455] mentis at the time when this will was made. I must, therefore, pronounce against the will propounded.

The will of August, 1825, was then propounded apud acta, and upon its being stated that no further evidence could be obtained in support of it than was already before the Court, the Court pronounced also against that will; and that, so far as appeared, the deceased was dead intestate.

Lushington prayed the costs of Groom and Evans out of the estate; they had acted under the advice and opinion of Mr. Young and Mr. Vincent as to the sanity of the deceased.

Per Curiam. They were, no doubt, both sincere and honorable opinions; but the executors were not under the necessity of propounding the will; they had ample opportunity of judging of the deceased's state; and should have decided for themselves. I do not at all blame the executors; they have not acted improperly; but it is not the sort of case in which the Court can give the costs out of the estate.

Costs out of the estate refused.

[456] THE OFFICE OF THE JUDGE PROMOTED BY BURGOYNE v. FREE, D.D. Arches Court, 1st Session, 1829.—Upon the proof, against a clergyman, of repeated and habitual acts of incontinency, coupled with neglect of duty and other conduct affording just scandal and offence to his parishioners, the Court is bound to proceed to deprivation.—Exceptive allegations after publication are stricti juris; and their object being the credit of the witness, not the proof of the matters in issue in the principal cause; 1st. Facts which might have been pleaded in contradiction to the pleas before publication cannot be pleaded in contradiction to a witness: 2ndly. There must be a contradiction to the depositions clear and capable of proof, and shewing that the witness has deposed falsely and corruptly: 3rdly. The matter must arise out of the evidence (not out of the general character) of the witness. Allegation rejected.

[Affirmed, p. 662, post.]

This suit, instituted originally in the Arches Court of Canterbury, by letters of request from the commissary of the Bishop of Lincoln in and throughout the archdeaconry and commissaryship of Bedford, in the diocese of Lincoln, was promoted by Montagu Burgoyne, Esq., against the Rev. Edward Drax Free, D.D., rector of Sutton. in the county of Bedford.

The citation called upon Dr. Free "to answer to certain articles touching his soul's health and (a)[1] the lawful correction and reformation of his manners and excesses, but more especially for the crime of fornication or incontinence; for profane cursing and swearing, indecent conversation, drunkenness, and immorality; for his lewd and profligate life and conversation; for neglect of divine service on divers Sundays, using the porch of the church of the said parish as a stable, and foddering cattle therein, and turning out swine into the [457] said church-yard; for refusing the use of the said church for vestry meetings lawfully called; for converting to his own use and profit the lead on the roof of the chancel of the said church; for refusing, and neglecting, and delaying to baptize or christen divers children of his parishioners; for refusing and neglecting to bury sundry corpses, and for requiring illegal fees to be paid to him for baptisms and burials; and further to do and receive as unto law and justice should appertain."

On the 9th of November, 1824, an appearance was given for the party cited, but under protest. This protest was on the 20th of January, 1825, over-ruled.(a)[2] On the 3d of February the defendant appeared absolutely, and, on the same day, the articles, thirty-one in number, with five exhibits annexed, were brought in. On the 17th of February the admission of the articles was debated, when the Court rejected two, and directed four others to be reformed. On the 24th of February, a prayer being made that the articles, as reformed, should be admitted, the proctor for the defendant alleged that he had appealed, and he was assigned to prosecute the same by the first session of Easter Term; but upon the 25th of April (viz. the second session of Easter Term), the appeal not having been prosecuted, the Court admitted the articles.

The articles, as they stood reformed and were admitted after the writ of consultation (see post, p. 467), were in substance as follows:—

1. That by the ecclesiastical laws, canons, [458] and constitutions of the Church of England, all clerks in holy orders are liable (for the offences set forth in the citation and heading of the articles) to be suspended from the exercise of their clerical functions and deprived of their ecclesiastical benefices.

2. The due and lawful institution and induction of Dr. Free, in December, 1808, to the rectory of Sutton, in the county of Bedford.

3. An authentic copy of the act of his admission and institution. The identity.

4. Rejected before prohibition.

5. That you, Edward Drax Free, in the latter end of 1810, engaged Maria ———, spinster, as a servant, and that she thereupon entered into your service and went to reside in the said rectory house; that you soon afterwards formed a criminal connection with her, and that she thereby became pregnant by you; that you continued to carry on such criminal connection during the time she remained in your service, which was for about six months; that upon her leaving your service she was pregnant, and in the month of August, 1811, was delivered of a bastard child in the workhouse of the parish of Saint George, Hanover Square, in the county of Middlesex; and that in July, 1811, she, Maria ———, made oath before one of the magistrates of Middlesex that she had never been married; and that you were the father of the child or children of which she then was pregnant, and likely to be born out of lawful matrimony and to become chargeable to the said parish; that the said bastard child died soon after its birth, and that you paid all the expences that had been incurred in consequence of the [459] delivery of the said spinster of the bastard child.

6. Exhibited a true copy of the said examination on oath.

7. That you, Edward Drax Free, in the latter end of 1812, or the beginning of 1813, engaged Catherine ———, spinster, as a servant, and she thereupon entered into your service, and went to reside in the said rectory house; that you soon afterwards formed a criminal connection with her, and she became pregnant by you; that you continued to carry on such criminal connection for several months during the year 1813; that the said Catharine ——— left your said service, she being at such time pregnant by you, and was on the 21st of November, 1813, at Thundridge, in the county of Hertford, delivered of a female bastard child; and that on the 26th of February, 1814, she made oath before one of the magistrates of the said county that she was so delivered of a female bastard child on the said 21st of November, and that the same was likely to become chargeable to the parish; and that you did get her with child of the said bastard; and that an order was thereupon made upon you to pay and allow a certain sum for the support of such child, which was accordingly paid by you for some time.

---

(a)[1] In the heading of the articles the words "your soul's health and," "the crime of fornication or," were struck through after prohibition, agreeably to the order of the Court of King's Bench.

(a)[2] Burgoyne v. Free, 2 Add. 405, 414.

8. Exhibited the said original examination on oath.

9. That you, Edward Drax Free, some time in the beginning of 1814, engaged Margaret ———, spinster, as a servant, and she thereupon entered into your service, and that you soon afterwards formed a criminal connection with her, and she became pregnant by you: [460] and that in the beginning of August, 1814, she left your house, and on or about the 14th day of the said month was delivered of a child, begotten by you; that some time afterwards she returned to your service, and that you thereupon renewed your criminal intercourse with her, and she again became pregnant by you, and again left your house, and some time in the month of November, 1815, was delivered of another child, begotten by you, and that shortly afterwards she again returned to your service, and you again renewed your said criminal intercourse with her, and she again became pregnant by you, and again left your house, and on or about the 24th day of March, 1817, was delivered of another child, begotten by you, and that shortly afterwards she again returned to your service, and you again renewed your criminal intercourse and connection with her; that the said Margaret ——— was for about five years in your said service, and during such time you carried on such criminal intercourse and connection with her as aforesaid.

10. That you, some time in or about February, 1818, engaged Ann ———, widow, as a servant, and she thereupon entered into your service, and went to reside in the said rectory house, and that you soon afterwards took indecent liberties with her person, and several times urged her and endeavoured to form a criminal intercourse and connection with her; that she refused to comply with your desires, and resisted your importunities, and quitted your service at the latter end of 1822.

11. That you, in December, 1822, engaged Maria ———, spinster, as a servant, and she [461] thereupon entered into your service, and went to reside in the said rectory house; that you soon afterwards formed a criminal intercourse and connection with her, and she became pregnant by you; and in the beginning of May, 1823, she being then about three months gone with child by you, was prematurely delivered of such child, and that she thereupon left your service.

12. That you, in the beginning of June, 1823, engaged Eliza ———, spinster, as a servant, and she thereupon entered into your service, and went to reside at the said rectory house; that you attempted to take indecent liberties with her person, and urged her and endeavoured to form a criminal intercourse and connection with her; that she refused to comply with your desires, and resisted your importunities, and in consequence of such your conduct and behaviour towards her she did, about a week after she so entered your service, quit the same.

13. That you, for several years past have had and kept in the said rectory-house various obscene and indecent books, containing obscene and indecent prints, and particularly Aristotle's Master-piece; that you have frequently shewn the same to divers persons, and particularly to the said Ann ———, Maria ———, and Eliza ———, during the time they respectively resided in your service; that you frequently made use of obscene language in your conversation, and exposed your person indecently to the said females.

14. That you for several years past have addicted yourself to habitual and excessive drinking of wine and spirituous liquors, and par-[462]-ticularly rum, so as to be frequently much intoxicated; and also frequently been guilty of profane cursing and swearing; that you have at various times sworn at your servants and labourers, and made use of much profane language and many oaths.

15. That you, on a Friday in the month of February, 1823, about four o'clock in the afternoon, were intoxicated, and being in the church-yard of the said parish, and a lamb belonging to you having been found dead, you swore at James Steers, then employed by you as a gardener and to look after your farming concerns, and called him a damned stupid fool and a damned thief, which expressions you repeated immediately afterwards on the same day in your own yard, adjoining the said rectory-house.

16. That you, on a day on or about Christmas, 1823, were much intoxicated, and that on your then coming out of the said rectory-house you fell down, and on getting up again you went into the church-yard of the said parish, and that both in your said house and in the said church-yard you made use of much profane language.

17. That the duty always accustomed to be done at the said church on a Sunday has been the morning service and a sermon, and that on Sunday the 5th of December, 1819, you, without just cause or impediment, wholly omitted to perform such service, and also on Sunday the 25th of November, 1820, and on every Sunday subsequent thereto, until Sunday the 24th of December following, and that you also omitted to perform any such service on Sunday the 28th of January, 1821, and that on the aforesaid [463] Sundays respectively no divine service whatever was performed in the said church.

18. That you for many years past have been in the habit of turning swine, horses, and cows into the church-yard of the said parish, and of using the church-porch as a stable, and foddering cattle therein, and that a considerable quantity of dung has in consequence thereof frequently been collected and remained for a long time in such church-porch; that considerable damage has been done to the soil, and many of the grave-stones in the church-yard have been broken by the said horses, and the ground therein turned up by the swine, and sometimes perforated as low as the coffins therein; that the Archdeacon of Bedford, at his parochial visitation, did, on or about the 18th of June, 1823, admonish you not to turn swine into the said church-yard in future, but that notwithstanding such admonition you have continued to turn swine therein as you had done before.

19. That there are two keys to the doors of the church, one whereof is kept by you as rector, and the other by the churchwarden; that there is an outer door to the chancel of the church, to which there is only one key, which is in your possession, and that by the means of such chancel door you can obtain access to the church; that vestry meetings for the parish have been customarily held in the said parish church, and that at Easter, 1821, 1823, and also 1824, notice was duly given of vestry meetings to be held for the said parish, and that a short time previous to the times of each of such vestry meetings so to be held, you obtained ac-[464]-cess to the church by means of the chancel door, and bolted the church door on the inside thereof, and thereby prevented the churchwardens and parishioners from meeting in vestry, and refused to permit the church to be opened for the said purpose; and that you have also at other times prevented the churchwardens and parishioners from entering the church and holding vestries therein in pursuance of due notice previously given for that purpose.

20. That in 1820, the roof of the chancel of the church being covered with lead, you, without any lawful authority in that behalf, caused the roof to be stripped of the lead, and slates to be substituted thereon in its stead; and that you thereupon sold and disposed of such lead, the money arising from which (after paying for such slating) you converted to your own use, and that the same amounted to a considerable sum, over and above the expence of such slates.

21. Rejected before prohibition.

22. That on Sunday the 21st of January, 1821, the child of Thomas Smith and Ann, his wife, parishioners and inhabitants of the parish, was brought to the said church to be christened; that you then refused to christen such child until a sum of money was paid to you for the same; that Smith thereupon paid the sum then so demanded by you; but that, having received such sum, you declared that the same was for the baptism of a former child of Thomas and Ann Smith, which had been performed by you; and you then demanded a further sum of money for the baptism of the child then brought to you; that they refusing to pay such further demand, you refused to baptize the child, and [465] such child was not baptized. That in April or May, 1823, the corpse of a child of Thomas Smith and his wife was brought to the church-yard for burial, due notice thereof having been previously given to you; that you then refused to perform the funeral service, and to bury such corpse, until the sum of four shillings, as a fee for such burial, was paid to you; and you then made use of many quarrelsome words; that in consequence of such your refusal the said corpse was kept a considerable time in the church-yard; that you at last buried the same, and compelled Smith to pay the fee of four shillings.

23. That on a Sunday in August, 1823, a child of James Randall, of the parish of Sutton, and of Amy, his wife, was brought to the church to be baptized; that you at first refused to baptize such child until a sum of mony as a fee was paid to you for the same; that the child was detained some time at the church; that you afterwards baptized such child without a sum of money being paid for the same, but then expressed yourself angrily towards Amy Randall, and desired her never to come to the church again.

24. That a child of John Saville and of his wife, parishioners and inhabitants of the parish, died in or about Michaelmas 1820; that on the following Monday application was made to you to bury the corpse on the following day; that you then declared you were going out, and would not bury it until the Wednesday, and made use of profane language; and on the following day, being Tuesday, the corpse being [466] extremely offensive and unfit to be kept any longer without burial, and a grave being prepared, application was again made to you at the rectory-house to bury the corpse on the same day, when you again refused: and that the same was not buried until the next day, being Wednesday.

25. That in October, 1822, the corpse of a child of Thomas Gurry, and of his wife, parishioners and inhabitants of the parish, was brought to the church-yard for burial; and on the 31st of December, 1822, or 1st January, 1823, the corpse of a child of William Giddins, and his wife, also parishioners and inhabitants, was brought to the church-yard for burial; and that in July, 1823, the corpse of a child of Thomas Smith, and Ann, his wife, also parishioners and inhabitants, was brought to the church-yard for burial, due notice thereof having been previously given to you on each of such occasions; that you refused to perform the funeral service, and to bury such corpses respectively, until the sum of four shillings for each of such burials was paid to you as a fee for the same; that such sum of money was paid to you accordingly, previous to your performing the funeral service, and burying such corpses.

26. That by such your excesses, and the gross impropriety and immorality in your conduct, in the several preceding articles set forth, you have given great offence to the parishioners and inhabitants of the said parish; and that by reason thereof they have declined generally to attend, and do not attend, divine service in the parish church; and that for a considerable time past the congregation at such service has [467] consisted commonly of one or two poor persons, and of a few poor children only.

27. That at the Michaelmas visitation for the year 1823, held on the 24th of October, by the Archdeacon of Bedford, the churchwarden, overseer, constable, and some of the parishioners of the parish of Sutton made two several presentments to the archdeacon or to his official, wherein they presented several of your excesses and improprieties, and immorality of conduct hereinbefore set forth, and in supply of proof of the premises, exhibits true and authentic copies of the two original presentments.

The 28th, 29th, and 30th were the usual formal articles.

The 31st. That Edward Drax Free be duly and canonically punished and corrected according to the exigency of the law, and also be condemned in costs.

After the Court had admitted these articles on the second session of Easter Term the proceedings were stayed by a rule having been granted, by the Court of King's Bench, to shew cause why a prohibition should not issue to the Ecclesiastical Court (Free, D.D. v. Burgoyne, 5 Barn. & Cress. 400, 765); and the suit thus remained till the 27th of May, 1826, when the proctor for the promoter brought in a copy of an order of the Court of King's Bench of the tenor following:—"It is ordered that a prohibition issue as to proceeding against the plaintiff for fornication or incontinence, for the purpose only of his soul's health and the reformation [468] of his manners; and it is further ordered that a writ of consultation issue as to proceeding against him for those offences, for the purpose of suspension or deprivation or other punishment merely clerical, and also as to all the other matters charged against him in the libel in the Court below." The writ of consultation was brought in; (a) but in con-

(a) The writ of consultation was in substance as follows:—George the Fourth, &c. &c. to the Right Worshipful Sir John Nicholl, Knight, Doctor of Laws, Official Principal of the Arches Court of Canterbury, greeting: whereas Edward Drax Free, rector of the parish of Sutton, in the county of Bedford, hath shewn to us, in our Court before us, that whereas by a statute made and passed in the parliament of His late Majesty George the Third, in the twenty-seventh year of his reign, it was (amongst sequence of a [469] writ of error in the matter of the prohibition, all proceedings in the Spiritual Court upon the writ of consultation were, on the 17th of June, directed to be stayed till the 4th day of the then next Michaelmas Term inclusive; but this order not being renewed, the articles as reformed were, on the 20th of November, admitted, and the proctor for the defendant was assigned to [470] answer thereto the next Court, when he alleged the cause to be appealed to the High Court of Delegates. On the 6th of December he was assigned further to prosecute the appeal the first session of next term. On that day he alleged he should not proceed any further in the cause; but the Court having assigned him to answer the articles the next Court, under pain of suspension, on the third session, to save his contumacy, he gave a negative issue, and again alleged that he should not proceed any further as proctor for Dr. Free, another proctor having exhibited on his behalf: on the 4th session the registrar of the Court of Arches stated that he had been served with an inhibition under seal of the High Court of Delegates.

The libel of appeal, in its second article, in substance pleaded: that the Judge of the Court of Arches did, "by his order or decree bearing date the by-day after Hilary Term (17th February, 1825), reject the 4th and 21st; direct the 5th, 11th, 13th, and 19th articles to be reformed; and admit to proof the remainder of the articles; and did further, on the 2d Session of Easter Term (25th April, 1825), also admit to proof the 5th, 11th, 13th, and 19th articles, as reformed, and assign the proctor of Dr. Free to answer to the articles (save the 4th and 21st rejected) the next Court: and did further, on the 3d Session of Trinity Term (3d June, 1826), the proctor of the promoter then alleging the articles to have been reformed, assign to hear on admission of the same, as reformed, the next Court; and also that he did afterwards, on the 3d Session of Michaelmas Term (20th [471] November, 1826), admit to proof the said articles as reformed, and assign Dr. Free's proctor to answer thereto the next Court."

---

other things) enacted, "That no suit should be commenced in any Ecclesiastical Court for fornication or incontinence after the expiration of eight calendar months from the time when such offence should have been committed;" yet, nevertheless, that Montagu Burgoyne of East Sheen, in the county of Surry, esquire, well knowing the premises, hath in October, 1824, against the form of the said statute, drawn the said Edward Drax Free into a plea in the Spiritual Court before you, touching and concerning the crime of fornication or incontinence alleged to have been committed by him, the said Edward Drax Free, with divers females in the several and respective years, 1810, 1812, 1813, 1814, 1815, 1817, 1822, as by the libel of the said Montagu Burgoyne, amongst other things, will more fully appear. And whereas the said Edward Drax Free has lately prosecuted and caused to be directed to you our certain writ of prohibition out of our Court before us at Westminster, that you should no further hold the plea aforesaid in the Court Christian aforesaid before you, or any thing further in that behalf attempt, by pretence of which our said writ of prohibition you have from thence hitherto delayed, and yet do delay farther to proceed in the cause aforesaid, as we have understood, to the great damage of the said Montagu Burgoyne, and to the manifest prejudice of the ecclesiastical liberty; wherefore the said Montagu Burgoyne hath in our Court, before us at Westminster, humbly besought us to grant him our aid and assistance in this behalf, and we favourably consenting to the petition of him, the said Montagu Burgoyne, and being unwilling that the cognizance which to the Ecclesiastical Court in this behalf belongs should be further delayed by such false and subtle assertions, because, in our said Court before us at Westminster, it is amongst other things considered by our said Court that the said Montagu Burgoyne may have our writ of consultation to the Court Christian aforesaid, as to proceeding against him, the said Edward Drax Free, for those offences, for the purpose of suspension, or deprivation, or other punishment merely clerical, and also as to all the other matters charged against him in the said libel in the said Court Christian, our said writ of prohibition to the contrary thereof notwithstanding, whereof the said Edward Drax Free is convicted, as it appears to us of record; we therefore being willing that justice should be done to the parties aforesaid, as the law requires, and being unwilling that the said Montagu Burgoyne should be in any wise injured in this behalf, signify to you, and command that you may in that cause lawfully proceed, and further do what you shall know to belong to the said Court Christian as to proceeding against him, the said Edward Drax Free, for those offences, for the purpose of suspension, or deprivation,

On the 26th of May, 1827, Addams on the part of the appellant moved that the Con-Delegates would not assign the cause for hearing before the whole commission until the writ of error was disposed of in the House of Lords.(a)[1]

This motion was opposed by Lushington; and rejected by the Con-Delegates.(b)[1]

Addams then prayed to be heard on act on petition before the whole commission; but the Con-Delegates said: That they could not make such an order against their own decree; but that, if there was any error in the principle by which they had been guided, the order might be reconsidered when the whole commission was assembled.

On the 6th of June, 1827, this application was renewed before the whole commission at Serjeant's Inn.

Addams and Denman (Common Serjeant) for the appellant. [472] If the writ of error had not, in the first instance, been by an oversight moved to the Exchequer Chamber,(a)[2] the Ecclesiastical Court could not have now been in a situation to proceed in the cause: and should the House of Lords reverse the judgment of the Court of King's Bench, and the suit, in the mean time, be suffered to go on in this Court, it would be impossible to put the appellant in statu quo, even by resorting to the expensive remedy of a commission of review.

Dr. Lushington, Dr. Dodson, and Mr. Campbell contrà. The writ of consultation is peremptory on the Court of Arches to proceed: and no appeal should be entertained upon what was not an exercise of judicial discretion, but of obedience to the orders of the superior jurisdiction. The Court of Arches could not suspend the cause.

Per Curiam. The words of the writ are: "We signify and command that you may proceed."

Gaselee, J. It is not unusual for the Court of Common Pleas to suspend its decision in a suit until a similar cause in the course of argument in the Court of King's Bench shall have received a judicial determination.

Argument resumed.

The terms of the commission are, however, imperative upon this Court, and command it to proceed "summarily and without the strict [473] formality of judicature, considering and attending only to the truth of the matter and the mere equity of the case." At least the Court will order the evidence to be taken in the interim, otherwise justice may be defeated by the loss of essential witnesses. If the appellant were conscious of innocence, he would not have thrown so many delays and impediments in the way of this prosecution.

The Judges Delegate, viz., Mr. Baron Hullock, Mr. Justice Littledale, Mr. Justice Gaselee, Dr. Burnaby, and Dr. Pickard,(a)[3] granted the motion; and directed the proceedings in the Ecclesiastical Court to await the decision in the House of Lords.

The House of Lords having affirmed the judgment of the Court of King's Bench,(b)[2] or other punishment merely clerical; and also as to all the other matters charged against him in the said libel, in the said Court Christian, our said writ of prohibition to the contrary thereof before you directed in anywise notwithstanding; provided, nevertheless, that you do not proceed against the said Edward Drax Free on the charges of fornication or incontinence in the said libel above charged, for the purpose only of his soul's health, and the reformation of his manners. Witness, Sir Charles Abbott, Knight, at Westminster, the 26th of May, in the seventh year of our reign.

---

(a)[1] In the writ of error to the House of Lords the sentence of the Court of King's Bench was prayed to be reversed and annulled for the following among other reasons:— "That the suit depending in the Arches Court of Canterbury against the plaintiff in error, as with respect to any charge of fornication or incontinence therein made and contained, is expressly contrary to the provisions of the 27 Geo. 3, c. 44, and consequently that the judgment of the Court of King's Bench, in prohibition of that suit, as with respect to any such charge of fornication or incontinence, should have been absolute and unqualified."

(b)[1] The Con-Delegates were: Dr. Arnold, Dr. Burnaby, Dr. Pickard.

(a)[2] See Free, D.D. v. Burgoyne, 5 B. & C. 765.

(a)[3] Dr. Arnold, having been described in the commission as "Henry" instead of "James Henry," and the counsel for the appellant declining to undertake that no objection on the score of irregularity should subsequently be raised to the proceedings from this error, Dr. Arnold, ex abundanti cautelâ, withdrew.

(b)[2] Free, D.D. v. Burgoyne, 2 Bligh (New Series), 65. S. C. 1 Dow (New Series), 115.

an official copy of their Lordships' judgment was brought into the registry of the High Court of Delegates on the 2d of July, 1828; and on the 11th the appeal from the admission of the articles and exhibits was argued.

Delegates, July 11th, 1828.—Addams for the appellant. The cause is now precisely in the same shape as if there had been no writ of error: and the [474] question is whether under the order of the Court of King's Bench and the writ of consultation the Ecclesiastical Court can proceed in this suit. The order stands thus: "That a prohibition issue as to proceeding against the plaintiff (Dr. Free) for fornication or incontinence for the purpose only of his soul's health and the reformation of his manners; and that a writ of consultation issue as to proceeding against him for those offences for the purpose of suspension or deprivation or other punishment merely clerical." The order then must be taken in this way: that the suit, so far as "the soul's health" is concerned, must abate; but that (if such a form of proceeding be known, and it is competent to the party to institute it) a suit for "suspension or deprivation" may go on without subjecting the Ecclesiastical Court to a prohibition. The order does not authorize a new form of suit: it puts a stop, in toto, to any further proceeding under the present citation; but does not prohibit a proceeding, de novo, under a citation "for suspension or deprivation." This is the only rational construction of the order, which never was intended to interfere with the established practice of the Ecclesiastical Courts. And in those Courts there is no proceeding, ex directo, for a penalty, as for suspension or deprivation, and if there were, this cause can no longer be prosecuted, for the words "suspension or deprivation" are not to be found in the citation. In Stone's case,(a)[1] the form of suit was "pro salute animæ," and a criminal proceeding in the Spiritual Courts is invariably in that form. Oughton, tit. 139.

[475] Another fatal objection is that the articles have been reformed after their admission. On the 25th of April the articles were admitted, and the adverse proctor was assigned to answer. The prohibition was afterwards argued; and in pursuance of the order made by the Court of King's Bench the articles were reformed and then again admitted. This is contrary to all principle and precedent; for it is quite established that articles once admitted are incapable of reform. In Schultes v. Hodgson (1 Add. 318, 321), a proceeding precisely similar to the present, the Court of Appeal admitted additional articles; but the Court in that case said: "Articles when brought in may be reformed and amended under the direction of the Court prior to their actual admission; but when they are once admitted and issue is joined either party is bound by them."

The appellant's counsel then proceeded to argue the point upon which he chiefly relied, viz. that in the Ecclesiastical Court no such suit as for deprivation eo nomine was known; that deprivation was the means of punishment and of producing reformation; but that the proceeding was diverso intuitu—pro salute animæ, which a sentence of deprivation might follow.

To this head of argument the observations on the other side were principally confined.(b)

[476] In the course of the argument the Court made several observations, in substance, and to the effect following:—(a)[2]

Per Curiam. The order of the Court of King's Bench is understated; it permits the Ecclesiastical Court to proceed to a certain extent, and under certain limitations, to a sentence in the present suit. By the order the Ecclesiastical Court is only prohibited, under the 27 Geo. 3, c. 44, from such proceedings as are applicable equally to a layman and a clerk in orders, but not from such as, under the general canon law, apply exclusively to a clergyman in his clerical character. Supposing no writ of prohibition had issued, or that the promoter had voluntarily abandoned that part of the proceeding, "for the purpose of the soul's health," could not the suit still have been persevered in, and a sentence given? For although the terms of the citation may be restricted, the prayer at the end of the articles is general, and they are to be

---

(a)[1] The King's Proctor v. Stone, 1 Hagg. Con. 424.

(b) The substance of these arguments is given in the report of what passed on the writ of error before the House of Lords. See Free, D.D. v. Burgoyne, 2 Bligh (New Series), 65. S. C. 1 Dow (New Series), 115.

(a)[2] Mr. Baron Hullock was absent.

taken together. However, even if in the citation "touching and concerning the soul's health" are struck out as surplusage, the words "to do and receive as unto law and justice shall appertain" are quite sufficient to sustain the jurisdiction, and make a sentence under the articles, every one of which is framed with a view to clerical offences, conformable to the citation. In indictments the punishment is never set out.

The alteration of the articles was to make them accord with the rule of the Court of King's [477] Bench; and such an alteration hardly comes within the principle of reforming articles, it is merely expunging, as a matter of course, that over which the Court has no jurisdiction; and is to inform the Judge that, in giving sentence, he must not proceed "for the soul's health" of the defendant. It was not necessary to reform the articles, nor in point of fact were they reformed, by an application to the Court of Arches. The reform took place upon the writ of prohibition, and is, therefore, the operation of a superior and controuling jurisdiction.

The Court pronounced against the appeal; affirmed the decrees appealed from,(a) and remitted the cause; intimating that from its generality no evidence should be taken on the 14th article.

Arches.—On the first session of Michaelmas Term the remission of the cause was brought in; and witnesses having been examined in support of the articles and exhibits, on the first session of Hilary Term, 1829, publication was prayed; when an allegation on the part of the defendant was asserted. This allegation was debated on the fourth session, and admitted, after some slight amendments by the Court. Upon the admission the Court observed:—

Per Curiam. I am not inclined to strike out any thing that may affect the merits of the case, and ultimately, perhaps, bear upon the costs. The case is founded upon very serious charges; and [478] though the defendant has not hitherto shewn himself very ready to meet the charges in a direct way, yet now that he has arrived at his defence, the Court will allow him the fullest opportunity of establishing it. The cause, from the nature of it, is of the highest importance to him as a clergyman; and as the allegation is generally admissible, I am also the less disposed to refer it back to be reformed from the time at which it is offered; because if the plea, when reformed, should be objected to, the progress of the cause might be delayed till Easter Term; whereas now the witnesses will be examined upon it in the course of the vacation; and if a responsive allegation may be considered necessary, it will be ready by the first session of that term. It is, therefore, the most beneficial course, both for the defendant and the promoter, that the allegation should now be admitted with the slight alterations which the Court has already made with the consent of the defendant's counsel.

Allegation admitted.

This allegation consisted of eleven articles; but, in support of it, no witnesses were examined. It denied the charges of criminal connection and solicitation of chastity; of intoxication, and profane cursing and swearing, and pleaded in explanation and justification of other parts of the articles. It admitted "that a book called or known by the name of Aristotle's Masterpiece, having by accident come into possession of Edward Drax Free, was for some time in his rectory house, and might have been there seen by Maria ———, &c., &c.; but it alleged that the said E. D. [479] Free did not at any time keep (save as aforesaid, if the said book is an indecent and obscene book, which is denied) or shew to the said persons or either of them or others any obscene or indecent book or print." The allegation concluded by excepting to the credit of five female witnesses (in support of the articles) as persons of notoriously bad character.

In reply to this defensive plea a responsive allegation, consisting of one article only, and pleading in support of the several witnesses whose credit had been attacked, was, on the by-day after Hilary Term, brought into the registry; but its admission was not pressed.

On the first session of Easter Term publication was decreed, and the cause concluded, saving exceptive allegations. The proctor for Dr. Free then declared he should proceed no further.

Easter Term. Exceptive allegation.—On the second session Dr. Free, in person, prayed further time for giving in an exceptive allegation; when the Judge continued the assignation to the next session, to allow time for Dr. Free's exhibiting an affidavit of his illness and inability to attend on the last court day. This direction being complied with, the Court, on the third session, assigned Dr. Free to bring into the registry his exceptive allegation three days before the next Court, and to deliver a copy thereof, at the same time, to the proctor for the promoter. The exceptive allegation, coupled with two affidavits, and interrogatories for the purpose of being addressed to the promoter, having been brought in, Dr. Free in person was, on the fourth session, heard in support of their admission.

(a) As set forth in the second article of the libel of appeal. Vide supra, p. 470.

[480] Per Curiam. The present question respects the admissibility of an exceptive allegation tendered by the defendant. The nature of the case is such that every fair means of defence should be allowed; but there are certain rules and boundaries beyond which the Court has no power to proceed. The suit was begun above four years since; but the defendant, instead of meeting the charge and coming to the true question at issue—his guilt or innocence—has resorted to every practicable means, and to every possible Court, trying to take advantage of forms in order to delay the progress of the suit. If, by adopting this course, he has, in some degree, exhausted his pecuniary means, he cannot expect that the Court, in its investigation of the real justice of the case, can on that account deviate from its regular mode of proceeding.

By the measures resorted to by the defendant the promoter could not get an opportunity of beginning to examine his witnesses till last Michaelmas Term. In Hilary Term, publication being prayed, a defensive allegation was given on the part of Dr. Free, in which he stated, it must be supposed, all the grounds he had to offer on his own behalf. But though he had the whole Easter vacation to prove his allegation he did not examine a single witness. Publication of the evidence actually passed, and the cause would thus have been concluded unless exceptive allegations could be offered. The promoter declared he gave no exceptive allegation. If Dr. Free had meant to offer any exceptive plea, it ought to have been asserted on the second session: he was allowed till the third session; and, [481] upon an affidavit then exhibited, the time, under the circumstances, was further extended to the fourth session; but the allegation was directed to be given in and a copy delivered to the adverse party three days before that session. However, the allegation was not brought in according to the order, and, in strictness, the defendant is not entitled now to have its admissibility debated: but if the allegation be really admissible in such a case as the present—more especially where the defendant appears in person and is acting for himself—it would be hardly fitting for the Court to exclude, by a rigid adherence to its order, any thing which might appear of importance to the justice of the case; but, on the other hand, this exceptive allegation must be considered under the ordinary rules and principles of the Court applicable to the admission of such a plea.

Now all exceptive allegations, offered after publication, are stricti juris, because the proofs having been seen there would be great danger of perjury, as well as of endless delays, if further evidence could at that period be loosely or lightly received. Of several rules that apply to such allegations, it may be sufficient to mention one or two.(a) The object of these pleas is the credit of the witness, not the proof or disproof of the facts in issue in the principal cause. Upon the facts in the principal cause all matters must be pleaded before publication, and therefore a party cannot plead in contradiction to a witness [482] what he might have offered in contradiction to the articles or pleas before publication. Here the defendant not only might have pleaded, but did plead, all defensive matter before publication. He not only might have entered, but actually has entered, into all these articles of charge, and stated his defence. He has, however, produced no evidence: and he is clearly not now entitled again to go over the same ground.

Another rule is that the exceptive plea must contain a clear and distinct contradiction to the deposition, and be capable of being proved by witnesses so as to shew that the witness had deposed falsely and corruptly: for, as I have before stated, the true object of an exceptive allegation is not the facts at issue in the principal cause, but the credit of the witness.

(a) Upon the legal nature and object of exceptive pleas, and the principles applicable to them, see Mynn v. Robinson, vol. i. p. 175; and Evans v. Evans, 1 Hagg. Con. 95, in notis.

Another rule is that the exceptions must arise out of the deposition, not out of the general character and conduct of the witness. The general character must, if pleaded at all, be pleaded before publication, and in fact it has in this case been already attacked.

Without, then, entering into more detail, yet, upon these rules, which the Court, being bound to administer justice according to law, has no discretion to infringe, there is no part of this exceptive allegation (as it is called) that is entitled to be admitted. A great portion of it is more in the nature of the defendant's observations upon the evidence than any thing which, even before publication, could be admissible. And in truth there is nothing which would really contribute to Dr. Free's defence: the exceptions, if they could legally be sent to proof, would only add to the expences of the suit. I must remark [483] that there are some affidavits which have been improperly offered: and the interrogatories to the promoter are still more irregular.(a)

On the whole, the Court rejects the allegation, concludes the cause, and assigns it for sentence on the first session of the next term.

Allegation rejected.

Upon the first session of Trinity Term the Court, after Dr. Lushington and Dr. Dodson had commented shortly upon the evidence, submitting in conclusion that it fully established the articles; and after hearing Dr. Free in his own defence, proceeded to give sentence.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This suit against a clergyman for immorality and misconduct, leading, if the charges are proved, to his suspension or deprivation, is of a painful description, both as it respects the individual accused and the body to which he belongs; for a part of the opprobrium will affix most unjustly on that body: most unjustly because, considering that the body of the clergy consists of many thousand persons, it is not extraordinary that a few individuals are to be found who, forgetful of what is due to themselves and the sacred functions they have engaged to discharge, should be guilty of offences disgraceful to their character, even as men; whereas were the subject fairly and candidly [484] considered, it would be acknowledged to be highly creditable to the clergy of the Established Church that so few instances of misconduct occur which require the interposition of legal correction.

The present suit has been long depending, and considerable expence has been incurred; but to those who understand the subject it is quite obvious that neither has the time been consumed, nor have the costs been occasioned, necessarily either from the constitution of the Court or from the manner in which its functions are administered, but that both these inconveniences have arisen from the proceedings of the defendant himself. It need hardly be remarked that, where there exists a disposition to take every possible advantage which the law will afford of obstructing and impeding the proceedings, there is no Court in which a party may not harass his opponent by vexatious expence and delay.

In this case the citation was returned on the 9th of November, 1824; and it may be proper to state what would have been the regular course if the defendant, relying upon his innocence, had fairly met the charge. The articles of charge would have been admitted in that term; the witnesses in support of them might have been examined during the Christmas vacation; the defensive allegation brought in in Hilary Term; the defendant's witnesses examined during the Easter vacation, and the cause heard in the Easter, or at the latest during the Trinity Term of 1825. Thus, if each party had been disposed fairly to have proceeded in the investigation of the truth or falsehood of the offences imputed to Dr. Free, the constitution of the Court and the course of its proceedings would have afforded the means of arriving at the jus-[485]-tice of the case in three or four terms, occupying seven or eight months, and at no very considerable costs.

Some possible circumstances might have occurred in the course of the investigation fairly extending the proceedings a term or two longer: but not necessarily; for what in fact has taken place? Instead of the articles being admitted in Michaelmas Term, 1824, so that the promoter might then proceed to the examination of his witnesses, he was by various means prevented from producing a single witness till the latter end of November, 1828; and here is the cause now heard in June, 1829, while it might have been as well heard in June or July, 1825.

(a) Upon the application of Dr. Free, after the rejection of the exceptive plea, the Court ordered the affidavit and interrogatories that were annexed to it to be delivered to him out of the registry.

It is hardly necessary to trace the suit through all these steps. There was first a protest against the jurisdiction: that protest delayed the bringing in of the articles till Hilary Term, 1825. In that term the articles were admitted, and from their admission an appeal to the Delegates was interposed. In Easter Term, 1825, the appeal not being prosecuted the articles stood admitted; but then the cause was stopped in consequence of an application to the Court of King's Bench for a prohibition.

The matter having thus got into Westminster Hall, the progress of the suit in this Court was suspended for a year and a half. In November, 1826, a writ of consultation, as far as the object of the suit was deprivation, or suspension, or other punishment merely clerical, having at length issued, and an order to stay proceedings for a limited time which had expired not being renewed, on the 20th of November, 1826, the articles, after a slight reform, were re-admitted; and from this re-admission an appeal was again interposed to [486] the Delegates. In February, 1827, an inhibition from the Court of Delegates was served on this Court: but a writ of error having been carried to the House of Lords from the decision of the Court of King's Bench, the cause was suspended in the Delegates till that question was disposed of. At length the Delegates affirmed the decree of the Court of Arches admitting the articles, and the cause was remitted. Thus then in Michaelmas Term, 1828, after a protest against the jurisdiction, appeals to the Delegates, applications for prohibitions, and writs of error, after four years spent in this manner, the cause was in Michaelmas Term, 1828, exactly in the situation it might have been in Michaelmas Term, 1824, if the defendant had at once come forward fairly to meet the charge and assert his innocence: for, in effect, the Court of King's Bench expressed exactly the same opinion on the construction of the statute of the 27 Geo. 3, c. 44, that had been expressed in this Court, viz. that it extended not to a proceeding such as the present; though a few words in the form of the articles—"your soul's health"—might lead to a misconstruction of the view of the statute taken by this Court; as if, provided the charges were established, it were intended merely by spiritual censures to punish incontinences, instead of suspending or depriving the defendant, regard being had to his clerical character.(a)

The cause, however, is now arrived at the stage when the Court is to decide on the guilt or innocence of the defendant in respect to the offences charged; but it is clear that neither is he the party who ought to complain of the delay [487] and expences incurred, nor is the blame imputable to the constitution or administration of this Court. If any means can be devised consistently with the ends of justice to prevent the interposition of vexatious delays, it would be a valuable improvement for the public, and be highly satisfactory to those who may preside in this Court.

Having thus adverted to the conduct of the cause, it becomes now proper to consider the offences charged and the proofs produced.

Dr. Free is a clergyman, and has for many years been incumbent of the rectory of Sutton in the diocese of Lincoln: his incumbency is not denied; and it is fully proved. He is charged with having carried on criminal intercourse with several of his female servants in successive years—from 1811 to 1822—and to have had illegitimate children by three of them—five children in the whole, three of whom were by the same female. He is charged with the intemperate use of liquor, with swearing and employing other improper language, with neglect of duty, with profaning the churchyard with pigs and cattle, with stripping the lead off the chancel and substituting a slated roof, making of the lead a profit for himself; he is charged also with refusing to baptize and bury till the fees he demanded were first paid; and it is alleged that in consequence of his misconduct in these several respects his church was nearly deserted, and his parishioners were driven either to an adjoining parish church or to dissenting meetings.

Such is the substance of the charges, and in support of the various parts thirty-one wit-[488]-nesses have been examined, to each charge several witnesses. To these witnesses very long interrogatories on behalf of the defendant have been administered, which have greatly increased the expence; but the answers, instead of tending to his exculpation, for the most part only confirm more strongly the imputations of misconduct. In Hilary Term, 1829, a defensive allegation was given in contradicting or explaining the charges, and attacking the credit of the witnesses; but though the defendant now expects his own averments to be received as defensive matters, not a single witness was produced in support of that allegation. It only then remains to state the nature and effect of the evidence in support of some of these charges; it is not necessary to go in detail through the whole.

(a) See the observations of the Court upon this point in Oliver and Toll v. Hobart, vol. i. p. 46.

The first charge of criminal intercourse is with a female in 1810, who became pregnant by him; swore before her delivery that he was the father of the child; was confined in the parish of St. George's, Hanover Square, and he paid the expences. To prove this article several witnesses have been examined, the woman herself, who is since married, and two or three persons who depose that she lived with Dr. Free at that time. Her examination before a magistrate in 1811, when previous to delivery she made oath as to her pregnancy and as to the father of the child, is also produced.

The next offence is with another woman in 1813, and she was delivered of a child in 1814; to prove which fact five witnesses have been examined. This woman, who is also since married, gives a full account of her connection with the defendant. She lived about a year in his ser-[489]-vice: it was two or three months before he succeeded in his attempts on her virtue; she became pregnant, went to her father's house near Ware; was there delivered, and there the child was sworn; and from that time to the present Dr. Free has supported it by quarterly payments. Here is the woman's examination after delivery, before the magistrate in 1814; so that the charge is no afterthought to support this suit: here is her father confirming the daughter as to her coming home pregnant, and to her confinement; and here are witnesses who, in corroboration, depose to her having lived with Dr. Free at that period.

The next charge is with another woman who had three children by him; one born in the month of August, 1814, another in November, 1815, and a third in March, 1817. This woman, now in respectable service as a cook and housekeeper, and her sister, who has the care of the second child, the only one now living, have come forward very reluctantly: but the facts are fully deposed to by the former, and are amply corroborated by five or six other witnesses. This woman lived three months in his service before Dr. Free succeeded in having intercourse with her. The defendant and she alone slept in the house; for Dr. Free's domestic arrangements appear to have been well contrived and calculated for seduction and concealment; he kept only one female servant, she was the only person sleeping in the house; his doors and gates were fastened up early in the evening, after which no person was admitted.

One female (the last hired, before the commencement of the suit, in June, 1823), in con-[490]-sequence of his attempts, and the danger to which she was exposed, only staid a few days in his service, and left it without notice on account of that danger. This witness, certainly not a woman of strict morality, thus deposes on the 12th article. "Dr. Free used to follow her about the house to kiss her; and sometimes when he got her up into a corner he used to kiss her, and against her will: there were several reasons why it was particularly disagreeable. The deponent left him in consequence of such his conduct (as well as that of which she will depose); for she was alone in the house with him in the evening and through the night; the house being shut up at an early hour every evening; and she felt she should have difficulty in making herself heard. She quitted his house suddenly without any notice; the deponent was afraid to be longer there with him."

To return, however, to the proofs of Dr. Free having had these three children by the third woman to whom I have referred. Several witnesses depose to the facts of her having lived with Dr. Free, of her being repeatedly, in appearance, in a state of pregnancy, and of her afterwards being absent for a time: and from the sister, who, being an extremely unwilling witness, deposes to nothing material in chief, except that her sister lived with Dr. Free, and that he frequently called upon the witness to pay for fish, she being a dealer in that article, the fact comes out upon an interrogatory put to her by Dr. Free, that her sister's child, a boy about twelve years old, was placed under her care by Dr. Free, and that he paid the expences of its maintenance. [491] In answer to the 3d interrogatory she states: "She first saw Mr. Montagu Burgoyne in the summer of 1823 or 1824; she is not sure which. He said to her, 'You have the care of a child of Dr. Free,' or to that effect: respondent replied 'that she had,' meaning no more than that it was a child placed under her care by Dr. Free: the child came into the room, a boy about twelve years old (in November, 1828, as she believes). When Mr. Burgoyne saw the child, he said, 'I need not ask you (the boy) whose child you are;' and he remarked to the deponent how like the child was to his father. The respondent is not sure whether she did or did not then tell Mr. Burgoyne that she did not think that Dr. Free was the father of the child, though she might suspect it; she believes that she said something of that kind to him, for he told her that it was her sister's child by Dr. Free, and that there were others. The respondent told him truly that she did not know that; that all she did know was that Dr. Free had placed the child under her care, and paid for its support and education. The respondent does not remember now more particularly what passed on that occasion; she was taken by surprize, and was flurried at hearing what Mr. Burgoyne said." So that it is quite clear that this child was placed under the witness' care by Dr. Free, and that he maintained it; this, coupled with the evidence of the pregnancy, leaves no rational doubt that he was the father of the child.

It is unnecessary to pursue this disgusting and [492] profligate history, or to stop to inquire whether another woman (who deposes to having become pregnant by him and miscarrying in his house in 1823) is or is not deserving of full credit. If the proof of Dr. Free's misconduct had rested on that charge alone it might open the case to some doubt; but here it is fully established that he is the father of at least three illegitimate children; and that for a number of years he has been guilty of carrying on a most depraved and vicious intercourse with his female servants, and of shamefully converting his rectory-house into a convenient place for secretly pursuing his scandalous immoralities. If the act of parliament (27 Geo. 3, c. 44) could be held to cover such gross profligacy as is exhibited in the evidence of this case, how could the Church be protected against such unworthy members? The proof of adultery might frequently rest upon the birth of the child, and that proof would not under ordinary circumstances be fully attained till after the expiration of eight months.

This part, then, of the charge being substantiated, it is needless to investigate the other parts in their details. Though not an habitual drunkard to absolute intoxication, yet it is satisfactorily established that Dr. Free frequently indulged in the intemperate use of liquors. His improper language and passionate abuse of those around him are proved, and were highly unbecoming the minister of a parish: his neglecting to do duty, deposed to by several witnesses, is not accounted for by any evidence shewing that the omission only occurred when the [493] church was under repair, or in consequence of other sufficient reason. Here are a cloud of witnesses who prove that the church-yard was converted into a farm-yard and pigstye; his cattle foddered there; the swine rooting up the graves and levelling the mounds so as greatly to distress the feelings of those whose relations were buried in the ground. The stripping the lead off the chancel and replacing it with a light slating of much less cost and value is in no degree explained by any proof of the expediency of such a change. His conduct respecting baptisms and funerals was in some instances extremely reprehensible. Complaints at visitations in the form of presentments were made, but produced no reform nor correction. And what has been the consequence of such protracted forbearance, and of the omission of any early measure speedily to relieve the parish? That which must naturally be expected; that his parishioners became disgusted; that they have deserted their parish church: some go to church at Potton, others go to dissenting meetings; and the greatest possible injury is done to the feelings and morals of the parishioners and the character of the Established Church.

Slight offences, accidental irregularities arising from the ordinary infirmities of human nature, might be corrected by admonition or suspension. The punishment of the individual is but a secondary object. Even the example made of him in order to deter others is, I trust, hardly necessary: because few, if any, ministers of the Church would be likely to pursue the same course: but here is a crying grievance—a disgusting nuisance in the parish: no hope [494] exists of bringing back the defendant and his parishioners to entertain those feelings of mutual respect and confidence which ought to subsist. It is therefore the duty of the Court (however painful that duty may be) to pronounce the articles sufficiently proved; to decree that Dr. Free be deprived of the living of Sutton, and to condemn him in the costs of the present proceedings.

The Court then signed the sentence of deprivation, which was, in substance, as follows:—(a)

"Whereas there is depending, &c." in which Dr. Free "has been convented to answer to certain positions or articles to be objected against him for the lawful correction and reformation of his manners and excesses, and more especially for incontinence," &c. &c. [setting forth the remaining charges]; "and whereas we John Nicholl, Knight, Official Principal of the Arches Court," &c. [having read the proofs and heard advocates on the part of the promoter, and Dr. Free in his own defence], "having maturely deliberated upon the proceedings had in the cause and the offences proved, exacting by law deprivation of ecclesiastical promotion, do hereby pronounce, decree, and declare that the said Reverend Edward Drax Free, Doctor in Divinity, by reason of the premises, ought by law to be and is deprived of his ecclesiastical promotions, [495] and especially of the said rectory and parish church of Sutton; and all profits and benefits appertaining thereto; and do condemn him in costs."

BEARBLOCK AND BEARBLOCK v. MEAKINS. Arches Court, Trinity Term, 21st July, 1829.—To set out the tithe of potatoes by the tenth basket, as raised, and immediately remove the nine parts is not sufficient: a reasonable quantity must be raised before the setting out in order to afford to the tithe-owner a fair opportunity of view.

[See Thompson v. Bearblock, 1832, 3 Hagg. Ecc. 795.]

This cause was instituted by Walter and John Bearblock for the recovery of certain tithes of potatoes. The libel, in substance, pleaded:—

1. The right of New College, Oxford, to the tithes of Hornchurch parish Essex; and that Walter and John Bearblock were the lessees thereof.

2. The 2 & 3 Edw. 6, c. 13.

3. That Meakins occupied, in the parish, two farms (home and Mayland's Green), containing 240 acres, of which, in 1828, he cropped twenty-three acres with potatoes.

4. That in 1826 he cropped three acres of the home farm with potatoes, and took up the crop, leaving the tenth row as tithe; that he was then informed the tithe would not be taken in such manner, but that it must be lawfully severed by heaps, or be measured; which he refused to do: that he afterwards took up the tithe rows and sold the same, and that such tithe is due.

5. That on the 29th June, 1828, Meakins sent the titheman notice that he should take up potatoes on the following day from half past seven till six, but did not mention any hour when the tithe should be viewed, and that he offered that, if sacks were sent, his men should [496] sack the tithe for the lessees' accommodation: that on the 30th of June, Brett, the titheman, and George Bearblock attended at the home farm about nine o'clock, when they found the men taking up potatoes and setting out the tithe by the prittle basket, the contents of which were shot down on the ground. That they were unable to compare the tithe, and therefore left the same, whereby it was lost.

6. An offer to sell the tithe at 30s. per acre; that Meakins would not give more than 16s.; that, upon this being refused, Meakins declared "he must go on setting the tithe out as before." That George Bearblock then proposed to take the tithe by equal heaps, or by measure, or by weight, at the end of the day's taking up, or twice a day; that Meakins not agreeing, George Bearblock then said "that if Meakins continued to set out his tithe as he had commenced it would be left on the ground, on which Meakins declared that he had not settled for the tithe of 1826, and that he did not choose to have the tithe set out by heaps or measure."

7. Further notice for 2d July, when the tithe was set out by the 10th prittle basket as before, and left on the ground.

8. That, to harass the titheman, notice was given for the 4th and 7th July to take up potatoes at Mayland's Green farm from seven till six, and to tithe hay at seven, and also hay at the home farm at six o'clock on the 7th July; that on such days the tithe was set out as before.

9. That the tithes of potatoes in Hornchurch parish are for the most part compounded for, [497] but, if taken in kind, they have been usually, when dug up, put into sacks, and at the close of the day, or on the next day, the whole quantity has been measured, and the tithe severed in the presence of the titheman; that on no occasion has the tithe been tendered in prittle baskets. That, on the 4th July, George Bearblock inquired of Meakins "whether, by his offer to put the potatoes into sacks, he meant to put the whole into sacks, or only empty the tithe prittle baskets into sacks, instead of on the ground;" that Meakins declared "he only meant to put the tithe in sacks, and that he had no intention of altering his mode of setting out the tithe."

(a) Upon the power of the Judge of the Arches Court to pronounce a sentence of deprivation, see the note to Oliver and Toll v. Hobart, vol. i. p. 47.

10. Notices for the 9th, 10th, 11th, 14th, 16th, 17th, and 18th of July. That on some occasions when Brett attended he found no potatoes taken up, and, at others, that the tithe had been set out by the prittle basket.

11. Notice, 20th July, to remove the tithe.

12. Notices for 21st, 22nd, 23rd, 24th, 25th, and 26th of July, and several subsequent days. That on the 4th of August Brett attended at the home farm at five o'clock in the morning, and after waiting twenty minutes without the work people coming, he went away.

13. Notices for the 30th of September and following days at Mayland's Green farm, and for the 1st and 3rd of October at the home farm (distant upwards of a mile from the other farm), and for tithing pigs on the 1st. That, on the 3rd, Brett and Wells went to the home farm, and afterwards to Mayland's, where the men were taking up "Manleys," potatoes of early growth and greater value, and separating from them the "stags," which ran from the true sort [498] and were much inferior; and that the tithe set out consisted of two heaps of "stags," and the eighteen baskets removed were filled with "Manleys."

14. Notices for the 6th and following days at the home farm. That Brett attended at the home farm at seven o'clock, and found that ten baskets were not nearly filled; that he then went to the other farm, where no tithe was set out, and on his return to the home farm at a quarter past ten he found one basket shot down, nine having been removed; and, on again proceeding to Mayland's, two baskets out of twenty had been shot down; that the tithe could not be compared, and was left.

15. That Brett attended, on the 11th of October, at the home farm at ten minutes before eight o'clock, when two heaps were shot down, eighteen baskets having been carried away. That he then proceeded to Mayland's about five minutes past eight, but no potatoes had been taken up. That, on the 24th of October, George Bearblock attended with Challis, an additional titheman, and found the nine parts of the potatoes dug up already removed.

16. Notice to remove the tithe.

17. The several notices, as exhibits.

18. That the parish of Hornchurch is extensive, and, with the tithing connected therewith, consists of about 7000 acres.

19. That the tithes libellate for 1828 were of the value of at least 40l.

20. That application had been made, without success, to Meakins to satisfy the lessees for the tithe.

21, 22, 23. Concluding articles.

[499] On this libel five witnesses were examined.

Meakins, in his answers, admitted the notices and the mode of setting out the tithe to have been as alleged; but denied any unfairness or vexatious conduct, or that there was any usage in Hornchurch parish of setting out potato tithe by the heap, or by measure.

The Reverend James Bearblock, the father of the promoters, deposed that, for ten years, it was the usage in Hornchurch parish to set out the tithe by sacks or measure; he did not, however, mention at what period: and he also stated that the tithe, when taken in kind, had since 1826 been usually offered in sacks heaps. It appeared from his evidence that Meakins was almost the only farmer who did not compound.

On the part of Meakins an allegation was admitted, which pleaded:—

1. That until 1826 the tithe was, without any objection, for many years taken by the tenth row by Messrs. Bearblock and their father, the former lessee. That the tithes have never, when taken in kind, been set out by measure at the end of the day, but have since 1826 been usually tendered in prittle baskets: that the tithes of potatoes in Hornchurch parish, and vicinity, have been, and still are, frequently taken in kind by the tenth prittle basket.

2. That the tithe rows of potatoes for 1826 were sold in consequence of the Messrs. Bearblock then refusing, for the first time, to take the tithe in that manner; and that they had refused 3l., the produce thereof, after deducting 16s. for carriage and market charges.

3. That, on the 3d of October, no "stags" were [500] taken up; but only "Manleys" and "white kidneys" (of equal value); and that the tenth of each sort was fairly set out.

4. That the potatoes were always taken up as near the times appointed by the notices as was practicable; that the tithe was always duly and fairly set apart; the contents of one prittle basket being shot down before the removal of the other nine, which were then carried to another part of the same field, only a few yards distant, for washing and sorting. That the tithe could not have been set out in the manner required by the lessees without losing the next day's market and diminishing the value; and that there was always time for the titheman to compare and select the tithe, if he attended upon notice.

5. The custom in Hornchurch parish, in the early part of the season, to send potatoes to market the evening on which they are taken up; and the necessity of washing and sorting them during the day, which could not be done in time for market if the tithe were set out as required by the lessees; and that great injury would be thereby sustained, and from the exposure of the potatoes to the sun and air. The further custom of preserving potatoes in the latter part of the season, for which some are taken to clamps or buildings during the day: that if the lessees' mode of tithing were adopted they could not be got to clamp the same day, and would be greatly injured from the frost.

6. That the titheman has declared frequently that the tithe was justly set out.

7. Notice to the lessees to remove the tithe, and that, in consequence of their refusal, it either rotted, or was stolen.

[501] 8. The offer by Meakins to compound at 16s. per acre; and that G. Bearblock declared if Meakins continued to set out the tithe, as he had begun, it should cost him 500l.(a)

9. The value of the potato tithe in 1828 was not more than 21l. 10s.

10. Concluding article.

On this allegation fourteen witnesses, consisting of landholders, farming men, and potato salesmen, were examined: and they deposed that, by adopting the mode of tithing required by the lessees, great injury would accrue to the crops; that, though tithing by the prittle basket was not in use in Hornchurch parish, it had been allowed; and was the custom in the parishes of Ongar and Chigwell; and that the prittle baskets used by Meakins were all of equal size.

The answers of Messrs. Walter and John Bearblock admitted that the setting out the tithe by the tenth row was, by an arrangement between the farmers and themselves, acquiesced in and never objected to till 1826; that they refused to accept the produce of the tithe for 1826; that notices were regularly given, and that the titheman did not invariably attend; they further admitted the usage in Hornchurch parish as to sending the potatoes to market and the clamping of them; but denied that the setting out the tithe in the mode they required would interfere with a continuance of that usage.

Lushington and Dodson for the Messrs. Bearblock. [502] There is no decided case nor direct authority as to the mode of setting out the tithe of potatoes; but, upon general principles, it must be set out on the spot where they are taken up, and in such a manner that the tithe owner's proportion may with fairness and accuracy be ascertained. The farmer cannot legally set out his tithe in single potatoes: but when the tithe owner or gatherer is expected to attend, there must be a reasonable quantity ready for inspection. The mode of setting out tithe in prittle baskets cannot be sustained. There are two objections to it: first, a prittle basket is not a legal measure (it is supposed to contain two-thirds of a bushel, but the size varies); secondly, if such a mode of tithing be sanctioned and pursued, the tithe gatherer, instead of viewing at the close of the day's work, must be on the land all the time the labourers are employed. The lessees have in this case offered that their agents should attend twice a day, and that is beyond what the law requires. The tithe would be properly set out when capable of being taken either by weight, heaps, or sacks.

(a) This declaration was proved by the evidence of George Bearblock.

Per Curiam. Do heaps contain precisely the same quantity?

Argument resumed.

No: but in that mode of tithing the agent has an opportunity of judging from sight and may make his selection. The system adopted by the defendant cannot be sustained even if it were proved manifestly convenient: the con-[503]-venience or inconvenience of the farmer will not justify a departure from established rules and principles. Tithe in kind cannot be rendered without inconvenience.

It is alleged that the profits of the farmer are diminished if the potatoes remain exposed to the sun; and that it is necessary to sort them with all possible expedition for market: but it cannot be a matter of necessity that they should thus be sorted in the first instance; and if the article is so tender that in June it requires to be speedily housed, where is the necessity of adopting the same plan in October? Tithe, in general, would be greatly depreciated if any mode should be enforced that would require the gatherer to be constantly on the ground. Suppose, in gardens, the tithe owner were obliged to take every tenth strawberry, lettuce, or root of celery, the value of the tithe would fall infinitely short of the expence of collecting it. If the agent attends at the end of the gathering of each day it is sufficient. In the West of England, in setting out tithe due upon fish, the fishermen are bound to give notice of the arrival of the boats and the time of setting out the tithe, and to strew the fish upon the shore for inspection. Lord Stamford v. Luke (1 Wood, 526. 1 Eagle and Younge (Tithe Cases), 699).

For the general principles in respect to setting out tithes, and as analogous cases, they cited Beaumont v. Shilcot (3 Gwill. 944. 3 Wood, 171. 2 Eagle and Y. 226). Bosworth v. Limbrick (3 Gwill. 1110. 2 Eagle and Y. 310). Knight v. Halsey (7 T. R. 86. Gwill. 1554. 2 Eagle and Y. 438). Halliwell v. [504] Trappes (2 Taunt. 54. 2 Eagle and Y. 572). Hall v. Macket (3 Anst. 915. 4 Gwill. 1460. 2 Eagle and Y. 464). Erskine v. Ruffle (3 Gwill. 961. 2 Eagle and Y. 235). Shallcross v. Jowle (13 East, 261. 2 Eagle and Y. 607). Franklin v. Gooch (3 Anst. 682. 4 Gwill. 1441. 2 Eagle and Y. 426). Tennant v. Stubbing (3 Anst. 640. 4 Gwill. 1438. 2 Eagle and Y. 428).

The King's advocate and Pickard contrà. It is unnecessary to comment upon the cases cited for the lessees, it being admitted that there is no precise or positive rule specifically laid down as regards, in particular, the mode of setting out potato tithes. The uncertainty of the law in respect to the mode of tithing this produce is manifest from what is stated and proposed on the other side, that tithing by sacks, weight, or even heaps, would be more fair towards the tithe owner, and not less convenient to the farmer, than by prittle baskets. But the nature of the crop must be considered; it is such as requires immediate protection from the weather at all seasons. In October the potatoes, when taken up, are housed; and it is illegal to remove the produce before the tithe has been ascertained. The profits of the grower, it is proved, are much diminished if the potatoes become bruised or discoloured: hence the risk of an exposure of his crop to the sun and the weather. The potatoes, when put into baskets, are in a fair and fit state for selection: it is not necessary that the baskets should be of a legal standard and measure; and it is in [505] evidence that the prittle baskets used by the defendant are all of an equal size; and fraud is not imputed. In Fanshawe v. Brittain (2 Younge and Jervis, 575) the mode of tithing young peas in Dagenham parish, not many miles distant from Hornchurch, was recently discussed. The peas were, in that case, gathered in small baskets, and from thence put into sacks, and the tenth marked for the tithe. Each sack was calculated to contain three bushels; and it was proved that tithing this commodity by sacks was usual in the adjoining parishes (as prittle baskets are used for tithing in the neighbouring parishes to Hornchurch); that any other mode would greatly injure the produce, as an exposure to the sun and air for any length of time after they were gathered would destroy the bloom and diminish the value in the market. And Lord Chief Baron Alexander said: "As to the mode of tithing peas under the same circumstances, I find very little authority. It seems clear that it must be by measure. I can see no objection to a three-bushel sack as a measure, it being understood that the tithe owner, if he demands it, shall be at liberty to have the sacks opened and see their contents measured. This appears to be a mode of proceeding agreeable to principle, to analogy, and consistent with what the bulk of the evidence states to be the most convenient to the farmer, and without any danger to the tithe owner." And again: "The plaintiff has not averred, much less proved, that, if his agents had accepted what was offered, the [506] incumbent would have been injured to the extent of one farthing; while the defendant proves that, by leaving the produce exposed to the sun and air until the evening, it would have been considerably injured." The Chief Baron accordingly held that this was a good mode of setting out the tithe, and directed the plaintiff to pay the costs of that part of the suit.

Per Curiam. The peas in that case were put into sacks found by the occupier, and each sack contained a definite quantity, which, it is said, a prittle basket, in general, does not.

Argument resumed.

One mode proposed for tithing potatoes is by heaps; but in Blaney v. Whitaker, cited by Le Blanc, J., in Newman v. Morgan (10 East, 12), Mr. Justice Buller, agreeing with Mr. Justice Ashhurst, said, "That if the farmer put his turnips into heaps for himself, he should do so for the parson; but if he did not do so for himself, he need not do so for the parson." Some crops may, as soon as gathered, be put into sacks; but then it is the first act—cotemporaneous with the severance, as in the case of hops. But the farmer is not bound to find either baskets or sacks for the tithe owner.

Per Curiam. If the grower puts his crop in the first instance into sacks for his own convenience, he [507] is bound, I apprehend, to do the same for the clergyman.

Argument resumed.

It is calculated that, to fill ten prittle baskets, three quarters of an hour would be occupied: it is not then necessary that the tithe gatherers should be in the field all day. The length of time in collecting the tithe must be estimated according to the nature and extent of the crops. Hornchurch contains nearly 7000 acres; and, as the lessees have engaged to take the tithes of the whole parish, they should employ an adequate number of assistants, and avoid subjecting the farmers to inconvenience, difficulties, and loss. The prittle basket, if not a legal, is a fair, measure, and the tithe agent may make his election.

Lushington in reply. Fanshawe v. Brittain is in favour of the lessees: they are willing to take the tithe when put into sacks. The grower must find the sacks in the first instance; but he need not allow the clergyman to carry them away: so in the case of milk: the farmer is obliged to find pails for a certain time, but they must not be taken away with the tithe.(a) [508] Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The single question in this case is whether certain tithes have or have not been legally set out. The facts which are in any degree controverted, and to which nineteen witnesses have been examined, are not important; the material facts are all admitted in the answers.

The suit is instituted by the lessees of the tithes in Hornchurch parish, suing a farmer for tithes of potatoes, alleged to have been subtracted. It is admitted that the crops were grown and were titheable; and there is no question that the lessees were entitled to receive them; but, on the contrary, it is alleged that the tithes have been in effect paid, by having been legally set out after due notice; and the question is whether the mode in which they were set out was legal.

The law requires that the tithe must be separated from the nine parts on the spot where they arise, and before they are removed; it also requires that notice shall be given of the setting out the tithe, in order that the tithe owner may have an opportunity of viewing it before removal, so as to ascertain that the tenth part is fairly set out. Tithe is not due before the severance of the crop from the soil; it must be set out after severance; but not immediately even after severance, for a certain degree of preparation is required, as with hay which is to be put into cock.

Here, it is not contended that the setting out in rows, before the potatoes are dug, is legal; that mode is abandoned; and the defendant admits that he owes for the tithes of 1826, and [509] has constantly offered to pay the amount which they produced,

(a) In Bearblock v. Hancock, 2 Carr. and Payne, 425, on assumpsit for tithes tried at Chelmsford Spring Assizes, 1826, Graham, B., held: "The time when the tithe of potatoes become the property of the parson is when they are dug up and laid in heaps, and not when 'boughed out,' * while remaining in the ground."

* Boughs placed in the field to mark out the different proportions of the farmer and tithe owner.

viz. 3l. The disputed point is upon the mode of setting out the tithes of last year, of 1828, to which the farmer resorted when tithe owners objected to accept the tenth row.

There is no special custom pleaded to exist in this parish in respect of the setting out potato tithe: but on the 29th of June Meakins, the farmer, sent a notice to the Messrs. Bearblock, the tithe owners, to this effect—"That he should take up potatoes on the following day from half past seven in the morning till six in the afternoon:" so that there was to be a tithing all day as the crop was dug up: the answers to the fifth article of the libel admit that such was the fact.

A great many other notices are exhibited; but they are all to the same effect. On the next morning, the 30th of June, Meakins' men, at the time appointed, dug up the potatoes; they filled ten prittle baskets, then turned out one for the tithe, and removed the other nine; this is also admitted in the answers upon the fifth article; and so they began again by digging up more, setting aside one, and removing the nine. If, therefore, two hundred baskets are dug up in the course of the day, there will be twenty settings out—twenty tithings: and in order to view the tithes so set out, the tithing man must stand by all day to watch and inspect. If, therefore, fifty farmers dig potatoes on the same day, even without any fraud or combination (to which, however, such a mode would be much exposed), the tithe owner must employ fifty tithing men to view and to watch.

[510] Is there any thing in tithe law that, either in principle or analogy, establishes the legality of this mode of setting out tithe? It may be more convenient to the farmer in preparing his crop for market; so it may be more convenient to tithe hay or barley in the swathe, and not in the cock: or to throw aside every tenth sheaf as it is bound and remove the other nine; but that is not the true principle. The convenience on both sides must be looked at, and a spirit of mutual accommodation and mutual sacrifice must prevail. Here an offer was made by the tithe owner to attend twice a day, to tithe all that was drawn before noon and all that was drawn in the afternoon. Such an arrangement, it seems, would furnish all the accommodation of sending the potatoes to market, with very little, if any, additional trouble or inconvenience to the farmer. This, I think, is established by the evidence of Lawrence, Meakins' own witness. It has been held that the farmer is not obliged to cut the crop of a whole field in one day; but it is also held that he must cut a reasonable quantity before tithing it, and fairly and bonâ fide set it out. So, I apprehend, a reasonable quantity of a potato crop must be raised before setting out the tenth for inspection and view.

Without, then, laying down any precise rule what quantity must be raised before the tithe is set out, and the nine parts removed (for I am not bound to decide how the arrangement should take place; and it may in some degree depend upon the circumstances of each case, and must be done with a due regard to fair and reasonable accommodation on both sides; the nature [511] of the crop, too, may require, doubtless, some consideration); yet it seems clear that, setting out every prittle basket as soon as that quantity is raised, and then removing the nine parts, and so going on through the day, is not a setting out binding on the tithe owner, and consequently is no payment of the tithe. There is no authority, no principle, no analogy to support such a mode.

The Court, therefore, pronounces for the tithes libellate, and the value proved, which appears to be 26l. 5s.; and also for the sum of 3l. for the tithes of 1826; but allows the sixteen shillings charged for the carriage of the goods, because their value was enhanced by the removal to market: and the Court condemns the defendant in costs.

HARRIS v. HARRIS. Arches Court, Trinity Term, 4th Session, 1829.—The wife's adultery being proved, and a similar charge against the husband failing, his relief is not barred by a slight want of caution on his part.

On appeal.

From the sentence of separation pronounced in favor of Captain Harris in the Consistory Court of London (see Harris v. Harris, supra, 376), Mrs. Harris appealed: and the cause was argued upon the same evidence and by the same counsel as in the first instance. The counsel for the wife submitted that the Court might arrive at one of four conclusions.

[512] First. That adultery was proved against the husband, and not against the wife.

Secondly. That it was proved against the wife, and not against the husband.

Thirdly. That it was proved against both the one and the other.

Or, fourthly. That it was proved against neither party.

That if the Court should arrive at either of the first two conclusions, it must necessarily pronounce a sentence of divorce; but if at either of the latter, there must be a dismissal of both parties: and that, at least, ought to have been the judgment of the Court below. They maintained that the decision was a departure from principle and from precedent; that the charge of adultery, alleged against the wife, was satisfactorily disproved, while of the husband's guilt, there was strong presumptive evidence —stronger than what had frequently been held, in the ecclesiastical courts, to amount to a legal conclusion of guilt: and they cited Loveden v. Loveden (2 Hagg. Con. 2) to shew that it was "a fundamental rule that it is not necessary to prove a direct fact of adultery." (b)

[513] Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This appeal from the Consistory Court of London was, originally, a suit for separation by reason of adultery, brought by the wife against the husband; and the result of the cause in the Court below, though not irregular, was not very common. The husband denied his own guilt, and gave in a recriminatory charge; both parties prayed a separation: and the sentence of the Court was, that the wife had failed to support her libel, but that the husband had proved his allegation; and accordingly decreed a separation. From that sentence the wife has appealed, and the cause has been heard in this Court on the same evidence.

The proceedings are voluminous: several pleas were admitted; and many witnesses examined. The wife gave in her libel; the husband, a defensive and recriminatory allegation: a second allegation on the part of the wife, and a second responsive allegation for the husband, were also admitted. For the wife, twenty-three, for the husband, fourteen, witnesses were examined, making together thirty-seven.

If, on a consideration of this case, after the full and able argument it has undergone, I had been obliged to differ from the sentence of the Consistory Court, it would have been necessary to enter minutely into the evidence in order to shew the grounds on which, in my opinion, the sentence could not be sustained: but as I have arrived at the same result—presuming that the Chancellor of London stated the circumstances in detail—I do not feel called upon to repeat them. I may here observe [514] that I was induced to hear a reply, in order to afford Captain Harris' counsel an opportunity of saying any thing further, that they might consider advisable, in defence of the character of the second lady with whom he is charged to have been guilty, and to repel the imputations which parts of the evidence were calculated to reflect upon her.

The parties married in November, 1821: the husband being a post-captain; the wife, the daughter of a gentleman residing near Fulmer, in Buckinghamshire. Soon after their marriage they went to reside near her father's; and have had two children —a son and a daughter. In August, 1823, Captain Harris was appointed to the command of the "Hussar" frigate: after having been employed for a short time at Lisbon, he came back to this country; in December, 1823, or January, 1824, he sailed to the West Indies; and returned to England on the 13th of October, 1826. Upon quitting England his wife and one child were left at Fulmer; and another child, of which Mrs. Harris was pregnant, was born after his departure. During Captain Harris' absence a change of circumstances induced his wife's parents to go to France; she did not accompany them; but, after staying some time at Fulmer, she went to various places—Blackheath; Sloane Street; Brighton; and paid long visits to Mrs. Cary, at Fulham: but of her various residences there is not much evidence before the Court. On the 4th of September, 1826, the "Hussar" being expected, she, at the invitation of Captain Harris' friends—Mr. and Mrs. Mottley—went with her children to Portsmouth to meet her husband: [515] there she remained five weeks before the arrival of the "Hussar," which had been detained on her homeward voyage by orders to go to Vera Cruz. On the 18th of October the "Hussar" went round from Portsmouth to Chatham: Mrs. Harris did not take a passage in the vessel, but, on the 25th, returned to London by land; and was for some time on a visit at Mrs. Cary's while a house in Brompton Crescent, which Captain Harris had taken on the 23d of October, was preparing. In this house they took up their residence early in December, and continued in it till their separation in March, 1827.

(b) In the course of the argument a part of Mr. Mottley's evidence was again objected to (see ante, p. 399, in notis): but the Court—having directed the ninth article of the libel and the twenty-second article of the first allegation, with Mottley's evidence upon it, to be read—overruled the objections, intimating at the same time some doubt whether the objections could regularly be renewed in the Court of Appeal, as the admission of the evidence by the Judge of the Consistory Court formed no part of the appeal.

After this short history of their cohabitation I will proceed first to consider the charge brought by the wife against her husband: it has this peculiarity—that the subject of it was not the cause of the wife's withdrawing from cohabitation. For what are the facts here? First, Captain Harris having taxed his wife with imprudence during his absence, she wrote a letter confessing great impropriety and begging forgiveness: afterwards, Captain Harris having, on further inquiry, accused her of criminality, and though still desirous not to expose her publicly, insisted on a separation and obliged her to quit his house, she suggested no charge of adultery against him; but at length—after this admission of her own misconduct, and after thus submitting without a hint of her husband's guilt (either in any declaration to Mottley, or in her letter of February) to be driven from her husband's roof under this degrading imputation on her honor—she institutes a suit alleging adultery on his part, and praying a sentence of separation. Her case, then, does not set out very strongly.

[516] The first charge in the libel is, that while Captain Harris was in the West Indies, and at Vera Cruz, a Mrs. Waverly remained with him on board the "Hussar" for several days; that many familiarities took place between her and Captain Harris, and that they committed adultery. Two witnesses, the surgeon and the captain's clerk, examined to this charge, both negative it: they are the wife's own witnesses; but they depose that they never saw any familiarity, and that they do not believe that any adultery or indecent act occurred. There are, besides, some facts to explain the circumstances under which Mrs. Waverly was received and continued on board, such as will not warrant the Court even in suspecting any criminal intercourse between her and Captain Harris.

The other charge is with a lady of rank and character; and which, if unfounded, is cruel and unpardonable. It appears that while at Barbadoes, Captain Harris became acquainted with the chief-officer of engineers and his lady. In May, 1826, this officer was obliged, by duty, to make a visit of inspection through the colonies; and Captain Harris undertook to convey him. This officer's lady was in ill-health and recommended to accompany them: on their return her health was not improved; and under the advice of medical gentlemen her return to England was determined upon. Captain Harris engaged to bring her to this country; and she came home passenger in the "Hussar," attended by two female servants—an elderly woman and a black girl. When the ship was at Vera Cruz this lady expressed a great anxiety to procure a passage direct to England; but this she did not accomplish. When she landed at Portsmouth [517] she went to an hotel, and was there visited by Mrs. Harris and the friends with whom that lady was staying. She then came to London, and took lodgings, first in Regent Street, and afterwards in Sloane Street, near the residence of her own family. There both Captain and Mrs. Harris visited her: Captain Harris shewed her attentions; but they were such as the circumstances would naturally lead to; and did not go beyond that polite and kind civility which was due to her, and which was to be expected from a gentleman intrusted with the protection of a friend's sick wife.

The two witnesses who were on board the "Hussar," and have been produced on the libel, negative any suspicion of improper familiarity during the voyage. The cabins of Captain Harris and the lady in question were on different sides of the ship, though of course that did not exclude a possibility of intercourse. Again, though it is pleaded that Captain Harris visited this lady at her lodgings, and every witness is produced that could be mustered to state some impropriety, yet (with one single exception) there is not a witness who speaks to the slightest familiarity or impropriety of conduct: there is not one that believes any criminality, except a young girl—Mary Ann Payne; and she relates circumstances so utterly inconsistent with probability, and all the other facts, as to deserve no credit whatever, even if she were not contradicted by the other evidence in the cause: her story is so at variance with probability that it is sufficient to defeat itself. The impression made by this witness' testimony on my mind is that, so [518] far as it would tend to prove criminality, it is mere invention and gross falsehood. In this part of the case, without entering into more detail, I fully concur in the sentence that Mrs. Harris has failed in proof of her libel. The charge seems to have been framed upon a notion that the best means of defence was to commence the attack.

I now proceed to the second branch of this case—the charges against the wife.

It is unnecessary for me to trace Mrs. Harris to an earlier period than the beginning of September, 1826, when she and her children went to Portsmouth to await the expected return of the "Hussar." Conduct of greater forwardness, more dissolute short of actual prostitution; expressions, written and spoken, more grossly departing from the modesty of a virtuous matron; passions more inflamed; advances more impudent and barefaced, cannot well be imagined: and the proof depends not merely on the depositions of the witnesses, but is confirmed by her own letters, coupled with admissions of great improprieties, at least, and expressions of deep contrition. Against a married woman—the mother of two children, the return of whose husband, after an absence of two years on the public service, was daily expected, who could write such letters to officers of the garrison, and act and talk as she did, and who had a mind thus tainted—there would not be much difficulty in presuming criminality whenever a favourable opportunity and other circumstances to raise a suspicion occurred. Whether her morals had become corrupted by the society she so much [519] cultivated during her husband's absence; whether her passions were inflamed by his expected return; whether she considered there was less risk of detection by pregnancy on the eve of his arrival, it is obvious from her declarations that her affections no longer were directed towards their legitimate object: the meeting with her husband was not the gratification she anticipated; she sought other objects.

Looking to these circumstances as detailed in the evidence—for to state the particulars or to read passages from these letters is unnecessary, and therefore from their corrupting and demoralizing tendency unfitting—the Court has a strong judicial conviction that, on the 13th of September, 1826, at Stanstead Wood, Mrs. Harris was guilty of adultery with Captain Latouche. The subsequent circumstances, if confirmation were required, tend strongly to strengthen that conviction. The "Hussar" sailed for Chatham on the 18th of October, after Captain Harris had slept on shore five nights; she declined to accompany her husband in that vessel, but promised to return to London on the following Monday, the 23rd; yet she lingered at Portsmouth till the 25th.

The day after the vessel had sailed for Chatham a conversation took place between Mrs. Harris and Mrs. Mottley, to which the latter thus deposes on the eighteenth article: "At dinner Mrs. Harris complained of being poorly and could not eat any thing; deponent enquired the cause, and Mrs. Harris said, 'I'll bet you five pounds I am in the family way;' deponent said, 'How can you fancy such a thing?' to which she replied, 'I'll also bet you five pounds that I [520] shall be confined at the end of eight months; adding also, 'that she had gone only eight months with one of her children, and that the same thing had happened to her sister.' It then, for the first time, struck the deponent that the party in Stanstead Wood had taken place exactly a month before, and deponent then believed and still believes that such conversation was addressed to the deponent for the purpose of misleading her, and of accounting hereafter for the birth of any child of which she might be delivered within a period less than nine months from her husband's return, and deponent believes an act of adultery was committed on the 13th of September, 1826, between Mrs. Harris and Captain Latouche."

Captain Harris, at the time at which this conversation took place, had been at home only six days, yet she anticipated pregnancy and an eight months' child: these are very speedy suspicions. The opinion and inference of the witness do not guide the Court, but the great difficulty is in not arriving at the same conclusion. Mrs. Harris was, in truth, pregnant; for, in the month of February, she miscarried, which was the reason she was allowed to remain for some little time in the house of her husband after their separation. Upon this part of the case, again, I concur with the sentence of the Chancellor of London.

Against this proof of guilt another ground of defence was attempted to be set up, namely, that Captain Harris was the corrupter of his wife, the author of his own dishonour. Two instances are adduced: first, that, soon after his marriage, [521] he invited a friend, Captain Vincent, who was present at the marriage, but who at the time in question was unwell, to spend some days at the cottage at Fulmer, and that he slept in an adjoining room, between which and Captain and Mrs. Harris' room there was only a thin partition. To rely upon this as any justification of her adultery five years after, or as any bar to her husband's relief, or that it was considered by either of the parties as attended with any impropriety, is hardly worthy of observation; it was not, indeed, much pressed in argument.

The other instance is that he introduced his wife to Mrs. Cary. It appears that Captain Harris and his family had been for a very long period—thirty years—intimate with Mrs. Cary. Mr. Henry Harris and his daughter were residing at her house. Captain Harris and his wife had very little intercourse with her before he sailed to the West Indies; and it was during his absence that Mrs. Harris herself cultivated this acquaintance into very great intimacy. The general conduct and deportment of this lady is described as quite consistent with decorum; though it is true that she was visited by an illustrious individual, now no more, on terms which nothing can justify; at the same time there are circumstances arising from the impossibility of a legal marriage which may, in the eyes of the world, distinguish such from other immoral connections, and may be received in some degree as an extenuation.

It is not necessary for the Court to assent to the strict propriety of Captain Harris making such an acquaintance for his wife. But however much right moral feelings may be dis-[522]-posed to censure the overlooking of any departure from female virtue, under any circumstances, and thereby giving a degree of countenance to immorality and vice, yet sitting here to administer the law, it is impossible to hold that the circumstances in this case referred to will bar the husband of the remedy which he claims on account of his wife's adultery.

Upon the whole, the sentence appealed from must be affirmed.

BEARE AND BILES v. JACOB.(a) Arches Court, Trinity Term, 4th Session, 1829.

The minute of Court, ultimately entered in this case, was as follows:—

The Court "directed Jacob to appear absolutely, but nevertheless on the special ground that inasmuch as the sub-dean of Sarum, by whom the order or decree appealed from in this cause was made, and the chancellor (and, as such, the Judge of the Consistory Court of the Lord Bishop of Sarum) is, and is admitted to be, one and the same person, the appeal from the said order or decree lies to this Court, and not to the Consistory Court of the Lord Bishop of Sarum, as, under other circumstances, it would lie; the Court of the said Sub-dean not being a peculiar and exempt [523] jurisdiction as erroneously alleged: and it was further directed that a special copy of this minute should be forwarded to the registrar of the Court of the Sub-dean of Sarum, and also to the registrar of the Consistory Court of Sarum, in order that no misapprehension might occur as to the grounds on which an absolute appearance was directed to be given in the cause."

[524] WAGNER v. MEARS. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 1st Session, 1829.—Where capacity and volition are established, a party suing in formâ pauperis who after a long acquiescence calls in probate of a will, on a suggestion of incapacity, fraud, and circumvention, may be condemned in costs; and the taxation be suspended.

Curteis on behalf of Mrs. Wagner.

Lushington and Dodson contrà.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The deceased, Ann Jones, died a widow, so long since as the 28th of December, 1821: she left several nephews and nieces of two different branches, viz. three nephews and two nieces of the name of Newbury, and two nieces of the name of Norton. On the 8th of January, 1822, probate of her will dated on the 30th of November, 1821, was granted to Susanna Norton and Sarah Mears (formerly Norton), executors: by this will she left Edward and John Newbury 20l. each for mourning, Samuel Norton 500l.; her plate, household furniture, and trinkets she gave in equal shares to the Nortons; and tied up certain property in trust to pay Edward and John Newbury 2l. a week each; and bequeathed the residue to Susanna Norton and her sister Mrs. Mears. The property was sworn to be under the sum of 14,000l.

(a) See this case, supra, 257.

This probate remained undisturbed for seven [525] years, and, in the mean time, Susanna Norton died. In 1828 the probate was called in by Elizabeth Wagner, widow (formerly Newbury), a niece and one of the residuary legatees named in a will of January, 1820, and she was admitted a pauper.(a) Now, when there had been an acquiescence in a probate for so many years, it was an extreme hardship upon the executrix to be liable to be called upon to substantiate, by proof, the will under which she had so long acted, and that, too, at the instance of a pauper, and where, more especially, no reasonable account was given for the delay. The result of the evidence before me renders this hardship still greater, because it is proved that Samuel Newbury is the real opponent: he applied to all the witnesses, and yet has received his legacy of 500l. under this very will. It would not, therefore, have been convenient for him to have contested this will, because he could not have opposed it without bringing in his legacy, and he would have been responsible for costs: but a pauper sister is put forward, that there is little chance for the executrix, after being harassed with this suit, to get reimbursed the expences.(b) After such a course of proceed-[526]-ing, every presumption would be in favour of the will that had been acted upon; but, in this case, the proofs are perfectly clear and satisfactory.

The deceased, as I have said, was a widow; and she had lost an only daughter. At Walworth, where she resided, she was acquainted with a gentleman of the name of Whitaker; he became her intimate friend and assisted her in the management of her affairs. In January, 1820, she employed Mr. Whitaker to get a will drawn for her; he took her instructions in writing; he carried them to his solicitor, Mr. Lilley, who, having prepared the draft of a will, brought it to the deceased (whom he had never seen before), settled it with her, transcribed it, and it was executed and attested. By that will the more considerable benefit was given to the Nortons; the same weekly provision was made for Edward and John Newbury; £1000 was given to Samuel Newbury, and the residue was distributed among the five nephews and nieces of that name. Samuel Newbury, who had kept a public house, but had come to reside with the deceased and to manage her household concerns, was, besides his legacy of 1000l., appointed a joint executor with Whitaker; but it appears that he soon lost her confidence, for in September in that year the deceased sent for Mr. Lilley, and by a codicil revoked the appointment of Samuel Newbury as an executor, and substituted her niece, Sarah Norton.

To the validity and fairness of these testamentary acts the Newbury family cannot object; they, indeed, rely upon them. Both sets [527] of relations were in habits of intercourse with the deceased, except the nieces of the Newbury branch; but the Misses Norton and Samuel Newbury were not on good terms. In June, 1821, Mr. Whitaker died; he was buried on the 15th of that month; and soon after that occurrence the will and codicil prepared by Lilley, in which Whitaker was an executor, were delivered into the deceased's possession. These facts are not in controversy between the parties.

Mr. Whitaker being dead, it was not improbable that the deceased would set about some fresh testamentary arrangement, and Lilley, not being her solicitor, having never seen her but at the execution of her will and codicil, having never transacted for her any other business, and she having solicitors of her own, Sweet, Stokes, and Carr, whom she had employed for sixteen years, it was natural that she should resort to these, her own, solicitors, for the purpose of altering her will. Mrs. Mears called upon Mr. Sweet to request he would attend the deceased; and if she took the former will off the mantle piece to carry it with her, that conduct was, I think, in no degree suspicious. Mr. Sweet, on the second article of the responsive allegation, thus deposes:—

"On the 21st of July, 1821, Sarah Mears and Susanna Norton called upon the

---

(a) See In the Goods of Ann Jones, vol. i. 81.

(b) On the admissibility of a responsive allegation given in on the part of Mrs. Mears, the Court threw out, in reference to the great hardship of this case, whether it ought not (at least before Mrs. Wagner was admitted a pauper to institute this suit) to have required an affidavit accounting for her not having sooner proceeded to call in the probate, and stating her belief that she should be able to set aside the will; more especially when she had been a party to a deed by which she had recognized its validity.

deponent at his office with a message from the deceased, stating that she was very ill and wished him to attend upon her to make her will; and they made an appointment with the deponent to be at the deceased's house, Walworth, on the next Monday for that purpose: they informed him that Mr. Samuel Newbury (whom the [528] deponent knew as a nephew of the deceased) would be acquainted that the deponent had been sent for, for the purpose of making the deceased's will. On the appointed Monday the deponent went to the deceased's house, taking with him one of his clerks: the deponent found there Samuel Newbury and Sarah Mears. On being shewn into the deceased's bed room (for she was confined to her bed) and being left alone with her she proceeded to give instructions for her will, and the deponent read each bequest to her as he wrote it down, and so proceeded until the will was complete: it occupied the deponent about two hours altogether; the deponent made no draft of the will but wrote it out at once fit for execution. In the course of the preparation of the will the deponent wished to be informed as to the amount of the deceased's property, and she referred him to Samuel Newbury and Sarah Mears, and the deponent obtained the information he wanted from them and communicated it to the deceased; but she could not then determine as to the mode in which she would dispose of the residue of her property, and the deponent therefore concluded the will by stating that the deceased had not made up her mind as to the mode in which she would dispose of it."

There was, then, no clandestinity in the preparation of this will of June, 1821, for Samuel Newbury was present and privy to it. The disposition of the property is the same as in the will of 1820, except that the legacy to Samuel Newbury is reduced from £1000 to £500, and [529] the residue is reserved to be afterwards disposed of. The two nieces, the Nortons, are in this will named executors; it was executed five months before the death of the testatrix; and at that time there is not the least reason to doubt her capacity, or to suggest any influence or imposition.

The deceased was rather far advanced in years; she was about sixty-five, and confined to her bed with a painful disorder, one that rendered moving extremely troublesome, and she grew gradually weaker in body; but, unless the whole account of making this will is a fabrication, and the attesting witnesses are most grossly perjured, her testamentary capacity in no degree failed; and the Court can entertain no doubt of its decision.

As I have mentioned, the deceased resided at Walworth; her two nieces on the Middlesex side of the town: they were her favorite relations; she was confined to her bed, at a distance from them, and with only a young girl and a hired nurse to take care of her. She had no inducement to remain in the neighbourhood of Walworth; Mr. Whitaker was dead, and her nephew, Samuel, could not perform for her those offices which she required, and were only proper for a female attendant to discharge. These considerations quite account for the wish and anxiety of the nieces to receive the deceased into their house, and make it natural that all parties should become desirous of her removal; and it is not unworthy of remark that upon the occasion of her removal from Walworth, Samuel Newbury carried the deceased down to the coach. The residue by the will of July hav-[530]-ing been reserved for a future disposition, Mr. Sweet attended the deceased at Miss Norton's house in Charlotte Street, Fitzroy Square: upon that occasion he received from her instructions for a new will; he remained with her a considerable time, while she gave him the necessary directions; he was extremely cautious and particular throughout; and the minute detail of what passed at that interview leaves no doubt in my mind of the volition and capacity of the testatrix; and unless the facts, to which Mr. Sweet has deposed, are entirely fabricated, there is all the necessary proof furnished of the early part of this transaction; and the sequel is taken up and fully established by his partner, Mr. Carr; and the whole of the evidence on this part of the case is corroborated by Hardwicke, a clerk in their house, who was present during the whole of the transaction.

Now against the full and satisfactory evidence of the instructions for, and execution of, this will, and the capacity of the deceased, what is there opposed? Why, three or four old nurses, a young servant-girl, and two great-nephews, who give an opinion that the deceased was childish and incapable; their evidence, however, is extremely loose, and their recollection of facts, after seven years, not to be relied upon: and they depose against, and in contradiction of, the whole conduct of Samuel Newbury, the very person who has brought them forward as witnesses, who was present at the whole business, whose legacy was reduced from £1000 to £500, and who, therefore, if actual incapacity, fraud, and circumvention existed, was fully aware of all that occurred, and [531] had every inducement to bring the matter forward; and yet he acquiesced.

It is indeed to be regretted that he is not the party, and that his legacy has been paid, otherwise the Court might have had it in its power to do more ample justice to the executrix: but all the justice the Court can at present do is to pronounce for the will, and in order to mark that the proceedings are altogether vexatious, to condemn the party, who has called in the probate, in costs: and should she succeed to any property the decree may then be enforced: but while she continues a pauper I shall direct the taxation to be suspended.(a)

CRISP AND RYDER v. WALPOLE. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 19th June, 1829. —A codicil produced under mysterious circumstances eighteen months after the deceased's death—there being no evidence of finding nor of any thing directly connecting it with the deceased—cannot be established on evidence of hand-writing alone, particularly when such evidence is conflicting, and when other circumstances raise a suspicion of the genuineness of the instrument.

This was a cause of proving in solemn form of law a codicil to the last will and testament of William Henry Robinson, late of Denston Hall, Suffolk, promoted by John Crisp and Thomas Ryder, the principal legatees therein named, against the executors of his will. The deceased died on the 12th of November, 1826, and in December following his will (dated on the 6th of December, 1822) and nine codicils were proved. By his will the testator gave certain pecuniary and specific legacies, (amounting in the whole to £1125) to several of his friends [532] and servants named in the first codicil. The paper now propounded was alleged to be a further codicil: it was as follows:—

"Denston Hall, September 2, 1823.

"I give and bequeath unto Mr. John Crisp of Denston, Suffolk, the sum of sixteen hundred pounds. I also wish to give to Amy Crisp the sum of two hundred pounds. And I give to Mr. Ryder Charter House London the sum of six hundred pounds. I wish to give to Mrs. Territt Chilton Hall Clare two hundred pounds. I also wish to give to my curate Mr. Seabroke and R. Forbes gardener one hundred pounds each. My will and meaning is that this codicil be adjudged to be a part of my last will and testament. "W. H. ROBINSON."

This paper was propounded (as a codicil in the hand-writing of the deceased) in an allegation of fourteen articles: the fifth of which pleaded: "That on the 19th of May, 1828, a letter or packet sent through the twopenny post-office was delivered to Thomas Ryder, having the post-mark Newgate Street thereon, sealed with a wafer and addressed ——— Ryder, Esq., Charter House; that the said letter, or packet, consisted of the cover or envelope so addressed and the paper writing being the codicil propounded; that advertisements had been inserted in several newspapers, and printed hand-bills circulated at Denston offering a reward for the discovery of the person who put the letter or packet into the post, but [533] that no discovery relating thereto had been made."

Phillimore and Dodson in support of the codicil.

The King's advocate and Lushington contrà, were stopped by the Court.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This case lies in a narrow compass; for unless the principles established in these Courts for the security of property are broken through, I can entertain no doubt what decision ought to be given.

William Henry Robinson, the testator, died on the 12th of November, 1826; his will is dated 1822, and he left several codicils of different dates from 1823 to 1826 inclusive. In the month of December, 1826, the three executors, viz. the two Misses Walpole and Miss Jefferson took probate of this will and nine codicils: no other codicil was heard of, nor suggested to have been in existence at that time, nor until May, 1828, when Mr. Ryder received by the twopenny post—in a blank envelope—a paper purporting to be a codicil in the hand-writing of the deceased: this paper is dated September the 2d, 1823; it gives various legacies, and, among others, £1600 to Mr. Crisp, and £600 to Mr. Ryder—the two persons who have since propounded the instrument in this cause. Where this alleged codicil came from, or who sent it, has never been discovered. Mr. Ryder took all proper steps to trace its history, [534] but without success. There rests not the least imputation or suspicion upon Mr. Ryder that he fabricated the instrument, or was in any manner privy to its concealment or to its production. No imputation whatever rests upon him.

(a) See Filewood v. Cousens, 1 Add. 286. Le Mann v. Bonsal, ib. 399.

But notwithstanding no discovery has been made accounting for this instrument not appearing till a year and a half after the testator's death, these two legatees, Mr. Crisp and Mr. Ryder, have called upon the executors to take probate of it; and have propounded and undertaken to prove it as a codicil. And the true question in the cause is whether there be proof that the instrument is a genuine codicil—the act of the deceased. To this paper there is no attesting witness; the factum depends upon evidence of hand-writing alone; and there is no circumstance that connects the instrument directly with the deceased. Some general regard for the several legatees has been relied upon, as rendering the disposition probable. Now, in the first place, no person would set about the fabrication of an instrument without endeavouring to give the disposition some colour of probability: but looking to all the circumstances in which the deceased stood with reference to these parties at the date of this instrument, it does not appear to my mind even probable that he would have bequeathed these two legacies to Mr. Crisp and Mr. Ryder.

Declarations have also been relied upon; but they are loose and general, not referring specifically to this instrument; and they were made in 1826, when the deceased was residing at Brook House—a lunatic asylum—and labouring under a morbid depression of spirits. The [535] proof, then, seems to rest on evidence of the hand-writing.

It is a rule of this Court that evidence of hand-writing alone is not sufficient to establish a testamentary paper without something to connect the act with the deceased: (a) and this rule is founded upon the facility there is of imitating hand-writing so closely as to deceive those who are best acquainted with that of the supposed testator. It is therefore required that there shall be something to connect the instrument with the deceased—either that it was found in his repositories at his death, or some direct recognition of it in his lifetime, or else some other circumstances of such strong probability that it was the genuine act of the deceased, as to leave no reasonable doubt on the moral conviction of the Court.

In the present case the evidence of the similitude of hand-writing, even produced by the parties setting up the paper, is not uniform in support of it, while it is opposed by the evidence of other individuals who believe it not to be the hand-writing of the deceased: so that this proof, at best of a loose and unsatisfactory species, is in the present instance conflicting.

There are other circumstances unfavourable to the genuineness of the instrument: the day of the month is written after the name of the month, whereas it is proved to have been the habit of the deceased, almost universally observed by him, to write the day of the month before its name. It was also the habit of the deceased to write his names of baptism at full [536] length, and not by initials, to formal instruments, though not to common letters: but to this codicil there are only the initials of the christened names. These, however, are slight circumstances of suspicion, not very much to be relied upon.

But the great difficulty of the case arises from the mysterious appearance of this instrument a year and a half after the testator's death: nor is there any account from whom it came, or from whence it came, or where it was first discovered, or why it had lain so long concealed: no plausible conjecture can be formed in explanation; and this circumstance raises a strong suspicion that the instrument has been a fabrication of much more recent date than the death of the testator. In addition to this, the paper is dated at the head, "Denston Hall, September 2, 1823," which was the testator's usual place of residence. Now it is satisfactorily proved that the testator was not at Denston Hall at that time; but that he had left that place on the 28th of July, had come to town, staid there some time, had then proceeded to Cheltenham, and did not return to Denston till the end of September. That the deceased, therefore, should have formally headed this instrument at Denston Hall, he being for a considerable time absent from thence, is not probable, more especially as there are several other instruments before the Court dated at the place where they were written: but if this instrument were fabricated three or four years after its date, and after the death of the deceased, it is not extraordinary that the person who fabricated it should not have been aware of, or should [537] not have recollected, the absence of the testator from Denston Hall on the 2d of September, 1813; and thus have fallen into a mistake, and furnished this additional circumstance of suspicion.

(a) See Constable v. Steibel and Emanuel, vol. i. 60.

Upon the whole, the judgment of the Court is, that there is a complete failure of proof of this instrument as a codicil of the deceased testator: the Court is not called upon to pronounce that it is a fabrication; but, whether fabricated or not, I must repeat that I fully acquit Mr. Ryder of any participation in the transaction, and that I entertain no suspicion that he was concerned in, or privy to, the fabrication of the paper.

If, however, parties will set up and undertake to establish such a case by proof for the chance of benefit to themselves, they must also be content to do it at their own risk of paying the costs in case of failure. I must, therefore, not only pronounce against the codicil, but feel bound to condemn the parties, who have propounded it, in costs.

HARRISON v. STONE. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 4th Session, 1829.—The Court of Probate does not admit parol evidence to shew an error in a testamentary paper, unless there be, 1st, some ambiguity on the face of the instrument; 2ndly, the means of obtaining clear and indisputable proof of the deceased's intention.

On protest.

George Harrison, late of the Herald's College, died on the 16th of April, 1821, possessed of considerable personal property. By his will, dated the 8th of April, 1821, and described in the concluding paragraph as "Instructions [538] which the testator desires may be formed into his will, and until then, that they should be considered as his last will and testament;" he appointed his nephews, Daniel Charles Rogers Harrison (the residuary legatee), Samuel Harrison (since dead), and Robert Stone, the husband of a great-niece, executors. They took probate on the 27th of April.

In the will was a bequest to Robert Stone in the manner and words following:—"Gives to Mr. Robert Stone all such money as shall be due to the testator at the time of his decease." (a)

On the 30th of March, 1829, a decree issued, at the instance of Daniel Charles Rogers Harrison against Robert Stone, the other surviving executor, citing him to shew cause "why the probate should not be revoked and declared null and void by reason of the omission in the will of the words 'from him' alleged to have been erroneously and incautiously erased; and to accept, in conjunction with Daniel Charles Rogers Harrison, a new probate, with the words 'from him' reinstated in, and made to form part and parcel of, the will, or to shew cause why probate in such form should not be granted to Mr. Harrison."

An appearance was given for Stone under protest, which alleged; "That within two or three days after the deceased's death the will was read over by Daniel Moore, of Lincoln's Inn, the solicitor who prepared it (and also solicitor of D. C. R. Harrison), in the pre-[539]-sence of D. C. R. Harrison and others; that D. C. R. Harrison himself gave instructions for the probate of the will without any interference on the part of Stone. That on the 26th of April, eighteen days only after the preparation of the will, Moore made an affidavit that he attended the deceased on the 8th of April, and then by his desire wrote instructions for his will, which, having been read over to, approved and signed by, the deceased, remained in the deceased's possession till his death; that in writing the will deponent committed many clerical errors, and that many alterations were made by the deceased's directions; that having now carefully inspected the will and particularly observed the several alterations, obliterations, and interlineations therein (amongst others, the obliterations of 'me from him,' and interlineations of 'the testator' and 'his' in the bequest in favor of Robert Stone), he saith the whole of such alterations, obliterations, and interlineations were made by him, by the deceased's directions, or with his knowledge and approbation, and previous to the execution of the will." That Stone was not until "several years afterwards aware of the existence of this affidavit; that on the 27th of April probate issued to the three executors, and, when completed, was sent to D. C. R. Harrison, by his directions, who took the sole management of the estate, and that Stone and Samuel Harrison did not interfere in the execution of the will except by joining in the acts of their co-executor for the sake of conformity and under his direction: that very shortly after probate [540] was obtained, Stone claimed, under the will, all the money due to the deceased at his death, and that D. C. R. Harrison on such occasion said to him, 'I think you and I can settle it between ourselves, as it would be a pity that any part of the money should be spent in law;' that Stone had since frequently repeated the claim to Harrison, who on such occasions promised to arrange it, and that in consequence thereof Stone had delayed taking legal proceedings to recover the same, but that Harrison at length having refused to settle the matter, Stone filed a bill in Chancery on the 17th of May, 1827, to compel him; and the Master of the Rolls, on the 25th of February, 1829, decreed 'that Stone was entitled to all debts and sums of money due to the deceased at his death.'" It was further alleged, "That Harrison, very shortly after the deceased's death, knew of the alterations in the bequest to Stone, and who was entitled, under the will, to all monies due to the deceased at his death: that Mr. Moore, the preparer of the will, survived the deceased nearly seven years; and that, notwithstanding the premises, no proceedings were taken by Harrison to call in the probate until nearly eight years after the deceased's, and upwards of a year after Moore's, death; nor until after the decree of the Court of Chancery." The protest, in conclusion, submitted, "that under the circumstances alleged it was not now competent to call upon Stone according to the tenor of the decree."

(a) The words in italics were substituted by interlineation. See the judgment, infra, p. 548.

In reply, it was alleged, "That on the 8th of April, 1821, the deceased, being exceedingly [541] ill and confined to his bed, caused his solicitor, Moore, to attend him immediately: that on Moore's arrival in the morning of that day the deceased requested him to take down instructions for his will; and Moore, accordingly, from the verbal directions of the deceased, in his presence, and the presence of Sir George Naylor (an intimate and confidential friend of the deceased), wrote such instructions: that in the course, and as part, of such instructions, the deceased said, 'I give to Mr. Stone all the money that he owes me,' meaning a sum of 1500l. due to him from Stone on mortgage with interest; or, in words to that effect, signified his intentions by his will to remit such debt: that Moore immediately wrote down, 'gives to Stone all such money as shall be due to him from him at the time of my death;' but afterwards, in order to make the clause in the third person, made the alteration appearing in such bequest entirely of his own accord, and without having received any directions or instructions to that effect from the deceased: that after the entire instructions had been reduced into writing, and the alterations made, the will was read over to the deceased, and duly executed by him; that the alteration made by Moore in Stone's bequest was made without the knowledge, and contrary to the meaning and intention of the deceased, who never knowingly approved thereof, but remained in ignorance of the effect to the time of his death, and that the deceased never intimated an intention to benefit Stone, beyond forgiving him his debt: that the will was not otherwise [542] read over to the deceased, nor was his intention directed to the alteration, and that it was never read over by him; that in the course of the 8th of April, 1821, the deceased observed to Sir George Naylor 'that he thought he had done enough for Stone by forgiving him his debts:' that about two days after the making of the will the same was locked up by Sir George Naylor in a drawer in the deceased's bed chamber, which remained sealed up to the deceased's death." It was admitted "that Harrison took possession of the will, but not to the exclusion of the other executors; and it was averred that the affidavit of Moore was not made at the instigation or procurement of Harrison, who did not interfere therein; and that Stone was not ignorant of such affidavit for several years. It was also admitted that Harrison took the sole management of the estate; but denied that Stone claimed to be entitled to all the money due to the deceased, either shortly after the probate or at any time except as afterwards admitted, or that Harrison ever made the declaration 'that they could settle it,' &c. or that he ever promised to arrange Stone's claims, or that Stone delayed taking proceedings as alleged in the protest; for that Harrison (it being the belief of all the executors that Stone took no benefit beyond the extinguishment of his own debt), with the privity and concurrence of his co-executors, got in and received all monies due to the deceased at his death, except the debt from Stone, and applied the same for his own use, without any interference or objection by Stone; that, in June, 1821, Harrison, with the privity of Stone, made up the executor-[543]-ship account and paid the legacy duty on the residue in which were included the monies due to the deceased at his death. It was admitted that about four years ago Stone observed to Harrison 'that he must have some conversation with him relative to the bequest;' and that, on the 2d of February, 1827, Stone, in a letter to him, intimated, 'that he must have some conversation with him on the subject;' but it was denied that Stone otherwise ever made any claim under the will beyond his own debt, and that he never made any direct claim to the monies due to the deceased until the 22d of February, 1827, when he wrote a letter claiming £4575 as due to the deceased at his death; to which letter Harrison replied, expressing his surprise at the advancement of such a claim, and denying its validity."

It was then stated "that the Master of the Rolls, in pronouncing in favour of the bill of complaint, declared in terms 'that his decree was founded solely upon the bequest to Robert Stone, as it stood in that will of the deceased, of which probate had been granted, not admitting of any latitude of construction, and expressly referred to the Ecclesiastical Court as the proper jurisdiction for trying the question between the parties;' and submitted that the protest be overruled; that Stone be assigned to appear absolutely, and condemned in costs."

On behalf of Stone it was denied "that the executorship accounts were made up, or the duty paid on the residue, with his privity; but that on the contrary they were rendered to the stamp office by Harrison entirely without [544] Stone's knowledge, and were not furnished to him by Harrison until 1827. It was further denied that the Master of the Rolls, in any manner, referred the question to the Ecclesiastical Court; and alleged that the decree does not contain any reference of that nature; but it was admitted that the Master of the Rolls said 'that if Harrison wished to impugn the bequest, he must go elsewhere, or to the Ecclesiastical Court for that purpose.' That, in pursuance of the decree, proceedings were still depending in Chancery to carry the same into effect, and that Harrison, by taking steps therein, had acquiesced in the decree."

The act on petition was supported by affidavits on one side and on the other.

Dodson in support of the protest. Where no ambiguity nor absurdity is upon the face of the instrument, extrinsic evidence is not admissible; but where an ambiguity or absurdity manifestly exists and evidently results from error, there evidence, dehors the instrument itself, may be received: but before it can be admitted it must be clear and undoubted that the error was casual. Bayldon v. Bayldon (3 Add. 232). In that case there was a manifest error in the enumeration of the nephews and nieces of the testator; it was clear, not only by the parol testimony, but from the instructions, that he intended, by this will, to have benefited another nephew. The error was apparent, and there was direct and unequivocal [545] proof of intention. So in Travers and Edgell v. Miller (3 Add. 221) folio 20 of the will was missing: the pages ran from 19 to 21; and, that a sheet was wanting, was proved by the context. There again it was clear that the omission must have been by mistake, and either not observed at the time the will was executed, or that the sheet had, since its execution, been accidentally detached: and the Court was enabled to supply its place by means of the draft will. But, on the other hand, in Fawcett v. Jones (3 Phill. 434, 495), this Court refused to make a variation in Lady Bath's will, by inserting in it, from the instructions, a residuary clause; and the Court of Delegates affirmed the decree of the Prerogative Court. In the present case there is no ambiguity whatever; nothing that should induce the Court to resort to extrinsic evidence, and which can only be supplied from recollection, and by the conjectures of Sir George Naylor, who was present when the instrument was prepared—eight years ago. No safe reliance could be placed on such testimony, even if admissible, when opposed by the conduct of the parties, and the affidavit of Mr. Moore, the drawer of the will, made recenti facto. The Master of the Rolls did not advise these proceedings; if he had so done, he would in the mean time have stayed the suit in his own Court: but even if a reference had been directed, it would not affect the principles which guide Courts of Probate in cases of this description (see Draper v. Hitch, vol. i. 678).

[546] Lushington and Addams contrà. If it be true, as is alleged, that the deceased never intended to benefit Stone beyond the extinguishment of his debt, the protest must be over-ruled, whatever ultimately may come of the case; unless, indeed, something is set forth in support of the protest which is quite conclusive against the ability of the Court to afford relief. At present the Court is not apprized of all the evidence, but enough is disclosed to raise a strong probability of error. We admit, but with certain exceptions, that written instruments cannot be varied by parol evidence: the general rule, however, applies to instruments not regularly executed only, but to instruments regular and formal in themselves. Here the paper required, in the first instance, some extrinsic evidence to give it probate. The factum is informal; the deceased was aged and infirm, and placing great confidence in his solicitor, does not seem to have adverted to the variations in the wording which had been introduced. But can it be successfully argued that there is no ambiguity on the face of the instrument, and in the construction of the bequests to Stone, arising from the words as altered, in comparison with those originally adopted? The variation is considerable, and introduces an important ambiguity and incongruity in the will. It is said, however, that the intentions of the testator cannot now be satisfactorily collected from the contents of Sir George Naylor's affidavit; but his intimacy with the deceased, the declarations subsequent to the execution of the instrument, and the peculiarity of the bequests, will suffi-[547]-ciently account for the accuracy of his memory upon the points in question. Mr. Moore's affidavit was made in the usual form to account for the alterations in the paper; but his particular attention was not directed to the effect of those alterations. In Blackwood v. Damer (a)[1] there was a clear omission by the attorney in not inserting a residuary clause: the draft was read over; it remained two days in the deceased's possession, and was executed; yet the Court of Delegates decreed that the residuary clause should form part of the will. Fawcett v. Jones has been relied upon; but there Lady Bath's attention was called, specially and repeatedly, to the residuary clause; and the will was most carefully prepared and executed by a vigilant testatrix. If there was not a direct reference of this case, it was, in terms, sent by the Master of the Rolls for a decision in the Ecclesiastical Court. There has been no negligence nor acquiescence on the part of the residuary legatee.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. George Harrison, Esq., died on the 16th of April, 1821; and on the 27th of that month probate of his will was taken, under £40,000, by Samuel Harrison, Daniel Charles Rogers (now Rogers Harrison) and Robert Stone, the executors. Daniel Charles Rogers was also residuary legatee. The will is dated on the 8th of April, 1821: it is not formally drawn up, [548] but was intended as instructions, which, for precaution, were executed and attested by three witnesses. One of the three witnesses was Daniel Moore, a solicitor, the writer of the instructions, who is since dead.

The instrument, being instructions, is for the most part expressed in the third person: it is headed—"Instructions for the will of George Harrison, Esquire:

"He desires to give to his sister, Mary Page, widow, an annual sum of £200 during her natural life; and, after her decease, he desires that the same annual sum be continued to her two sons."

But the present question arises upon a clause containing a bequest to Robert Stone, one of the executors, in these words:—

"Gives to Mr. Robert Stone all such money as shall be due to the testator at the time of his decease."

There are other words which were erased, viz. "him" at the end of the first line; "me from him" at the beginning of the second line; but "me" is carried out to the left. These words are struck through. "My" also, between "of" and "decease" is struck through; and "his" written over it. The probate, however, was taken as the clause stood altered by the erasures; that is—"Gives to Mr. Robert Stone all such money as shall be due to the testator at the time of his decease." (a)[2]

This probate remained till March, 1829, when [549] a decree calling it in issued,

---

(a)[1] Cited 3 Phill. 459. 3 Add. 239 (n) S. C.

(a)[2] The clause with the erasures and interlineations stood thus:—"Gives to Mr. Robert Stone all such money as shall be due to ~~him me from him~~ his the testator at the time of ~~my~~ decease."

at the suit of one of the executors, viz. the residuary legatee, and citing Robert Stone, the other surviving executor and the legatee under this clause, to shew cause "why the former probate should not be revoked and a new probate granted with the words 'from him' inserted as having been erroneously and incautiously struck through."

To this decree an appearance has been given under protest; and the matter comes on by act on petition and affidavits. Whether there was any necessity to appear under protest, for there is no ground to object to the jurisdiction, no ground strictly amounting to any bar, if such circumstances should be stated as would clearly and safely establish error—need not be inquired into by the Court: but the real object is to ascertain whether, upon the circumstances suggested, the Court can legally and securely allow the executor and residuary legatee now to go into proof, in order to shew that the words proposed to be reinstated, were "erroneously and incautiously" struck out without the knowledge and contrary to the intentions of the testator.

The instrument was executed by the deceased, and attested by the witnesses, with the words struck through: primâ facie, then, whether the instrument was intended to have effect, or was only executed as a precautionary measure, yet still I must consider it as containing the final wishes of the testator. There have been instances where a clause, introduced by fraud, has been expunged; where a clause omitted by error has been supplied; but in those [550] cases there has been the concurrence of two circumstances—first, some ambiguity on the face of the executed instrument itself; and, secondly, the means of obtaining clear and indisputable proof that the insertion or omission of the clause was contrary to the intention of the testator. These two things must concur before the Court can safely interpose. In the present case some intervening circumstances may be noticed. There is conflicting evidence as to the exact time when Stone first set up a claim to all the debts; but this is not very material, since it will not prove the intention of the testator: at all events the claim is admitted to have been set up four years ago, and, more expressly, in February, 1827, in May of which year a bill in Chancery was actually filed by Stone against the residuary legatee. That bill went to a hearing; and in February, 1829, the Master of the Rolls decided in favour of Stone's application. Mr. Moore, the drawer of the will, died on the 6th of January, 1828, that is after the bill was filed, and before the decision of the Master of the Rolls; so that it is not till after all these events—the bill filed, the decree at the Rolls, and the death of the solicitor—that the residuary legatee sets up in this Court this error in the will. The suit is instituted eight years after the testator's death, and probate had been taken of his will.

The words indeed of the bequest are strong—"not admitting of any latitude of construction"—as expressed in the language of the act on petition.

What, however, is to be the clear and decisive proof of the unintentional erasure? Even the [551] drawer of the instrument, Mr. Moore, is dead. His evidence, therefore, the best parol evidence, cannot be obtained to shew error; on the contrary, his testimony, as far as it can be obtained, exists in an affidavit, produced at taking probate by the residuary legatee himself, that the erasures were made by the directions of the deceased, and read over to him previous to the execution. And there are also Mr. Moore's own written document, and his conduct in obtaining the deceased's execution of it in its present state, both as to shape and contents. Now what is there to oppose to this, and to satisfy the judicial mind of the Court that the general terms in which this bequest now stands were not fully understood and approved of by the testator?

True it is, as has been argued, that the nature of the bequest is not very common; and, therefore, the probability upon conjecture would be rather in favor of there being some error, especially as Stone himself was a debtor to the testator's estate for the sum of £1500; (a) the release of which debt alone would have been considerable; and Sir George Naylor, in his affidavit, has expressed his belief and opinion that the deceased so intended the bequest.

Sir George Naylor states that the deceased, in giving the instructions, said, "I give to Mr. Stone all the money that he owes me:" and no doubt he has fairly stated his impression: but declarations to be spoken to by a third party are so open to mistake and misapprehension as [552] to be very liable to error. What a slight alteration would alter the whole sense and make the bequest conformable to the will as altered.

(a) The debts owing to the testator at the time of his death amounted altogether to £3500.

"All that he owes me;" or "all that is owing to me," are easily misapprehended or misrecollected at the end of eight years. Here is no written document suggested to be forthcoming which can in any degree lay a foundation for, and corroborate, the existence of any error. No fair copy, containing the words struck through, was engrossed for execution; no cotemporaneous evidence of that sort on which the Court can rely can be furnished. In Blackwood against Damer (3 Phill. 459, 485) the Court had evidence of that description: but still what it most relied upon were the written instructions. So again, in Bayldon against Bayldon (3 Add. 232), there were the instructions: the very draft of the will, in Baron Wood's own handwriting, had the names of the parties who were to be benefited. But upon mere parol declarations, without any thing in writing, after such a length of time, to hold that the words in the executed instrument were "erroneously and incautiously struck through;" and for the Court to reinstate them would be a most dangerous precedent. I therefore feel bound to dismiss Mr. Stone.

Protest sustained.

Upon Mr. Stone's costs being applied for, the Court observed that it was an important question, and declined to grant them.

[553] BIRD v. BIRD. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 4th Session, 1829.—The costs of exceptive allegations tendered on both sides (the admission whereof was suspended till the final hearing, and then not prayed to be received) not allowed to be taxed against a party condemned in costs.

On taxation of costs.

From the sentence in this cause (see Bird v. Bird, supra, 142) an appeal was instituted by the next of kin. After the process had been brought into the Court of Delegates the appellants delayed, contrary to established practice, to print it; and on the 29th of May their proctor notified to his parties that he should not proceed further in the prosecution of the appeal. The respondents having printed the process, and no appointment of a new proctor on behalf of the appellants having taken place, the respondents on the 24th of June by their counsel prayed a sentence; when the Court, consisting of Mr. Justice Gaselee, Mr. Baron Vaughan, Mr. Justice James Parke, and Doctors Phillimore, Gostling, Blake, and Pickard, affirmed the decision of the Prerogative Court, with 200l. nomine expensarum, in the Court of Appeal, and remitted the cause.

Upon the remission of the cause the taxation of costs in the Prerogative Court was referred to the deputy registrar in the usual way; when it was objected on the part of the next of kin that the costs in respect to two exceptive allegations, the admission of which, after argument, had been suspended till the hearing of the cause, and which were then not adverted to, should not be taxed as against them.

The matter was brought to the notice of the Court for its directions.

[554] Per Curiam. Both parties offered exceptive allegations; neither of which was then admitted; their admission being suspended till the hearing of the cause; and the cause was ultimately decided without either; both, then, were unnecessary. As neither was admitted the Court will consider this matter as if neither had been offered, and as forming no part of the necessary costs. They are, consequently, not to be allowed on taxation against the party condemned in costs. And this view of the case is, in the present instance, the more just, because it is stated and admitted that the unsuccessful party offered to go to a hearing without any exceptive allegation on either side. The subsequent decision shews the propriety of that offer; and that the offer ought to have been accepted.

Without, then, laying down any general rule respecting costs upon exceptive allegations, not admitted nor rejected, I direct them, in this particular case, not to be included in the costs in which the party has been condemned.

IN THE GOODS OF JOSEPH KNIGHT. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, By-Day, 1829.—Probate granted to a deed, testamentary in its whole purport and effect, and not to operate till after death.

On motion.

In 1819 Mr. and Mrs. Knight executed a deed conveying property to trustees for the use of the deceased and his wife; and, upon the death of the survivor, to pay over the property in certain parts to different persons. Mr. Knight survived his wife, and died, not having made [555] any will, and without having exercised a power, reserved to him, of revoking the uses and trusts of the deed.

The King's advocate, after stating that the deed was in its whole purport and effect testamentary, and not to operate until after the death of Mr. Knight, moved for probate of the instrument to be granted to the residuary legatees in trust named in the deed, as executors according to the tenor.(a)

Per Curiam. Let the probate pass as prayed.

Motion granted.

IN THE GOODS OF BENJAMIN CAMPBELL. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, By-Day, 1829.—A will, in existence after the testator's death, being accidentally lost and the contents unknown, administration limited till the will be found granted (on justifying securities) to the widow alone, with a minor daughter, entitled in distribution.

[Referred to, In the Goods of Wright, [1893] P. 22. Not followed, Hewson v. Shelley, [1913] 2 Ch. 402; [1914] 2 Ch. 44.]

On motion.

The deceased, late assistant surgeon of the medical staff at Maidstone, Kent, died there in January, 1829; he left a widow and a minor daughter, the only persons entitled in distribution.

Some years prior to his death he transmitted a sealed packet to Mr. Collyer, his agent in London, informing him that it contained his will, and requesting that he would take charge of it. On the 15th of January, 1829, Collyer received a letter from the commanding officer of [556] the depot at Maidstone, apprising him of Campbell's death, and enclosing a letter, addressed, "Mrs. Campbell, 164 Trongate, Glasgow," to be forwarded. The letter and packet intrusted by the deceased to Mr. Collyer were, on the same day, put into the post-office in London, and reached Glasgow; but the letter carrier, not being able to find Mrs. Campbell, returned the letter and packet to the post-office. They were never afterwards traced. A diligent search was made at the post-offices at Glasgow, Edinburgh, and London; and various advertisements inserted in the newspapers in respect to the lost packet, but no information was obtained. The deceased's papers were searched, and no draft nor copy of the will could be discovered. Upon affidavit to the above effect Phillimore moved for letters of administration to be granted to Margaret Campbell, widow of the deceased, limited until the original will should be found and brought into the registry.

The property was in the funds and under £1200.

Per Curiam. The affidavit of Mr. Collyer shews that the will was in existence after the death of the testator; and there is no reason to conjecture that it is suppressed. I shall grant the administration to the widow, limited till the original will be found; but I direct the securities to justify.

Motion granted.

[557] ROXBURGH v. LAMBERT. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, By-Day, 1829.—The Court grants administration to a bond creditor who has also a mortgage on leasehold property.

On motion.

William Lambert, a carpenter, died in 1827. He left a widow and one child. On the 29th of June, 1829, a decree issued against the widow and child why administration should not be granted to Francis Roxburgh, a creditor by bond. After the decree had been served it was ascertained that the demands of the creditor were secured by a mortgage on certain leasehold property; and it was suggested in the registry that the security by mortgage might disqualify him from taking administration as a creditor.

Curteis moved for the administration.

Per Curiam. There is no difficulty in allowing this administration to pass. A bond creditor has a lien even on freeholds, yet the Court grants administration to a bond creditor. Here the mortgage is on leasehold property, which is subject to simple contract debts and to the claims of creditors generally; and the bond is to be regarded as a collateral security to the mortgage. If the grant were prayed by a mortgagee of real property, there might be a reason why the administration should not pass to him, because it would give him a priority and exclude simple contract creditors. In this case I decree the administration.

(a) A Chancery barrister had given an opinion that the legacy duty attached on the benefits conveyed by this deed.

Motion granted.

[558] LE BRETON v. FLETCHER. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, By-Day, 1829. —A will may be pronounced for, though both the attesting witnesses depose to the deceased's incapacity.

Phillimore in support of the will.

Lushington contrà.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The deceased, Mary Anne Fletcher, a married woman, died on the 19th of April in the present year; and the will propounded is made under a power, reserved in her marriage settlement, enabling her to dispose of certain property by a will attested by two witnesses. The will in question is dated on the 18th of April, 1829, the day preceding her death; it is propounded by one of the residuary legatees, and opposed by the husband of the deceased. The plea, propounding the instrument, sets forth, in the first article, the power under the settlement, but is, in other respects, a common condidit. This is the only plea in the cause, so that the husband has produced no witnesses, but contented himself with administering interrogatories. Three witnesses have been examined by the residuary legatee; Sir Thomas Harvie Farquhar, the executor who has renounced; Sarah Nixon, and Mary Turner (servants in the family), the two attesting witnesses.

The case depends much on the credit of the witnesses. Sir Thomas Farquhar, who was the deceased's banker, and one of the trustees under her marriage settlement, and also an executor of a former will, gives a full and detailed account of instructions on the 17th of April; for the codicil, written by him in pencil on that [559] day, and signed by the deceased, is, in substance, the same disposition as the will now propounded, which is to give effect to the intentions there expressed; there is a mere alteration in form but no deviation in substance.

It appears from Sir Thomas Farquhar's evidence that he shewed this codicil to his confidential clerk, who had prepared the deceased's former will, and that they considered a new will would be more convenient than a codicil. His evidence further states the preparation of the present will with blanks for some of the legacies, his attending the deceased on the 18th, explaining to her the state of her property, her approbation of the will and directions for filling up the blanks, the reading over, final approbation, the calling in of Nixon and Turner as witnesses, the execution of the will by the deceased, and the subsequent attestation of the two female witnesses. Unless, therefore, the whole of this account is gross perjury, there can be no doubt of volition and capacity: and the will, I repeat, is in substance and effect the same as the pencil codicil.

The two female servants venture to swear that the deceased was in a state of incapacity: they were, it must be remembered, merely present at the execution; they have deposed against their own act, and, what is more important (coupled with the general tone of their evidence), they are still in the service of the husband. They have described him as a most affectionate husband, and that the deceased always spoke of him as such.

From the evidence of Sir Thomas Farquhar, who would hardly have deposed to it, if not true, [560] the husband had dissipated the greater part of the deceased's fortune, and, according to his account, she spoke of him very differently from what is stated by these women servants.(a) Again, Sir Thomas Farquhar deposes that, on the 18th, he brought with him the whole of the deceased's balance; she said she would take £60, and signed a draft for that sum. £50 she put under her pillow for the use of her husband, and the remaining £10 she gave to Miss Le Breton for the use of the house. This account then, if untrue, might be most easily contradicted; and, if true, it shews capacity, and falsifies and totally destroys the evidence of the two servants.

(a) Under the marriage settlement the husband received £2000 on the day of marriage; and, by the will propounded, the deceased left him all her furniture and other effects in the house in which she was then residing; but not her plate and trinkets, which were in the care of Herries, Farquhar and Co.; and she directed her executor to pay all her funeral expences, and such debts and tradesmen's bills as he might be satisfied had been incurred for her sole and separate use.

Upon the whole, I am of opinion that the truth of the case is as represented by Sir Thomas Farquhar; and that the two witnesses, who, without offering the least objection, attested the will, have not given a correct account of the state of the deceased at the time she executed it, and I therefore pronounce for the will.

[561] JOHNSON v. WELLS. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, By-Day, 1829.—A second marriage and the birth of issue is not a revocation of a will made in favour of the children of a former marriage and an illegitimate child, where the second wife has some real property settled on her and her issue under her father's will, and where the deceased had possession and full knowledge of the existence of such will.

[Discussed, Israel v. Rodon, 1839, 2 Moore, P. C. 66.]

This was a cause of proving in solemn form of law the will of Jacob Wells: and the question was whether, under the circumstances, marriage and the birth of a child was a revocation of a will made (during widowhood) in favour of the issue of the testator's first marriage, and also of an illegitimate child.

The King's advocate and Phillimore for the executor. The presumption of law, by which it has been held that marriage and the birth of issue induce a revocation of a will previously executed, does not apply to this case. The widow has a fund at her own disposal, which, considering the deceased's property and the state of his family, is a fair provision for herself and child. Talbot and Talbot is decisive of this case (vol. i. p. 705). If an intestacy be pronounced for, an illegitimate daughter, for whom the deceased entertained the strongest affection to the hour of his death, will be left—contrary to the clear and manifest intentions of the testator—wholly destitute.

Addams and Haggard for the widow. The deceased frequently declared that his [562] wife should have all her own fortune, and that he would provide for the child by his second marriage: but he died without completing these intentions. The evidence also clearly proves that, in consequence of his second marriage and the birth of issue, he intended to alter his will: the presumption of law, therefore, that the will is revoked, is sustained rather than rebutted. In Talbot v. Talbot there was a marriage settlement, and the child was provided for; here, if the will is established, the son born of the second marriage is liable to be left wholly without a provision; while, in case of an intestacy, the interests of all parties will be secured, except of the natural daughter, and she will have an equitable claim on the widow and children.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This case is so clear that the Court cannot entertain a doubt upon it. The deceased, Jacob Wells, died on the 24th of November, 1828: he left a widow, a daughter, and two sons by a former marriage; and one son by the latter marriage. The children are all minors; and the daughter is illegitimate, being born a few months before Mr. Wells' marriage with his first wife. At his death he was possessed of property amounting to about 6500l.: there was also a sum of 2150l. 3 per cents. standing in the joint names of the deceased and his second wife; and a real estate, about 600l. in value, secured, under her father's will, to her and to her issue.

[563] In 1816 the deceased, then a widower, executed a will, leaving his fortune equally between his then three children, including the daughter before marriage; and appointing Edward Wells, his brother, and Johnson, his brother-in-law, executors. In May, 1825, he married a second wife, Mary Rutter, who under her father's will was entitled to two or three thousand pounds (the precise amount is not material to the decision of this case), left to her separate use. Previous to her marriage a settlement was intended, but, before it was fully drawn up, the marriage took place; however, immediately after the marriage, stock in the 3 per cents., to the amount I have already stated, was invested in their joint names. She is now entitled to that stock, and to the little freehold estate for her life, making together from 2 to 3000l. Of this marriage a child was born, who survived the deceased, and who is not two years old.

The question, then, is, whether, under these circumstances, the marriage and birth of a child revoked the will of 1816. It is not suggested that the deceased was unacquainted with the existence of that will: the whole case, indeed, admits his knowledge of it: the will was in his possession, and he did not cancel it. Nor is it suggested that he intended to die intestate. The effect of an intestacy would be, that one-third would go to the wife, and the other two-thirds be divided equally between the two children of the former and the child of the latter marriage; while the whole of the wife's property would benefit exclusively her and her child; and his illegitimate daughter, from whom [564] his regard was not in any degree withdrawn, would be left wholly unprovided for.

The deceased talked of making a new will, and possibly might so have intended; but that will not vitiate the instrument propounded; and it is not inconsistent with the intention and with the belief that the existing will would operate until he revoked it by making a new one. His conduct strengthens this view of the case; for, as I have mentioned, he was fully aware of the existence of the will; it was in his own house, and he preserved it till his death. The declarations, then, are little to be relied upon: they passed in general conversation, and may have been insincere: but the facts are much more material.

Marriage and issue is not an absolute revocation; it is only a presumptive or implied revocation, and the implication may be repelled by circumstances. It has been held in several cases that the presumption does not arise where there are children of a first marriage, and there is a provision for the second wife and her issue. In Kenebel v. Scrafton (2 East, 530), and in Ex parte Ilchester (7 Ves. jun. 348), the presumption was repelled.

Without, then, entering into a minute investigation of the principles on which these rules are founded, and which are fully laid down in several reported cases, the present case is this, that the wife's fortune (whether precisely the whole or not is immaterial) is so placed as to form a provision for her and her child: the children of the first marriage will not partake [565] of it. The widow will be exclusively entitled to the 3 per cent. stock, and to the enjoyment of the freehold.

Under these circumstances it seems to me quite clear, both upon principle and authority, that the will of 1816 is not by implication revoked. I accordingly pronounce for it, and decree probate to the executors; but, upon the whole, shall make no order as to costs.

[566] THE OFFICE OF THE JUDGE PROMOTED BY HOILE v. SCALES. Consistory Court of London, Trinity Term, By-Day, 1829.—In a vestry-meeting for civil purposes, as a full latitude of discussion must be allowed, mere coarse expressions do not constitute "brawling:" but on proof of an act of "smiting," the Court is bound, whatever may be the origin of the dispute, to proceed to award punishment under the 5 & 6 Edw. 6, c. 4, and 53 Geo. 3, c. 127.—A party pronounced excommunicate, sentenced to seven days' imprisonment, and condemned in costs.

This was a cause in which the office of the Judge was promoted by William Hoile, one of the churchwardens of St. Mary, Stratford, Bow, in the county of Middlesex, against Michael Scales, a parishioner, "for quarrelling, chiding, and brawling by words at a certain meeting of the parishioners of the said parish held in the vestry-room situate in the churchyard and adjoining to, and communicating with, the parish church; and for laying violent hands upon Thomas Bilton in the said vestry-room."

The criminal charge was set forth in the second of five articles, and was as follows:—"That on Thursday, the 27th of November, 1828, a meeting of the parishioners of Bow aforesaid was held in the vestry-room [as before described] for the purpose of receiving the report of a committee of the parishioners appointed to obtain an act of parliament for watching and lighting the parish, and for other matters relating thereto; that John Coward, one of the churchwardens, presided as chairman; that Thomas Bilton, the attorney ap-[567]-pointed for the said act of parliament, and for the parish, was present; that Michael Scales delayed and interrupted the proceedings of such meeting for a considerable time by proposing and discussing subjects unconnected with the business upon which it had been called, although Coward requested the attention of the meeting to such business; and that Scales, in a brawling, chiding, and quarrelsome manner, declared 'that no lawyers were wanted there,' and insisted 'that Bilton should leave the vestry-room,' and proposed a resolution to that effect. That Coward declined to put such motion, and stated 'that Bilton was his legal adviser, and that he wished him to remain.' That Scales then in a brawling and quarrelsome manner declared 'that Coward should leave the chair and another chairman be appointed, as he was unworthy to fill the situation,' and made a brawling noise and thereby caused great confusion in the vestry-room and interrupted the business of the meeting. That Coward thereupon left the chair, and declared the meeting to be at an end."

The article further objected, "That Scales, on Coward going towards the door, did then come from the upper end of the vestry-room and lay violent hands on Bilton (who was at the lower end of the room speaking to Willis, the vestry clerk of the parish), by taking hold of him, Bilton, by the arm and back, and forcibly and violently pushing against him, upon which Bilton sat down, when Scales again laid violent hands on him, by seizing him by the collar of his coat and clasping him round the waist and arm, and dragging him, and [568] placing and driving his knuckles against Bilton's face, and endeavouring by force to put him out of the vestry-room to the great offence of the persons therein assembled, and in violation of the statute (5 & 6 Edw. 6, c. 4) and of the laws, statutes, canons, and constitutions ecclesiastical of this realm."

The articles concluded: "That the defendant might be decreed to have incurred the penalty of the statute; be duly and according to the exigency of the law corrected; and admonished to refrain from the like behaviour in future, and condemned in costs."

On the part of the defendant an allegation was admitted; which, after alleging that he did not interrupt the proceedings of the vestry by discussing irrelevant subjects, nor conduct himself towards Bilton or Coward as set forth in the articles, went on to plead:—"That the committee had failed to obtain the act of parliament in consequence of their application for the same not having been made conformably with the Standing Orders of the House of Commons, and had procured the said vestry meeting with a view of obtaining from the parishioners an indemnity for expences to be incurred, and a reimbursement of expences already incurred by them, in and about the matter relative to which they had been so appointed; that at such meeting a report, purporting to be a report of the said committee but which had been prepared by a few members thereof only, and was not sanctioned, but was disapproved of by the majority of the committee, was submitted to the parishioners then assembled, and occasioned [569] much discussion amongst them. That the senior churchwarden was the chairman or president of the meeting; that Bilton, although neither a parishioner or inhabitant of the said parish nor, as untruly set forth, the attorney for the parish, insisted that he had a right to be there as the legal adviser of Coward; and that Bilton acting, or pretending to act in that character, frequently interrupted the proceedings of the vestry, and conducted himself in a quarrelsome, chiding and brawling manner therein, making use of very insulting, abusive, and scurrilous language to several of the parishioners then present, and he persisted in so doing notwithstanding he was repeatedly desired by several parishioners to desist. That a motion was at length made by said Scales, and duly seconded, that Bilton should be requested to withdraw from the meeting: but Coward refused to put the same to the vote. That Coward having shortly afterwards left the chair and withdrawn from the vestry-room, Bilton was again requested to leave, but that he obstinately refused, and continued interrupting the proceedings and insisting, contrary to the wish of the vestry, that the vestry clerk should leave the vestry: that still persisting in talking and conducting himself in a passionate, quarrelsome, and brawling manner, Scales (who, amongst others, had before endeavoured to persuade Bilton to leave the meeting), with a view to attract and engage his attention, then took hold of the cuff of Bilton's coat-sleeve, not with violence but in a gentle manner and as having something to communicate to him, and whilst so doing he mildly addressed him: 'Mr. Bilton, I request you [570] will withdraw from the vestry, you perceive you are interrupting the proceedings;' or to that effect: that thereupon Bilton arose from his seat in a great passion, and seizing Scales by the collar endeavoured with great violence to force him backwards into the fire, but was prevented in such endeavour by the interference of several of the persons present; that he then struck Scales several violent blows on his side and body with his elbows and on the throat with his clenched fist, and continued to do so until he was taken away, and expelled from the vestry-room. That Coward and Bilton caused great confusion in the vestry, and interrupted the business, and gave great offence to the parishioners."

In support of the articles four witnesses were examined.

John Coward deposed: "That he was senior churchwarden of Saint Mary, Stratford, Bow, that on the 27th of November, 1828, a general meeting of the inhabitants was held, pursuant to the notice 'to receive the report of the committee, appointed by vestry of the 20th of December, 1827, for the purpose of applying for an act of parliament for watching, lighting, and improving the highways and repairing the drains of the parish.' Deponent was chosen the chairman; there were present about thirty persons, Bilton was present; he was not a parishioner of Bow, but was the parish attorney appointed by the select vestry, and he had been employed by the committee: the report to be then presented to the vestry had been prepared by him, and deponent had expressed a wish that he should at-[571]-tend. Scales sat next to deponent on his left hand: he, Scales, read the report by his own desire and made some passing comments as he went on: and afterwards proceeded to speak on other matters, particularly the conduct of the 'churchyard committee,' whom he censured for having run the parish to an expence of five hundred pounds for what might have been had for fifteen, which led to his being contradicted by the vestry clerk and others. Deponent repeatedly admonished the meeting that they were travelling out of the road into matters with which they had nothing to do; but Scales, more particularly, continued to talk on in what the deponent considered a very irregular manner. No motion was made, but there was a good deal of clamour and confusion arising from Scales' observations; in the midst of which Griffiths, a parishioner, apparently asked some questions of, or spoke to, Bilton, who was near him; upon which Scales said warmly, 'We want no lawyers here;' and he desired Bilton to leave the room; deponent desired him to remain as his legal adviser, and told Scales 'that he had a right to the attendance of a legal adviser, as much as he, Scales, had to the attendance of reporters, whom he had on a former occasion insisted should be present.' In the confusion some one, Scales as he believes, proposed that Bilton should leave the room; deponent refused to put the motion to the meeting, stating, as he had repeatedly done, that the vestry was called to receive the report and for no other business. High words ensued, in which Scales took a prin-[572]-cipal part, and deponent was hissed for not putting the motion aforesaid. Scales said 'that deponent was unworthy to fill the situation he was in, and that they would have another chairman.' A motion was then made and put by Scales 'that deponent should be turned out of the chair;' and deponent was voted out. Deponent, therefore, declared the business of the meeting ended, and immediately went to the lower end of the room, and desired Willis, the vestry clerk, to shut up his book and go away, as the vestry was over. Scales said 'that Willis should not leave.' Just at that time Bilton stooped apparently to speak to Willis, whereupon Scales came up and seized Bilton by the collar, whom he held fast with his right hand so closed that his knuckles were in Bilton's face. Bilton endeavoured to sit down, and, as appeared to deponent, to slip down from Scales' grasp. Scales, as appeared to deponent, was endeavouring to push him, Bilton, into the churchyard, but by the struggling and the interference of other parties they went across violently to the other side of the room: whether they fell or not deponent is not sure; he did not see that. Bilton, when disentangled, came up to deponent, who observed the marks of Scales' knuckles on Bilton's cheek plainly. Bilton had undoubtedly been used very ill. Willis went out with the minute book in the disturbance, and deponent went away accompanied by Bilton. Scales conducted himself on the occasion in a disorderly, quarrelsome, and offensive manner. The meeting lasted as much as about two hours; but the business for which it was called was not transacted owing to Scales."

[573] Upon interrogatories:—"Respondent was a member of the committee appointed to obtain the act of parliament, in which they had failed: they had not been in time, as he believed, to comply with some Standing Order of the House of Commons, though, as he believes, that difficulty might have been got over but for the opposition in the parish. The meeting (deposed of) was not procured by the committee, or any of them, as he believes, to obtain an indemnity from the parishioners in respect to expences incurred by the committee: nothing, as he recollects, was said about them, except by Scales himself. All who were present of the committee were unanimous in adopting the report. Bilton is the parish solicitor, and was such at, and previous to, the time when the meeting was held. Since his appointment he has been employed in the business of the parish; and had been occasionally before. Bilton did not at all interrupt the proceedings of the vestry: he used no insulting, abusive, or scurrilous language; he did not conduct himself in a quarrelsome, chiding, and brawling manner; and he was not desired to desist from so doing. The motion that Bilton should withdraw respondent refused to put. Many, and a majority of those present, took part with Scales in his resolution that respondent was incompetent, or, as he believes it was, unworthy to fill the situation of chairman. Respondent did quit the chair; but Bilton did not remain after respondent had left the vestry: he was there after respondent had left the chair, and was about to leave the room with respondent when detained. Bilton did not insist that the vestry clerk should leave the [574] room; nor, to respondent's knowledge, at any time interfere with the proceedings, otherwise than by sending a memorandum to respondent, when in the chair, advising him to confine the attention of the meeting to the report: and respondent acted, as far as he could, on that suggestion. Respondent does not know or believe that Bilton did by his conduct endeavour to prevent the vestry from coming to a conclusion on the business for which it had been called: respondent believes that Bilton, considering that the meeting was properly at an end when respondent left the chair, gave an opinion to that effect to the vestry clerk; and that he had no other object in view than to give him good advice. Bilton acted throughout, in all that respondent saw, in a very quiet, inoffensive, and gentlemanlike manner. Ministrant did not endeavour to induce Bilton to leave the room, but seized him at once by the collar: he did not, as with a view to obtain Bilton's attention, take hold of the cuff of his coat-sleeve; he seized him in a violent and outrageous manner. Scales did not say as interrogate, 'Bilton, I request you will withdraw from the vestry; you perceive you are interrupting the proceedings;' or any thing to that effect. Bilton did not arise from his seat, as if in a great passion, and seize Scales by the collar and endeavour with great violence and exertion to force him backwards towards the fire-place: several persons interfered, in consequence of Scales having seized Bilton: respondent does not believe that Bilton struck Scales any blow whatever: Bilton was not expelled from the vestry-room: Bilton's language, conduct, and behaviour did not cause [575] confusion in the vestry, nor give offence to the parishioners then assembled; it could not have so done."

Thomas Bilton deposed: "That he was solicitor to the parish generally, having been appointed by the select vestry: the meeting of the 27th of November was only to receive the report of the committee: Scales said 'they did not want lawyers there;' and shortly afterwards desired deponent should leave the room: deponent had forwarded two or three slips of paper to the chairman, on which he had written suggestions to him to recall the meeting to the business of the day, and get it either to receive the report or reject it. On the chairman having stated that he required deponent's presence as his legal adviser, Scales said 'that they were not to be dragooned by lawyers.' When the chairman desired the vestry clerk to close his book and leave, Scales called out that the vestry clerk should not leave; the churchwarden repeated his direction, the meeting being over. The vestry clerk seemed to be in some doubt how to act, and looked at deponent as if to ask what he should do; and deponent, putting his head down, said to him softly, 'You had better leave, you hear what the churchwarden says.' Just at that moment deponent was seized by Scales, who, coming behind him, took hold of him round the waist, and by one of his arms, which he pressed forcibly, saying, 'Come, sir:' deponent turning a little, said to Scales, 'Take care what you are about;' and succeeded in sitting down on a bench close by. Scales then took hold of deponent by the collars of the two coats which he wore, with his right hand, and, by deponent's right arm with his left hand, [576] he by force lifted deponent up, and, though with what design he knows not, proceeded to haul deponent about with great violence; pulling and shaking him, and turning his fist over, forced the knuckles of his right hand against deponent's cheek bone: he was thus held and pulled about for two or three minutes: deponent offered and attempted no violence in return: he found himself sore in his back and loins on the following day from the violence."

Upon interrogatories: "The vestry meeting was not procured to obtain an indemnity from the parishioners in respect to the expences of the committee: respondent, from December, 1827, acted as attorney for the parish in parish appeals and other business; he has no recollection of any person having desired him to desist from interrupting the proceedings."

Isaac Willis, of Stratford, Essex, deposed: "He has been vestry clerk of the parish of Bow during the last twelve or thirteen years: at the vestry meeting aforesaid Scales sat on the chairman's left hand, deponent at the other end of the table, and Bilton very near to him, to the left, at the side of the table. It was proposed that the report of the committee should be read by deponent, but Scales said, 'I'll read it:' he made many desultory remarks as he proceeded, and wandered to other subjects, particularly reflecting on the conduct of the churchyard committee, whom he accused of jobbing and making bargains, good for lawyers and surveyors, but very bad for the parish; and he censured their conduct in strong terms: some of his assertions were contradicted, and this led to strife and confusion, being moreover foreign to [577] the business. Scales made an observation to the effect that they were not to be dragooned by lawyers; and the chairman refusing to put Scales' motion that Bilton should leave the room, Scales said 'that if he did not put it they would have another chairman;' and he proposed a resolution to the effect that Coward should leave the chair, being unworthy of the situation. Deponent tried to unhand Scales from Bilton, but he could not; Scales held him too tightly; and deponent then went away, leaving Bilton in Scales' grasp, who was handling him roughly. The business of the day was not transacted; the proceedings were first irregular, afterwards disorderly and riotous, and shamefully so, and all this was entirely owing to the conduct of Scales."

Upon interrogatories: "Bilton did not at all interrupt the proceedings; he did not use any insulting or abusive language. Respondent having stopped him to remark that he felt awkwardly situated, and having asked him how to act, Bilton said privately to him, 'that the vestry being ended, no more business could be done.' It was not the cuff of Bilton's coat-sleeve that ministrant took hold of; it was not the action of a man who did it only to obtain attention."

James Harris, the parish clerk, supported the testimony of the other witnesses, and deposed that he saw marks of violence upon Bilton's face.

Upon interrogatories, he deposed: "Several of the parishioners went with Scales in his objection to Bilton's being present; that he had no right to be there, and was interfering with [578] the vestry. Bilton was desired by one or two of the parishioners not to interfere: he denied that he did interfere; and he did no more than answer a question or two: neither his language nor behaviour was violent, passionate, or quarrelsome."

On behalf of the defendant four witnesses were also examined:

James Meikle, surveyor, deposed: "He was present at the vestry meeting held in November, 1828, to receive the report of a committee to obtain an act of parliament for watching and lighting Bow parish. It appeared to deponent, and was pretty generally believed at the meeting, that the object of the committee was to procure from the parish an indemnity for the expences to be, and reimbursement of those already, incurred in the unsuccessful attempt to procure the act of parliament.(a)[1] There was a good deal of discussion, but deponent does not remember the report being read. Bilton claimed a right to be present as Coward's legal adviser; he interfered several times: his remarks appeared to be considered an interruption; his manner, however, was not quarrelsome or brawling in the first instance: he was repeatedly desired not to interrupt the business, but he went on making remarks and dictating to Coward; he endeavoured to forward Coward's views in requiring Willis to go away with the books; for this purpose he spoke in a loud and angry tone. Willis was [579] about taking up the books, when Scales rose from his seat, went towards him, desiring him not to take away the books, as they were the property of the parish. Bilton was standing by Willis at the time, and Scales, as he approached him, took hold of Bilton's arm, just below the elbow, coolly and calmly, and without the least force or violence said to him, 'Mr. Bilton, I request you will withdraw; you see it is the general wish, and you must perceive you are interrupting the business.' Bilton, who was standing up, immediately thrust his elbow with great violence against Scales' chest or stomach, and endeavoured with all his force and might to thrust him into the fire; and deponent has no doubt he would have accomplished it if those present had not prevented it, by catching hold of him as he was falling. Deponent did not see any blows struck: Bilton went away of his own accord, and was not thrust out nor expelled.(a)[2] Deponent considers that Bilton and Coward's conduct was the cause of the confusion at the vestry."

---

(a)[1] The same opinion was expressed by the remaining witnesses.

(a)[2] Upon these two points the other witnesses concurred.

Upon interrogatories: "There was a committee or confederation in the parish in opposition to the select vestry; they did what they considered necessary towards abolishing the select vestry; and they have mainly succeeded, having procured an act of parliament providing a new and better mode of appointing vestrymen. Respondent believes Bilton was appointed by the select vestry the attorney of the parish; he was not acknowledged as such by the [580] general body of the parishioners: respondent has seen him attending at one or two other parish meetings; no opposition was made to Bilton's remaining in the vestry-room until he interfered, as was conceived, improperly: respondent does not remember Scales reading the report; there was a great deal of discussion after it had been read, but whether on subjects for which the meeting was not called, respondent can hardly say. Scales did not appear to respondent to be irritated at any thing that passed. Scales several times told Bilton that he had no right to interfere; and he answered 'that he was only answering a question.' It was said, but whether by Scales respondent does not remember, 'that Coward was unworthy to fill the chair, as he would not put the motion that had been made.' Respondent does not remember to have heard Scales say that the vestry clerk should not leave the vestry, or take away the vestry book, unless he was the strongest man of the two. Scales took hold of Bilton's arm below the elbow; and Bilton said, 'You see how I have been used.' The report was certainly not received by the meeting; it was much objected to, if not rejected. Scales' general conduct was very proper, Bilton's very middling. Respondent was at the trial of the action brought by Bilton against Scales for the assault; no witnesses were examined for the defence; the plaintiff got a verdict with 5l. damages."

John Fairhead, surgeon, deposed: "Bilton interrupted several of the parishioners; his manner was loud and angry; language not [581] abusive; he said 'he would speak so long as any remarks were made on the report which concerned him.' A motion was then made by Scales, and seconded, that Bilton be requested to withdraw; but Bilton called out to Coward, 'Don't put that vote:' deponent does not remember to have heard Bilton make any remark about Willis going away, or conduct himself in a quarrelsome manner until addressed by Scales, who, taking hold of his arm mildly, as if for the purpose of drawing his attention to what he, Scales, was going to say, spoke to Bilton very mildly—'You see, sir, the business of the vestry cannot proceed; I request you will withdraw.' Bilton immediately rose, and by the collar forced Scales back towards the far end of the room, and in the direction of the fire; and he would have gone into it if he had not fallen against the mantle piece: deponent did not observe any one interfere; nor observe Bilton strike Scales."

Upon interrogatories: "Scales, in moving that Bilton should be requested to withdraw, observed that he was not a parishioner, and that they did not want a lawyer there to dragoon the vestry. Bilton said, in replying to Griffith's remarks, 'that he was only answering a question; that Griffiths had made an accusation against him, and he would answer it.' Scales desired Willis not to take the books away, and added 'that Willis should not take them away unless he was the strongest man of the two.' Scales is a man of warm temper, but with great command over himself: his conduct is rather violent at times: [582] he is a very public-spirited man: respondent has known him once, and not oftener, to have been guilty of an assault, and had damages awarded against him."

Charles Newman, lath-render, deposed: "Upon Coward leaving the chair, and telling Willis the vestry was at an end, Coward went towards the other end of the vestry, followed by Bilton; Scales was near him, and on Bilton saying he would not withdraw, Scales took hold of him by the arm and said, 'Do go; you had better go:' he did so in a mild and gentle manner. Bilton came upon Scales with all the force he could, and caught him round the waist: Scales was obliged to take a fresh hold of Bilton to defend himself."

Upon interrogatories: "Coward went from the upper to the lower end of the room, and directed the vestry clerk to close the book: Scales followed, and observed, 'that the vestry clerk should not take away the vestry book, unless he was the strongest man of the two.'"

Jesse Cullum, gentleman, deposed: Scales took hold of Bilton by the arm very gently; and said to him in a cool manner, "Why don't you go out, &c." In the struggle "Bilton had the first and best hold, which gave him the mastery, though much the weaker man of the two. Scales was quite cool, Bilton very warm and angry."

Upon interrogatories: "Scales went from the upper to the lower end of the room and declared 'that the vestry clerk should not take away the book unless he was the strongest man of the two.'"

[583] After the case had been opened the Court inquired of the counsel for the promoter on what words they relied to prove the charge of brawling.

The King's advocate and Pickard for the promoter. It may be admitted that there are no very strong words of brawling; but the general conduct and language of the defendant establish that charge. It is proved that he used these expressions—"We want no lawyers to dragoon us here:" "The chairman is unworthy to fill his situation," accompanied with a proposition that he should quit it. It must be also recollected that there was a committee or confederation of persons in this parish who caused circulars to be distributed for the purpose of raising subscriptions, with the avowed object of opposing the select vestry. But the most important part of the charge is "the smiting and laying hands" on Mr. Bilton. The articles upon this point are fully proved; and the evidence is borne out and corroborated by the previous demeanour of the defendant, as well as by the verdict and damages awarded by the jury against him in the Court of Common Pleas for the assault. It is true that proceedings are going on in this court against Mr. Bilton, upon a charge of brawling at this vestry meeting; but those proceedings were not instituted till very recently.(a) The presence of Mr. Bilton, [584] though not a parishioner, was proper and justifiable; he was the solicitor who had prepared the report, and attended the meeting as the legal adviser of the churchwarden, who was in the chair: and the vestry was held exclusively for the purpose of receiving that report. The circumstances of the case sufficiently shew, [585] there being contradictory evidence, on which side it is most probable the truth will be found. There can be no reasonable doubt whatever that Mr. Scales, on the occasion alleged, conducted himself in a highly improper and quarrelsome manner; and upon a sentence of excommunication has subjected himself to the penalties pointed out in the 53 Geo. 3, c. 127.

Addams for the defendant. The object of the vestry meeting is stated to have been for the purpose of receiving the report of certain parishioners in respect to an act of parliament for watching and lighting the parish, and for other matters relating

---

(a) O. J. by Glover v. Bilton. Trinity Term, 3rd Session.

In this—another suit for brawling, arising out of the transactions of the vestry meeting of the 27th of November, 1828, and instituted against Mr. Bilton, the party charged, in the case in the text, to have been assaulted—an application was made by Addams to the Court that the hearing of Hoile v. Scales might be suspended, in order that the two causes might be heard pari passu. The evidence, it was said, in this second suit was in great forwardness, and would be completed with all expedition and dispatch. The application was opposed by the King's advocate, on the ground of the two causes having commenced at very different periods; and that they were now in different states of progress.

Per Curiam. Without the consent of the promoter of the office, in Hoile v. Scales, I cannot accede to the present application, and defer the hearing of that cause for the purpose of consolidation. Indeed, I should have much difficulty, under any circumstances, in adopting such a course. If the court were to take the suits together, I am not aware that I could resort to the facts proved in this—the latter cause—as the grounds of my decision in the first. It would, I apprehend, be perfectly incompetent for me to advert to the evidence in the second cause. Many reasons concur in this view of the matter. Suppose, upon a consideration of the evidence in both causes, I should give sentence; and that one cause only were appealed, the Superior Court would have to pronounce its decision upon different evidence from what was before the court of primary jurisdiction. Other reasons, particularly that which respects the commencement of the two suits, weigh in this particular instance. In Hoile v. Scales the citation was taken out on the 10th of December, 1828; but in this case of Glover v. Bilton it was not extracted till the 28th of April in the present year. There is no reason why the promoter, who was active in instituting the first suit, should be guided by the dilatory conduct of the latter promoter. I refuse the application.

thereto. The meeting was therefore called purely for civil and not for ecclesiastical purposes, and it certainly would be desirable to hold meetings for civil purposes in the workhouse or elsewhere. I do not deny that in this parish a committee, or, as it is termed in the interrogatories, a confederation, exists for controuling the select vestry and opposing its acts when wrong or oppressive. That the churchwarden was at this meeting elected into the chair shews that all the individuals present met in proper temper; since a churchwarden is not, as a matter of right, entitled to the chair.(a) The only per-[586]-sons entitled to attend at a vestry meeting are those who pay church rate. Willis, the vestry clerk, and Bilton were present, and they are not parishioners of Bow. Whether relevant or irrelevant matter was passing will depend much upon the opinion of different witnesses: but the interference of Bilton was highly improper; he prompted the chairman and suggested to him to keep the meeting to the object for which it had been called. The defendant was perfectly justified in proposing that Bilton should quit the room when the latter was interrupting the business; and he had also a right to move that the churchwarden, upon his refusal to put a regular motion, should leave the chair: and the churchwarden had no authority, either officially or as chairman, to dissolve the meeting, and order the vestry clerk to close the books. The adjournment of a vestry is to be decided by the majority of votes. Stoughton v. Reynolds (1 Strange, 1045). No quarrelsome nor irritating language was used by the defendant. The words, "We don't want lawyers here to dragoon us," did not partake of the character of brawling, though it might be admitted that the expression was perhaps not refined, and might better have been avoided. But the preponderance of evidence shewed that there was every possible justification for the defendant. The vestry books were wrongfully detained.

In respect to the supposed assault four disinterested witnesses deposed that the conduct of the defendant was temperate, and that he was first assailed: and some confusion or mis-[587]-take may have arisen from there being two persons of the name of Scales. The situation of the parties, when the assault is stated to have begun, is important; for it is clear that Bilton was then sitting at the lower end of the room next to the door. It is impossible that the attack was premeditated, though Bilton might erroneously conceive that it was. The defendant, too, is a much more athletic man than Bilton, and yet Bilton, it is proved, was the aggressor. The res gestæ are all with the defendant: and the presumption is in favor of innocence. Again, the witnesses for the promoter are all interested. Who are they? Coward, the churchwarden, Willis, the vestry clerk, and Bilton, who had been turned out of his appointment under the select vestry, by the act of parliament recently obtained by the efforts of the defendant and his party. The defendant has been exposed to double proceedings. In the Court of Common Pleas no witnesses were called for the defence, in order to save the time of the court, as, in that action, the assault was necessarily proved; but the jury gave merely nominal damages. Here a sentence against the defendant will carry with it a severe penalty: but such proceedings should be discouraged. The proofs shew that the present suit is trifling and contemptible; and that whatever heat and irritation there might be arose from the illegal conduct of the chairman.

In reply. The character of the suit must depend on the facts in evidence. If the present case is established the office of the Judge has been properly promoted, and the Court will award an adequate [588] punishment. It has been argued that the defendant's conduct had every possible justification. We know of no legal justification. Hutchins v. Denziloe (1 Hagg. Con. 182) shews that, even if there were misconduct on one side, and which might give the first provocation, such a circumstance would not justify misconduct on the other. The brawling, in that case, arose at a vestry meeting for civil purposes.

Judgment—Dr. Lushington. This is a proceeding under the statute of 5th and 6th Edw. 6th, c. 4, instituted by one of the churchwardens of St. Mary, Stratford, Bow, against Michael Scales, a parishioner: and the articles charge "brawling and smiting"

(a) The 58 Geo. 3, c. 69 (entitled "An act for the regulation of parish vestries"), s. 2, enacts, "That in case the rector or vicar or perpetual curate shall not be present the persons so assembled in pursuance of such notice [s. 1] shall forthwith nominate and appoint by plurality of votes one of the inhabitants of such parish to be chairman and preside in such vestry."

in the vestry-room situate in the churchyard: the offence, consequently, if proved, is within the statute and within the jurisdiction of this court.

Two questions arise upon the case—first, whether the defendant used words which, according to legal interpretation, amount to brawling; secondly, whether he laid violent hands on Mr. Bilton. I have stated these questions in this manner, in order to dismiss from my mind much upon which the argument has proceeded. A great deal passed at the vestry meeting that is not within my consideration, except so far as these circumstances may illustrate the general nature of the transactions of that meeting, and elicit the truth with respect to the issues I have to try in the course of the present investigation.

[589] It appears there are two parties in this parish, one of which is anxious to overthrow the select vestry: this circumstance, for the purposes of this inquiry, is, in itself, perfectly indifferent; for whatever may be the merits or demerits in such a conflict is quite immaterial, as respects this question, in the decision of which the Court cannot turn aside to examine the character or progress of any proceedings of that nature. An application, it appears, had been made by this parish to parliament for the interposition of the legislature in regard to certain parochial affairs and local arrangements: and, upon the failure of this application, a meeting of the parishioners was held on the 27th of November, 1828, "for the purpose of receiving a report of the committee appointed to obtain an act of parliament for watching and lighting the parish and for other matters relating thereto." Upon that occasion the senior churchwarden presided. Scales, the defendant in this suit, proceeded at his own suggestion to read the report. Bilton, a non-parishioner, but who had been employed by the select vestry to forward the bill in parliament, and who had prepared the report, was present; his presence, however, was objected to by Scales, while, on the other hand, the churchwarden, who was in the chair, expressed great anxiety to retain him, and said he was entitled to have him remain in the room as his legal adviser. Much discussion ensued, but it is not stated that it gave rise to improper language, such as would justly demand the interference of a spiritual court.

[590] It was urged in argument that parishioners alone have a right to be present at a vestry meeting; and this is generally true; but whether the attendance of an individual, in the character which Mr. Bilton claimed, should be allowed as an exception, I am not here called upon to determine. Nor is it for my consideration who was right or who was wrong in these parish disputes; nor whether the observations made by Mr. Scales at this vestry meeting were regular, nor in what degree they might have been so; but the point on which I am to decide is simply whether his conduct was consistent with that decorum which ought at all times and on all occasions to prevail in a sacred place.

The expressions proved to have been used by Scales on this occasion are, "that they would not be dragooned by lawyers;" and that Coward, the churchwarden, was "unworthy to fill the chair." These are the two expressions upon which the first part of the charge is founded; but I cannot regard them as a violation of the law, nor as amounting in legal construction to brawling. The vestry meeting, I must remember, was held for general purposes of a civil kind; they might require, and the parishioners, assembled upon the occasion, are fairly entitled to a full latitude of discussion; and the Court does not feel itself called upon to scrutinize very minutely the expressions used either on one side or the other: for I agree with an observation of Lord Stowell's, that "the vestry, being a place for parish business, the court will not interpose further than may be necessary [591] for the preservation of due order and decorum." (a)

There were, however, other words uttered by Mr. Scales which came nearer within the language of the statute. I refer to what passed after the chairman had declared the meeting at an end, when Scales is proved to have said "that Willis (the vestry clerk) should not take the books away, unless he were the strongest man of the two." This expression is spoken to by the defendant's own witnesses; and if the words had formed part of the original and substantive charge, and been directly alleged and supported by evidence, I might have had some difficulty in not thinking them within the scope of the act of parliament, inasmuch as they would necessarily lead to heat and irritation; they were, undoubtedly, highly improper, and ought to have been suppressed. But, upon the whole, considering all the circumstances of the case, and that these words only came out incidentally in the evidence, I am of opinion that the charge of brawling is not proved.

(a) Hutchins v. Denziloe, 1 Hagg. Con. 185.

The most material charge, however, remains: the assault upon Mr. Bilton. The statute prohibits smiting or laying violent hands on any one; and, upon this part of the case, the evidence is conflicting; and should it leave any reasonable doubt in the mind of the Court, the defendant, the suit being criminal, is entitled to the benefit of that doubt; but, on the other hand, if the proofs should be sufficient to satisfy the mind of the Court, judicially, I must proceed, however painful it may [592] be, to carry into execution the enactments of the statute.

The witnesses concur in the fact that Scales touched Bilton with his hand; but whether he did so mildly and peaceably, or with a view of inflicting any degree of bodily violence, is a point on which the witnesses differ, and upon which the court must form its own opinion from the facts and probabilities of the case. Now, under what circumstances did the defendant approach Bilton? The vestry meeting was declared by the chairman to be dissolved, and the vestry clerk directed by him to take away the books. Whether this was in strict conformity with law or not it is not my province now to consider. A few words respecting the removal of the books passed (and in a low tone of voice, it would seem) between the vestry clerk and Bilton; and while they were speaking together, Scales, who had been sitting at another part of the room, came to the spot where they were; and for what purpose did he come?—to possess himself of the vestry books.

It is true the object of the meeting had not been accomplished: the report had not been received; but it had not been rejected. Scales was disappointed and dissatisfied at the dissolution of the meeting. With what disposition, then, did the defendant proceed from his own seat towards the vestry clerk and towards Bilton?—under the influence of disappointment, and with a determination to possess himself of the parish books, "if he were the stronger man of the two." This fact is proved by three of his own witnesses. By his own avowal and declaration, therefore, he was prepared to make a [593] trial of his strength, not regardful of the sacredness of the place, not duly impressed with the necessity of controuling his own passions, but ready to resort to violence if he could not otherwise accomplish his ends. I am then of opinion that Scales was, at this time, in a state of irritation, and that he did not move to the end of the room in a composed manner. And it is difficult to believe that in what immediately followed he had divested himself of this irritation and abandoned all thoughts of trying which was the stronger man of the two.

The vestry clerk was, at this period, hesitating whether he should retire with the books; he had referred to Bilton, and Bilton, stooping down, advised him to follow the directions of the churchwarden who had presided at the meeting. This advice was in total opposition to Scales' own views; and it was advice at that time, certainly, not very likely to conciliate him. Considering then, again, these circumstances, and what had previously taken place between these two parties, Bilton and Scales, the Court has little difficulty in believing that the latter did not conduct himself with all that mildness, forbearance, and calmness described by his own witnesses. The course of the transaction makes it improbable that he should so conduct himself. It is proved that Scales "is a man of warm temper, and rather violent at times;" and he was exasperated on this occasion. But there is evidence in support of this part of the charge, and evidence against it. Three witnesses depose to the violence of the defendant [594] towards Bilton; and the Court cannot divest them of all credit.

In parish squabbles, where there are opposite parties, from the natural frailty of the human mind both sides will be prejudiced: it would be nearly impossible to find any witnesses, in cases of this kind, who could depose without a bias to one side or the other; but neither set is, on that account, to be discredited: this circumstance has, however, rendered the examination of the transaction difficult, and made it imperative upon the Court to look into the evidence with great care and vigilance. I do not, however, perceive any contradiction in the testimony of the witnesses to the articles to induce me to doubt its general veracity: some trifling differences there may be in describing the mode in which the assault commenced; but these discrepancies are such as are probable; they are not in themselves material; and substantially the evidence proves the whole of this part of the case, as laid against the defendant.

The articles were also in some measure corroborated by the evidence for the defence; for Scales' own witnesses differ more as to the manner, degree, and extent of the occurrences than contradict altogether the facts that are alleged. All were agreed that Scales put his hand upon Bilton; and that a scuffle ensued; and all must therefore admit that by such a scuffle the sanctity of the place was violated.

It was attempted in argument to be shewn "that Bilton was the first aggressor, and that he had the best of it;" but the evidence [595] for the defence even proves that, after the scuffle was over, Bilton said, appealing to those around him, "You see how I have been used;" an expression that it is scarcely probable he would have made if he had been the aggressor, and had not been worsted in the conflict.

The verdict in the Common Pleas has been adverted to, but I shall not lay any great stress upon it. Looking, however, to all the preliminary circumstances, recollecting that the intentions and wishes of Scales were about to be defeated, that he was ready to resort to any measures to prevent the dissolution of the vestry meeting, that he was in a state of great irritation, I can come to no other conclusion than that the witnesses in support of the articles are entitled to credit, and that the statute has been violated by the commission of the alleged assault.

Such being the conscientious opinion of the Court, what are the consequences of a conviction in my mind that the proofs established a violation of the statute? Here the Court has no discretion, the words of the statute are imperative—"If any person or persons shall smite or lay violent hands upon any other either in any church or churchyard, then, ipso facto, every person so offending shall be deemed excommunicate" (5 & 6 Edw. 6, c. 4, s. 2). This is the penalty for the offence of smiting in a sacred place; and the Court has no power to alter or vary it.

The law remained in this state till the year 1813, when an act was passed which in some [596] degree effected an alteration by changing the punishment annexed to the penalty of excommunication. The Court, however, is not relieved from pronouncing a sentence of excommunication; but the consequences of that sentence are very different from what they were before the passing of the 53 Geo. 3, c. 127. Since the passing of that statute the ancient punishment of excommunication is taken away; the person excommunicated incurs no civil penalties except such imprisonment as the Court in the exercise of its discretion may think proper to direct, not exceeding six months.

In apportioning the imprisonment in the present case the Court finds many circumstances of a mitigatory character. There was undoubtedly much irritation; but it was at a vestry meeting held for civil purposes: and the Court could not fail to consider that brawling at a vestry meeting was essentially different in kind and degree from the offence when committed in church during the time of divine service.

In the discussion of parish matters much irritation may perhaps almost unavoidably arise; and it is upon these considerations that I am anxious not to extend the punishment beyond what is necessary to shew that the law cannot be violated with impunity, and that the sacredness of a church or churchyard must be preserved.

It is the first time that this Court has been called upon to award punishment under the statute in question; and it is desirous to exercise the powers entrusted to it with discretion and [597] lenity, earnestly hoping that the sentence the Court is about to pronounce may operate as a warning and prevent all persons from repeating an offence which could not be fully justified, even under any circumstances of previous irritation.

The Court is of opinion that justice will be satisfied in the present case by apportioning a very short term of imprisonment; and it, therefore, pronounces the defendant excommunicate, and that he be imprisoned for seven days and pay the costs of this suit.

The King's advocate suggested that under the 53 Geo. 3, c. 127,(a) it was necessary that the Court should certify the sentence to the Court of Chancery.

Per Curiam. It is not necessary for me to certify till called upon to proceed to the execution of the sentence: if called upon, I am aware that I am bound to proceed:

(a) The third section enacts, "That no person who shall be so pronounced excommunicate shall incur any civil penalty or incapacity whatever, in consequence of such excommunication, save such imprisonment, not exceeding six months, as the court pronouncing such person excommunicate shall direct, and in such case the said excommunication and the term of such imprisonment shall be signified or certified to His Majesty in Chancery, in the same manner as excommunications have been heretofore signified," &c. &c.

but the promoter of the office will consider whether it is absolutely necessary to carry the sentence into full effect; [598] he may perhaps be satisfied with the sentence as it stands at present.

The King's advocate on the part of the promoter then stated that he did not wish that a significavit should issue; but would rest contented with the sentence of the Court, without proceeding to enforce its further execution.

Excommunication and costs.

WRIGHT v. ELLWOOD, CALLING HERSELF WRIGHT. Consistory Court of London, Trinity Term, 1st Session, 1829.—A citation issuing as "in a suit of nullity of marriage by reason of a former marriage," will not found a sentence of separation "by reason of an undue publication of banns," the woman being therein described as spinster, the first husband having died subsequent to the publication of banns but prior to the marriage.

This was a suit of nullity of marriage, by reason of a former marriage promoted by James Wright against Amelia Ellwood, in the citation described as "late wife and now widow of Harlow Ellwood, heretofore calling herself Emma Ellwood, spinster, and subsequently Emma, otherwise Emily Wright, wife of James Wright." The libel was admitted without opposition; it pleaded, inter alia, that in 1825 Amelia Ellwood assumed the Christian name of Emma, and called herself a spinster; that James Wright, believing that she was a spinster, paid his addresses to her and caused banns of marriage to be published by the name of Emma Ellwood, spinster; that banns were accordingly published on the 28th of May, the 4th and 11th of June, 1826; that Harlow Ellwood, her hus-[599]-band, died on the 27th of June, 1826, and that her marriage with Wright took place on the 6th of July following. It further pleaded the 4 Geo. 4, c. 76, s. 22, and that at the publication of the banns Harlow Ellwood was alive; that Wright and the party cited cohabited till September, 1828, when the complainant discovered he had been imposed upon. The libel concluded with a prayer that the marriage de facto might be pronounced null and void. The prayer was not made on any stated ground. Upon the evidence taken upon this libel the cause now came on for hearing.

The King's advocate and Phillimore for Mr. Wright.

Addams contrà.

Judgment—Dr. Lushington. This case offers many difficulties and objections, but it appears to me that upon the face of the proceedings there is one fatal objection to the sentence prayed. The citation describes the cause as a suit of nullity of marriage by reason of a former marriage; but the sentence which the Court is asked to pronounce is a sentence of nullity by reason of an undue publication of banns. There is then a discordance between the citation and sentence prayed. This variance is fatal. The proceedings commenced in the same form of citation as if the husband of the first marriage had been alive when this marriage was solemnized. But what was the fact? It appeared that though the party pro-[600]-ceeded against was a married woman at the time the banns were published, she was a widow, and therefore might legally contract marriage, at the period when this marriage was actually celebrated. It is impossible then, whatever might be the inclination of the Court, that it could pronounce this marriage void by reason of the former marriage. If this marriage upon the evidence before me was illegal, it must be pronounced so on the ground that the party proceeded against was improperly described in the banns; but with the irregularity to which I have been adverting, apparent on the face of the proceedings, I do not think myself justified in pronouncing this marriage void. It is not, therefore, necessary for me to offer any opinion upon many other objections, nor state the difficulties that I entertain in respect to many parts of this case.

In suits of nullity the Court is bound to act with peculiar caution lest the legitimacy of children may improperly be brought into question. Here there are no children, and consequently the rights of issue cannot in this instance be affected: but suppose there had been children, they would have had an interest in upholding this marriage, and might have been prevented by the character of the proceedings. They might have declined to interfere by the cause appearing to be a cause of nullity by reason of a former marriage, and not by reason of undue publication of banns. But the Court must also bear in mind that there may be other parties who may be interested in a suit of this description. I am then of opinion that, if I were to pronounce this marriage void, I should [601] introduce a laxity of practice that would be extremely detrimental. I, therefore, must decline to sign the sentence that is porrected; and I dismiss the party cited from all further observance of justice in this cause.

MACLEAN v. MACLEAN. Consistory Court of London, Hilary Term, 1st Session, 1829. —The Court will not admit an exceptive plea that an indictment of witnesses, for perjury in their depositions in the cause pending, has been preferred and a true bill found, nor delay the hearing till the indictment is tried.

On admission of an exceptive allegation.

This was a cause of restitution of conjugal rights brought by the wife against the husband, in which a responsive allegation charging the wife with adultery had been admitted without opposition. Nine witnesses were examined in support of this plea; and upon the publication of their evidence an allegation of seven articles, exceptive to the testimony of Catherine Hughes and another witness, was offered upon the part of the wife.

This exceptive allegation, after pleading in contradiction to the deposition of Catherine Hughes upon the responsive allegation, set forth in the fifth article: "That at the sessions for the city of London held at the Old Bailey on the 4th of December, 1828, Mrs. Maclean preferred a bill of indictment against Catherine Hughes, charging her with having committed wilful and corrupt perjury in her deposition given in this cause, and that a true [602] bill was thereupon found against her by the grand jury, which, by writ of certiorari, had been removed into the Court of King's Bench."

Phillimore and Dodson for the husband. This allegation is wholly inadmissible. If the testimony of the witnesses excepted to is capable of being repelled it must be by the examination of Mr. Oliveira, particeps criminis. The contradictions, in general, if proved as laid, would be unimportant; they would not establish that the witnesses had sworn wilfully and corruptly. The fifth article is extremely objectionable. The attempt to introduce into these courts "the finding of a true bill" is quite novel and cannot be sustained. The introduction even of a verdict was long resisted. That a true bill was found only shews that the case was entitled to a further investigation; and the witnesses examined before the grand jury must have been the party herself and Oliveira. The admission of this plea will add to the expences which the husband must sustain in this suit.

The King's advocate and Nicholl contrà. The husband's allegation was not specific in its averments: and if, upon a plea of circumstances laid generally, the witnesses depose to particular facts, the other side is entitled to plead in contradiction of those particular facts as soon as the evidence is disclosed; and in respect to them the party is much in the same state after publication as before. There is no [603] reason why Mr. Oliveira should not be examined after the publication of the evidence. To reject him as a witness would be to assume the guilt of Mrs. Maclean, which is the issue to be tried. The conviction on an indictment for perjury renders a witness incompetent in every court of justice; it is not like a verdict against the particeps criminis, res inter alios acta. That an indictment has been preferred and a true bill found (though we admit that being on ex parte evidence they are no proof of guilt) are properly brought to the notice of this Court: for if, upon this allegation, the hearing of the cause be not postponed till the indictment is tried, this Court may pronounce a sentence on evidence which, it may afterwards be proved, was not entitled to credit.

Judgment—Dr. Lushington. In order to form a correct opinion of the admissibility of this exceptive allegation it is necessary to consider the nature of the cause and the steps that have been taken in it.

The commencement of these proceedings was a citation served at the instance of Mrs. Maclean upon her husband in a suit for restitution of conjugal rights. This application was met by the husband, who charged his wife with adultery, and, in an allegation responsive to her libel, detailed the grounds of his accusation. Upon the admission of that allegation Mrs. Maclean knew the nature of the charges against which it was necessary to defend herself; she knew that she was charged with receiving in her husband's absence clandestine visits from [604] Dominic Oliveira, and that he remained with her alone from an hour to an hour and a half at each visit. Mrs. Maclean, however, left her case to the defects, if any, of her husband's plea, offering no exculpatory allegation, and making no attempt whatever to contradict the misconduct imputed to her till after the publication of the evidence. If it had been Mrs. Maclean's intention to have examined Mr. Oliveira (the alleged paramour, and upon whose testimony almost exclusively this exceptive plea, if allowed to go to proof, is avowedly to be sustained), she should have done that upon an allegation specifically denying the husband's charges.

It is not necessary to advert to the general principles which guide the Ecclesiastical Courts in pleas of this sort; but it is well established that, to entitle them to admission, "falsitas cum corruptione" must be alleged; and it must also be set forth to the satisfaction of the Court that the matters upon which the witnesses are to be contradicted are material to the general issue. Although sometimes it may be essential to justice to try collateral issues in a cause, yet it is the duty of a Court to avoid them unless the necessity is extremely clear. Is it, then, absolutely necessary for the purposes of justice that this plea should be admitted? The Court will not disregard the observation that the whole expence of these proceedings falls upon the husband; but that remark must give way to higher considerations; it is a burden incidental to the marriage state.

[605] It is alleged that Catherine Hughes has deposed falsely in respect to a declaration: but the declaration is immaterial to the issue; and if the plea on this point should be fully established it would not prove the witness guilty of wilful and corrupt perjury. It resolves itself into mistake and error—not sufficiently stringent to be of importance. I admit that the principle as to contradictory evidence of particular facts upon a general plea is truly stated; but, at the same time, if pleas were to be extended so as to include all particular facts, it would lead to an inconvenient and oppressive length: it is sufficient that they should furnish enough to open the means of defence. Here no plea in exculpation was given by the wife prior to publication; yet she now alleges that she has not committed adultery. This is a direct averment which should have been brought forward in an earlier stage of these proceedings, and is not now entitled to be received.

The chief matter for consideration is the fifth article: it is there pleaded that a true bill has been found against Catherine Hughes for perjury in this cause. This averment, according to my present recollection, is novel: I am not aware of any precedent upon the point. If I were to admit it, to what sort of weight would the proof of it be entitled? It has been truly observed that the bill was found on ex-parte evidence without any opportunity of contradiction; and that the mere finding of such a bill was not sufficient to extinguish the credit of a witness. But it was suggested that the hearing of this cause should be deferred till after the indictment [606] had been tried. If the Court were to yield in this instance, the same means of delay might be resorted to in every cause. It would be desirable, for the purposes of considering this matter, to ascertain on whose testimony the bill was found. If on the evidence of Mrs. Maclean herself, it would enable her to be a witness in her own cause. In Thurtell v. Beaumont (1 Bing. 339) a verdict had been given for the plaintiff to the amount of certain goods sworn by his brother to have been on the premises at the time they were burnt down. A new trial was afterwards moved for, supported by an affidavit from the defendant that true bills had been found against the plaintiff's brother and others for a conspiracy to defraud the fire office in this very matter, when Parke, J., said—"I find many applications for new trials on the ground of bills found by the grand jury, but none in which the application has succeeded. In one case, where the ground of the motion was that a bill for perjury had been found against the principal witnesses, Lord Mansfield said that the granting the rule for such a reason would have a most dangerous tendency, as it would open a door for constant scenes of perjury, and tempt a person to delay execution by indicting his adversary's witnesses. In Warwick v. Bruce (4 M. & S. 140) Lord Ellenborough discharged with costs a rule to stay execution till after the trial of an indictment against the plaintiff's witnesses for perjury; and in Bartlett v. Pickersgill (4 East, 577, n.), in Lord [607] Henley's time, a plaintiff having petitioned for leave to file a supplemental bill, because the defendant had, on the evidence of the plaintiff, been indicted and convicted for perjury on his answer to the original bill, Lord Henley dismissed the petition." Another case was referred to by Dallas, C. J., in support of the same principle, and the application was refused.

How, then, do these cases apply to the present? That if the finding a true bill, or the conviction of a witness, be no ground at common law for a new trial, nor in equity for a supplemental bill, they cannot avail to the postponement of the hearing of a cause depending in these Courts. I do not say that a plea alleging the conviction of a witness of perjury would in no case be admissible; but the Court would require that the conviction should not have proceeded on the evidence of the party in the suit, or of the alleged particeps criminis. I reject the allegation.

Allegation rejected.

[608] MORSE v. MORSE. Consistory Court of London, Michaelmas Term, 1st Session, 1828.—A party cannot plead the contents of an instrument unless it is destroyed or in the possession of the adverse party.—The Court will not depart from its regular practice by directing a list of witnesses to be delivered, some time anterior to their production, to the other party, residing voluntarily in France.

On admission of the libel.

This was a suit of separation, by reason of the cruelty and adultery of the husband. The thirty-first article of the libel pleaded, "that in 1822, 1823, and 1824, and more particularly on the days when any thing occurred to prevent his (the defendant) being much alone with A. W., he continually passed a considerable portion of his time in writing and sending love letters and notes of a very amatory description to, and receiving similar letters from her, &c.; such love letters and notes being generally conveyed between the parties by a little girl." (a)[1] The letters were not annexed to the libel, nor was it pleaded that they were not in the possession or control of the wife. The admission of this article alone was opposed.

Per Curiam. The attention of the Court is directed to the thirty-first article only; and the objection is, that it pleads a correspondence between the defendant and the party with whom he is charged to have committed adultery. The general character of that correspondence is set forth, but none of the letters are exhibited. The libel does not allege the letters to be in the husband's [609] possession, nor that any one has seen them and is acquainted with their contents, though somebody, it may be presumed, would be examined to depose in support of the article.

It is, I apprehend, a settled rule that a party cannot plead the contents of an instrument, unless it is destroyed, or in the possession of the adverse party. If the article had pleaded that the letters were in the husband's possession, or that any one had seen them, and could identify the handwriting, I should have allowed the description of the letters to stand, and admitted the article. But, in the absence of all such averments, I must direct the article to be reformed, by striking out the epithets attached to the letters: and I am the more inclined to pursue this course because, if it can be shewn by the wife that her husband kept up a constant correspondence with this woman, she will have all the effect from that proof, that the article in its present shape could supply.

Libel reformed.

4th Session.—The libel being admitted, a motion, founded on an affidavit that the husband was in France, was this day made to the Court, that it would direct a list of the witnesses intended to be examined on the libel to be given to his proctor, in order to enable him to communicate with his client upon the interrogatories. An affidavit on the part of the wife (who opposed the motion) was also before the Court.

[610] Per Curiam. This is an application to order the proctor for the wife—the party proceeding—to furnish to the adverse proctor a list of witnesses some time anterior to their production. The general practice is quite otherwise.(a)[2] It is incumbent, therefore, upon the husband to shew some good ground for so unusual an application; but what does the affidavit state? "That the deponent received a communication this day, and also a letter last week, from Mr. Morse; and to the best of the deponent's knowledge, information and belief, he (Morse) is at the present time residing in France." The charges are said to be serious, and to run through several years; and that it is, on that account, the more requisite to have a full opportunity of preparing the defence. But all the difficulty arises from the absence of the husband himself: the whole matter rests upon that fact: and it is said that he did not quit this country till long after the institution of the present suit. The question, then, is whether a mere voluntary absence is a sufficient justification for the Court to depart from its ancient practice, and at the same time inflict a hardship upon the wife—the complainant—in the postponement of her cause.

(a)[1] The words in italics were directed to be struck out.

(a)[2] Oughton's Ordo Judiciorum, tit. 80. See also Ingram v. Wyatt, vol. i. 94, 97.

In matrimonial suits the power of the Court is in personam. The Court cannot enforce a decree upon a party who is out of the kingdom. Here the absence is voluntary; no cause is assigned for it; and nothing further is stated to [611] induce me to violate an established rule of practice. If the absence were occasioned by particular circumstances—from illness or urgent business—the Court might then be induced to afford every facility for the proctor to communicate with his party: but if I were to accede to this application, it would occasion great inconvenience and delay to the wife, not only in this, but in every succeeding stage of her cause. The more serious the charges, the more proper it is that the husband should be ready and prompt in his defence. Without looking into the counter-affidavit, I am of opinion that there is no sufficient ground before me to sustain this application.

Motion rejected.

[613] THE PAROCHIAL SCHOOLMASTERS OF SCOTLAND v. FRASER AND OTHERS. High Court of Delegates, June 18th, 1829.—The appellants (interveners in the court below) being described in the commission of Delegates as "the Parochial Schoolmasters of Scotland," quære whether, notwithstanding the absolute appearance of the respondents, the inhibition ought not to be relaxed, on the ground that the appellants, not being a body corporate, had no persona standi in their collective capacity. Administration pendente lite and limited to certain property granted, by consent, to one of the parties.

This was an appeal from the Prerogative Court of Canterbury in the case of Colvin v. Fraser (ante, 266).

To a decree (issued at the instance of Mr. Fraser) "against all persons in general having or pretending to have any right, title, or interest under or by virtue of the alleged will and codicil of John Farquhar, Esq., the party deceased, to appear and see proceedings if they should consider it for their interest so to do," an appearance had been given in the court below, on the first session of Hilary Term, 1828, on behalf of "the Parochial Schoolmasters throughout Scotland:" and a proctor alleged them to be the residuary legatees named in the will of the deceased, and prayed an answer to their interest.(b) But the assignation, to answer to such interest, was never complied with.

On the 1st of February, 1828, a proxy under the hands and seals of ten parochial schoolmasters of the county of Haddington; and, on the 23rd of April, similar proxies from sixty-four of the parochial schoolmasters of eleven other Scotch counties were filed in the Prerogative re-[614]-gistry; and after the sentence in that Court a petition for a commission of appeal, presented to the Lord Chancellor on behalf of "the Parochial Schoolmasters of Scotland," was granted; and an inhibition having been served, a citation dated on the 5th of May, 1829, issued, calling on Mr. Fraser and the other next of kin "to answer to the said Parochial Schoolmasters in their cause of appeal; and further to do and receive as unto law and justice should appertain; under pain of the law and contempt thereof, at the promotion of the said Parochial Schoolmasters."

On the first session of Easter Term, the 8th of May, 1829, appearances were given for the parties cited; a proxy on the part of John Farquhar Fraser, Esq., was exhibited, and the proctor for "the Parochial Schoolmasters" was, at the prayer of the adverse party, assigned to libel and bring in his appeal next court and to exhibit a proxy.

On the second session the proctor for Mr. Fraser alleged "that the Parochial Schoolmasters of Scotland were not a body corporate, and he moved the Con-Delegates to direct the appellants to give security for the costs of the appeal, and also to decree letters of administration under certain limitations, and pending the appeal, to be granted to Mr. Fraser or Edward Vaughan Williams, Esq., his nominee, on giving justifying security."

These applications were grounded on two affidavits made by Mr. Fraser: the first concluded by stating in substance "that in consequence of the decrees (issued at his instance) appearances were given in the said cause on behalf of the Parochial Schoolmasters of Scot-[615]-land, as interveners, respectively claiming interests under the alleged will (ante, 292), that on the 25th of February last the judge of the Prerogative Court pronounced against the alleged will and codicil, and decreed the letters of administration to be re-delivered out to this deponent; that the present appeal was interposed, not by the executor, the party principal in the aforesaid cause, but on behalf of the Parochial Schoolmasters of Scotland, whose proctor had appeared in the aforesaid cause as an intervener on their behalf; that such parochial schoolmasters were not, as he had been informed and believed, a body corporate, and that he verily believed that every individual member of the said society resided in North Britain, and out of the jurisdiction of this court."

(b) The will is printed, see ante, p. 267, et seq. notis

The second affidavit, in order to move for an administration pending the appeal and limited to the receipt of certain rents of leasehold premises, interest on mortgages, and the principal of a mortgage (the mortgagee having become a bankrupt), set forth circumstances shewing that the estate was incurring great risk from the want of a personal representative.

On these applications being made to the Court of Con-Delegates, it was suggested that the petition to the Lord Chancellor was on behalf of the "Parochial Schoolmasters of Scotland," and not in the names of certain individuals of that body; that the commission, inhibition, and citation all followed the petition, but that it now appeared that the "Parochial Schoolmas-[616]-ters" were not a body corporate,(a) and under these circumstances a very considerable doubt arose whether (even admitting, that as individuals, they had a sufficient interest) they had collectively a persona standi for prosecuting the appeal, and whether the inhibition ought not forthwith to be relaxed.

The counsel for the schoolmasters contended that even if they had not a right to appeal in their collective capacity, the persons who executed the proxies were entitled to proceed as individuals; that they had originally appeared in conformity to a decree to see proceedings issued at the instance of the next of kin, that the objection was now taken too late, as their interest had been admitted in the court below, both by the judge and by the adverse party in consenting to their intervention and to their being heard by counsel; and, further, that if the objection could be taken at all in this court, it ought to have formed the ground for an appearance under protest to the inhibition.

The counsel for the next of kin contended that the formal instruments, viz. the petition, commission, inhibition, and citation, shewed that the appeal was prosecuted on behalf of the body and not of individuals of the body, and that this rendering all the proceedings vicious, the present objection was fatal. They denied that the interest of the schoolmasters had been admitted in the court below; for that, on the contrary, all questions respecting their right [617] had been specially reserved by the court (see ante, 292, notis); and beyond that, as it now appeared on the face of the proceedings, that they were not a body corporate, the court was bound ex officio to notice the fact, even if the parties were barred from raising the objection, owing either to their having appeared absolutely and not under protest, or to any other cause.

The Con-Delegates referred the consideration of this question and of the two affidavits to the whole commission; but on the 3rd of June, the motion for the limited administration being renewed, they decreed it (the other parties not opposing the same) to Mr. Fraser, limited as specified in the affidavit, and until the hearing of the matters referred to the whole commission, or until some further order.

The Judges Delegate were: Mr. J. Bayley, Mr. J. Park, Mr. Baron Garrow, Drs. Arnold, Gostling, Blake, Haggard, Chapman.

The cause was called on for hearing before the whole commission on the 18th of June, when the counsel for the appellants declared that their parties proceeded no further in the appeal.

The limited administration, granted on the third of June, was then brought in; and the court decreed the inhibition to be relaxed.

Mr. Brougham and Dr. Addams, counsel for the appellants.

Dr. Phillimore, Dr. Lushington, and Mr. E. V. Williams, counsel for the respondents.

(a) Quære whether, if a body corporate, the appearance as given was good. It ought to have been by A. B. Syndic of the Parochial Schoolmasters of Scotland. Oughton, tit. 13 (n.).

[618] HAMERTON v. HAMERTON. High Court of Delegates, July 11th, 1829.—In a suit for separation by reason of the wife's adultery, after the arguments of counsel are closed and after the court has delivered its opinion that, though culpable and suspicious conduct had been, adultery had not been, proved, it is a fit exercise of discretion to rescind the conclusion, for the purpose of admitting an allegation pleading further matter to establish the wife's guilt.

[See further, 3 Hagg. 1.]

This was an appeal prosecuted on the part of the wife, from the Arches Court of Canterbury (ante, pp. 8 and 24); and the præsertim of the appeal was, "that the Judge had, on the third session of Hilary Term, 1829, rescinded the conclusion of the cause, and given leave to the proctor of William Medows Hamerton to bring in a certain allegation theretofore by him tendered."

The allegation was immediately, upon the same session, brought into the registry.

After the usual proceedings in the Court of Delegates the cause stood assigned for informations and sentence before the whole commission; (b)[1] and now came on for argument.

The King's advocate, Mr. W. E. Taunton, and Dr. Addams for the appellant. There is no principle of justice and of common sense by which judges are more invariably governed than an extreme jealousy of admitting cases to be amended by supplemental evidence. In every case, whether criminal or civil, whether to be decided by a judge in a court of equity, or by a jury, if a cause is suffered to be opened for the purpose of being instructed with fresh proofs, it leads necessarily to consequences of a most dangerous and of obvious tendency. Suppose, for instance, an action for criminal conversation, would a judge, while [619] charging the jury, stop the cause and enable the party to call fresh evidence?

Burrough, J. No; but the plaintiff would be nonsuited; and could then bring a fresh action.

Argument resumed. Some dates and facts are important. The suit was instituted in April, 1827; and the libel admitted on the second of August. Upon the appeal to the Arches Court, additional articles to the libel were, on the first of March, 1828, admitted; (a) and, on the third of May, further additional articles were also, upon Major Hamerton's petition, admitted.(b)[2] Twenty-nine witnesses were examined upon the libel and additional articles; and, after argument, the Court was of opinion that the evidence did not sustain the imputation charged against Mrs. Hamerton; but that it did establish against her a case of great impropriety and [620] culpability; and this we do not deny. The Court, then, had expressed its opinion; and nothing was wanted but a ratification of that opinion by a formal sentence of the dismissal of the wife. The proceedings, then, shew that Major Hamerton has been allowed ample opportunity of proving his case: and there is no appeal, on his behalf, as to whether the evidence was, or was not, sufficient to support the charge; but the only question

---

(b)[1] The judges under this commission were: Mr. Justice Burrough, Mr. Baron Hullock, Drs. Arnold, Chapman, and Curteis.

(a) These additional articles merely contained a more full and formal pleading of the marriage of the parties.

(b)[2] The further additional articles plead as follows:—1st. "That shortly after Isabella Frances Hamerton quitted the house of William Medows Hamerton (as pleaded in the 19th article of the libel) she went to Tours in the south of France, where she continued to reside with her mother until in or about the latter end of January, or beginning of February, 1828, when she removed to Paris, where she is now residing. That John Bushe, whose name is frequently mentioned in the libel, is also residing at Paris; that since the arrival of Mrs. Hamerton in that city Bushe and Mrs. Hamerton have carried on, and still continue to carry on, their adulterous intercourse; that they have during such time frequently called and still continue to call upon each other at their respective lodgings, and have remained, and frequently do remain, alone together therein for considerable spaces of time, during which times they have frequently had and continue to have the carnal use and knowledge of each other's bodies, whereby she, the said I. F. Hamerton, has committed, and still continues to commit, adultery."

respects the discretion exercised by the Court in abstaining from a dismissal of the wife, and in rescinding the conclusion of the cause.

The decree or order, from which we appeal, is a departure from all principle; it is unsupported by precedent, and it operates with extreme hardship and injustice towards the wife. The suit had been going on for two years, abundant time had been allowed for establishing the husband's case by a proof of his libel; he was not taken by surprize, and his prayer for the publication of the evidence shewed that he was satisfied and content to rest his case upon the result of the depositions, as they then stood, without examining a second witness to sustain his further additional articles, nor applying for further time for that purpose. Upon the evidence, the Dean of the Arches inclined to the opinion that the case was not proved, and at his suggestion the cause stood over, either for new proof upon the old plea, or for a new plea.

The allegation that has in consequence of this decree been given in was not seen by the Court of Arches, and we have declined to re-[621]-ceive it; we have not, therefore, legally seen it; and we much doubt whether it ought properly to have been printed and annexed to the papers before the court. If we had seen the allegation it might have subjected us to this remark, that we opposed the order of the court from a conviction that we could not resist the fresh charges; but we appeal on the ground of the order being novel, irregular, and leading to fraud, stratagem, and subornation of perjury. In ordinary course, Mrs. Hamerton ought to have been dismissed; and there is no instance of further time being allowed for the production of additional evidence, unless there is proof of a corpus delicti. Admitting, therefore, that the conclusion of a cause may be rescinded in certain cases, it must be done in the exercise of a good and sound discretion, guided by principle and by precedent. But no case, we conceive, can be cited that resembles the present.

The ecclesiastical law, it is well known, demands for full proof the testimony of two witnesses; but suppose a case of this nature, in which, on the evidence of one witness, the Court is morally (for judicially it cannot be) satisfied of the guilt of the party charged: in such a case, we apprehend, the conclusion may properly be rescinded for further proof. Such was Searle v. Price (2 Hagg. Con. 191); in its character and circumstances differing widely from the present. For that was a suit of nullity of marriage where the interests of third parties are affected; not so in suits of adultery; and the defect was in the proof of identity. In Middleton v. Middleton (Supplement, infra, p. 134) the Court had not arrived at a knowledge of the [622] evidence; the cause was not absolutely concluded: there the wife was not proved innocent, here her guilt is disproved, and notice is now given to the husband what defect is to be removed, and what further evidence is required. In Donellan v. Donellan (Supplement, infra, p. 144) a criminal connexion between a man and a woman was proved; the circumstances established would have satisfied a court of common law, and were sufficient to impress any mind with a moral conviction of the guilt of the wife; but there was no proof of her identity, and the only question was whether the woman in the lodgings was the party in the cause.

Hullock, B. There was only evidence of a woman in bed: the corpus delicti could not be established without the identity. It might be another woman.

Argument resumed.

A corpus delicti was in that case sufficiently in evidence before the Court. And in all the suits of adultery in which the conclusion of the cause has been rescinded for the purposes of identity a proof of guilt has existed. Cargill v. Spence (ibid. p. 146), and Henley and Dudderidge v. Morrison (ibid. p. 147), only shew that the conclusion of the cause may be rescinded in order to prove identity. Are there any special reasons for giving the permission of pleading de novo in this case? Is there any precedent to warrant it? The cause was not conducted wholly in a provincial court. To affirm the decree would be to go further than is recognized by practice; [623] and if the discretion is pronounced to have been soundly exercised in this case, the Court will warrant a similar discretion in every diocesan jurisdiction. The great danger of affirming such a decree is the inducement it furnishes to parties to suborn witnesses, in order to reconcile contradictions in the evidence that before existed; because the Judge points out the particular parts where the cause is defective in proof. A reversal of this decree will be no hardship nor injustice to the husband.

Mr. Campbell, Dr. Lushington, and Dr. Dodson for the respondent. It is not disputed that the ecclesiastical court can rescind the conclusion of a cause: and if it were, the cases that have been cited would remove all doubt upon that point, and shew it to be an acknowledged and established practice. The cases lead, necessarily, to an affirmance of the decree of the Court of Arches, and to a dismissal of the appeal. There is little or no analogy between the practice of the common and civil law courts. In the ecclesiastical courts, on an appeal, a fresh allegation may be introduced, and fresh proofs in support of it. A recent instance shews that, even in Westminster Hall, a rescinding of the conclusion of a cause is not unknown. Upon a rule last term to shew cause why a mandamus should not issue to admit a parish clerk, Mr. W. E. Taunton shewed cause on affidavits (and the affidavits being filed, the cause is concluded against a party); when the counsel (Mr. Campbell) on the [624] other side suggested on motion that a difficulty might be cleared up by further affidavits; and the court granted the motion.

It has been argued in this case that the decree now under consideration was not the result of a sound discretion: the practice, however, has been perfectly recognized; and the authorities cited on the other side go further than what is necessary for the decision of the present case. The only distinction between this case and Searle v. Price is that the suit was there for nullity of marriage, a more severe and strict proceeding than the present, because in that the issue would be bastardized if the suit were sustained; whereas, in suits of adultery, if the separation is pronounced for, the status of the children remains the same. In Middleton v. Middleton (see Supplement, p. 134), at the time the rescinding was permitted, the stage of the cause was tantamount to the conclusion of the cause. "The parties had renounced all further allegations unless exceptive, which undoubtedly is the virtual conclusion of the principal cause, as far as the rights of parties extend." Indeed, every word in Middleton v. Middleton that fell both from Lord Stowell and Sir William Wynne is important in its bearing upon this case. There the new matter was to be "explanatory of much obscurity which appeared to hang over the cause on the face of the libel;" and the object of our allegation is to shew that a direct correspondence was carried on between Mrs. Hamerton and her alleged paramour.

After examining at length the cases commented upon by the counsel for the appellant, and citing the observation of Lord Stowell as [625] to the great and incurable grievance, in the ecclesiastical courts, that parties may appeal from every step, and that causes, by the occupation of the Court of Delegates, may be hung up long before an interlocutory decree can be pronounced, the counsel for the respondent continued: The argument, drawn from a fear of stratagem and subornation of perjury, would apply to every case, under all circumstances, in which the conclusion of the cause was rescinded: it would equally apply to the cases of Middleton, and of Donellan, as to this. But wherever the Court, in its sound and legal discretion, grants such a permission, it always watches, with the greatest vigilance, the evidence that may thus be introduced.

It was said that the inclination of the opinion of the learned Judge of the Court of Arches was in favor of Mrs. Hamerton; and that she was entitled to have been dismissed from the suit; but still it has been admitted to-day that her conduct was highly blameable; and, as it may be presumed that the court of appeal has read the evidence taken in the cause, we may confidently assert that the case, established against Mrs. Hamerton, is so pregnant with suspicion, that it is all but proved; and sufficiently so, at all events, to allow of the exercise of that discretion which, it is not denied, belongs to the ecclesiastical court. The inferences from the letters annexed to the libel are so strong that they cannot fail to have a considerable influence upon the mind of any one who reads them: the letters are such as would satisfy a jury of the truth of the charges laid in the libel. To avoid debateable ground, [626] we abstain from adverting to the allegation that now stands upon admission, and is printed in the process, since some objection has been made to its introduction into the cause; but confining ourselves to the affidavits, which clearly were before the court below, and which refer to the allegation, it cannot be doubted that the averments, if proved, coupled with the previous circumstances, are most stringent, and fully justify the decree of the Court of Arches.

The Court pronounced against the appeal, and in favor of the order or decree appealed from, and remitted the cause.

SKEFFINGTON v. WHITE. High Court of Delegates, July 16th, 1829.—An administration de bonis non, granted in 1827, of an intestate who died in 1790, limited to assign a leasehold property not severed in the deceased's lifetime, and only mortgaged during an original creditor administration (which was granted on the renunciation of the next of kin at the time of the death and which expired in 1806) revoked; the next of kin for the time being (in whom all the beneficial interest in the deceased's estate was vested) not having been cited when the limited grant was made, and there being a suggestion that such grant was surreptitiously obtained, and that there was a surplus belonging to the deceased's estate.

[Applied, In re Johnson, 1880, 7 L. R. Ir. 1.]

This was originally a cause or business of citing Henry John White "to appear and bring into and leave in the registry of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury the letters of administration of the goods, chattels, and credits of Thomas Hubbert, deceased, left unadministered by Alexander Hubbert, whilst living, a creditor of the deceased, and limited so far as concerned all the right, title, and interest of Thomas Hubbert in and to several pieces or parcels of ground, messuages, warehouses, buildings, hereditaments and premises with the appurtenances, situate in the parish of Saint Mary Magdalen, Bermondsey, Surrey, described and comprised in certain indentures of lease bearing date the 23rd of June, 1788, [627] and 7th of March, 1791, and the residue and remainder of the terms of years therein granted,(a) and all benefit and advantage to be had, received, and taken therefrom, but no further or otherwise, theretofore granted by the court to Henry John White, as a person for that purpose named by and on the part of William Davis, Benjamin Shaw, Sir Charles Flower, and John Green; and to shew cause why the same should not be revoked and declared null and void." (b)

[628] To this decree an appearance, under protest, was given for Mr. White; and on the by-day [629] after Trinity Term, 1828, the cause having been argued on the statements contained in the act on petition, and on the affidavits, the Court rejected the petition of Sir Lumley Skeffington, and condemned him in costs (1 Hagg. Ecc. 699).

From this sentence an appeal was prosecuted to the High Court of Delegates; and

---

(a) The lease of the 23rd of June, 1788, was for the term of seventy-nine years. The demises under the lease of the 7th of March, 1791, were for various terms; some had expired, and the longest term was for forty-eight years. These leases were stated on the part of Sir L. Skeffington to be of considerable value.

(b) Previous to the grant of limited administration two affidavits, the substance of which was as follows, were filed:—

John Green of Blackheath, Esq., made oath, "that he is one of the parties on behalf of whom application has been made for administration of the effects of Thomas Hubbert, deceased, limited to all the deceased's estate and interest in certain hereditaments and premises (as comprised in the two above mentioned leases): that by indenture dated the 23rd of June, 1818, the freehold and inheritance of the said hereditaments and premises became vested in the deponent, together with W. Davis, A. Jordaine, B. Shaw, and Sir C. Flower, subject to the said two indentures of lease and three annuities of 115l., 125l., and 420l. thereon charged, and in manner therein mentioned; the two former annuities being payable to Leonora Logie, widow, and the latter to Arabella Spriggs, widow; that the said indenture of lease dated the 23rd of June, 1788, with other title deeds relating to the said hereditaments and premises, has been in the possession of the deponent and said other parties or their agents from 1807; and the said indenture of lease, dated the 7th of March, 1791, from 1824 to the present time; and he and they have been in the possession and in the receipt of the rents of the said premises, and have paid and discharged the taxes, rates, and other out-goings from 1818 to the present time; and the said several annuities have been from time to time paid by the deponent until their determination on the death of the said annuitants respectively; Mrs. Logie having died in 1821, and Mrs. Spriggs in 1824; that the said A. Jordaine is dead, and that B. Shaw is his surviving executor; that he (the deponent) verily believes that certain original indentures dated the 31st of December, 1790, the 27th of September, 1802, and 6th of September, 1805 (referred to in the proceedings with respect to the grant of

after the usual formal steps the cause came on for argument at Serjeant's Inn, before the whole commission, consisting of Mr. Justice Bayley, Mr. Baron Garrow, Dr. Daubeny, Dr. Blake, and Dr. Pickard.

The allegations in the act on petition and in the affidavits may be sufficiently collected from the judgment of the court below, and from the arguments of counsel in the Court of Appeal.

Dodson and Haggard for the respondents. The first point is, whether Sir Lumley Skeffington, the appellant, is entitled to call in the administration: he has no beneficial interest in the property in question; and all acts done under the administration granted to Alexander Hubbert, the general administrator, are valid. Upon the death of Thomas Hubbert, who died [630] insolvent, a deed of arrangement was entered into with the creditors of the estate, and they agreed to accept fifteen shillings in the pound payable within two years; and it is clear they would not have entered into this composition if there had been the least prospect of their obtaining a full discharge of their respective debts. In 1793, when the period for paying the last instalment of the composition expired, the premises, contained in the lease of 1791, had been assigned over as a security for an annuity of 420l. per annum, purchased for 4000l.; and the lease of 1788 had also been assigned for a loan of 1500l.; yet still the administrator had not, at that period, been enabled to pay out of Thomas Hubbert's estate even 11s. 3d. of the composition; for to make up that sum the payments had exceeded the effects by 2500l. A further arrangement was then made, and six years more were granted in order to pay off the remaining 3s. 9d.; Mr. Rowcroft and his partner (the administrator) agreeing to add 2000l. in aid of the insolvent estate, out of their own separate funds: and the creditors at that time covenanted to accept this 3s. 9d. or so much as the estate would yield in six years (together with the 2000l. to be advanced), in full satisfaction of their several debts. Soon after this fresh arrangement Alexander Hubbert, the administrator, went to reside at Ostend. In 1795 the lease of 1788 was assigned over in trust for his partner Rowcroft; and from that time to 1818 (when the two leases passed from Rowcroft into the hands of Sir Charles Flower, Mr. Davis, and others) Rowcroft was in the sole receipt of the rents and profits; he had paid all [631] rates and outgoings in respect to it, erected large premises, and much improved the property both in magnitude and value. On the death of the creditor administrator in 1806 no account was demanded by the next of kin; and till the year 1826 nothing the limited administration), are so lost or mislaid that they cannot now be found, and that there are not any more authentic copies in the possession of the deponent, or of the said other parties, or their agents, than those produced. That in respect to a certain original deed poll, dated the 31st of January, 1805, referred to, and to be produced, and appearing cancelled, the same is now in the same plight and condition as when it came into his possession with the other title deeds as aforesaid: and, lastly, that he has been legally advised that the said administration of the unadministered effects of Thomas Hubbert, deceased, should be granted to a nominee of the deponent, and the aforesaid other parties, by reason that such grant of administration to them or either of them might operate in law as a merger of the aforesaid leases, and be thereby rendered of no effect."

---

Joseph Jones, of Bermondsey Wall, made oath: "That in 1796 he entered into the employment of Thomas Rowcroft, then a London merchant, and he continued in such employment until 1818; and when he so entered into the said service he, Rowcroft, was in the possession and occupation of certain premises and warehouses situate in Cherry Garden, Bermondsey, and deponent was employed to superintend and take care of the same, and which hereditaments and premises are, as deponent verily believes, the same concerning which an application is now making to this court for administration of the unadministered effects of Thomas Hubbert, to be granted under certain limitations, as to the interest which he, the deceased, had in the same: that Rowcroft continued in possession of, and had the sole and exclusive management and control of, the said hereditaments and premises, and, as deponent believes, was in possession of certain leases therein granted, and also in the sole receipt of the rents and profits thereof from 1796 to 1818; and, during the whole of that period, paid all rates, taxes, assessments, and outgoings whatsoever chargeable thereupon, and until the said premises were in the latter year conveyed by Rowcroft to Davis, A. Jordaine, B. Shaw, Sir C. Flower, and J. Green."

was done by them or by their representative, the appellant, in respect to this property. The transactions, then, connected with this property, the lapse of time, and the laches of the appellant himself are sufficient to bar him upon the present question.

Without minutely tracing the legal title to this property through its various assignments, we contend that this limited administration was rightly granted to the nominee of Flower, Davis, and others. The want of a previous citation or decree is a mere technical objection; there was, under the circumstances to which we have referred, no legal necessity for such a process to precede the present administration. An administration, we admit, either general or limited, cannot, unless under some special considerations, be granted without citing the next of kin; but that rule is confined to next of kin at the time of the intestate's death.(a)[1] If they renounce and die, their representative has not the same right. The Court may then exercise its discretion, and decree administration to a stranger in preference to kindred. This we apprehend to be a principle recognized and acted upon in the Ecclesiastical Courts. Indeed, its existence and propriety seem to be conceded on the part of Sir Lumley Skeffington; for in the act [632] on petition it is not alleged that, before a limited administration is decreed, it is the universal practice of the Court of Probate (when an administration de bonis non, and limited for a certain purpose, is applied for) to cite those entitled to a general grant; but it is merely stated that, "under the circumstances," Sir Lumley Skeffington should have had a legal notice by citation; no infringement then of any invariable rule of practice is averred. It may be further admitted that the Ecclesiastical Court would usually grant an administration to a representative of a next of kin, if the application were made in due time; but in this instance there has been extreme delay. No application was made on behalf of the present appellant till after the letters of administration were parted with by the nominee and annexed to the title deeds. The letters of administration are now out of the grantee's possession and control; and if he were ordered to bring them into the registry of the Court, it would not be in his power to obey the monition.

But the Prerogative Court has not exceeded the limits of a just discretion in this matter: it was fully authorized and at liberty to make the grant. Vigilantibus non dormientibus lex succurrit. Here was no clandestinity nor surprize upon Sir Lumley Skeffington, and no concealment of facts from the Court. The various deeds were before it; and that the appellant was apprised of the intended application for the grant is clear from the documents in the cause;(a)[2] yet he directed no caveat to be

---

(a)[1] Vide appendix, and the cases there reported.

(a)[2] In a letter dated the 14th of July, 1826, from the solicitor of Flower, Davis, and others, to Sir L. Skeffington's solicitor, there was a passage as follows:—"Mr. Rowcroft's claims upon the estates of both A. and T. Hubbert must put beyond all doubt the total absence of all beneficial interest in the next of kin of T. Hubbert. My clients therefore wish the friendly concurrence of Sir L. Skeffington, by his making a similar renunciation at the present time to that made by his mother and Mrs. Donovan in 1791; and as they are advised that the Court would, were it prayed for, grant a limited administration confined to this particular property (to which their title is so clear), but at a great expence both to the next of kin and to the partner entitled to this property, and with serious delay; and as T. Hubbert left no other property whatever, I trust Sir L. Skeffington will not hesitate to accede to this request, and thereby enable my clients to obtain by an easy and speedy means that which they must otherwise seek, and will undoubtedly attain by an expensive and dilatory process. Should this request not be complied with, I shall of course immediately apply in the ordinary way for limited letters of administration to the effects of T. Hubbert, and resort to such means as may be necessary to authenticate the usual allegations in these cases." And an affidavit, made by the clerk to the solicitor (first above referred to), thus concluded: "On the termination of the correspondence [between the two solicitors] the deponent made several applications to Sir L. Skeffington's solicitor for the papers delivered to him, which he refused to deliver until his charges had been paid; that at some of the interviews between the deponent and the said solicitor on the said applications the deponent stated to him that as Sir L. Skeffington declined giving his assistance in the business, his (the deponent's employers) clients would accomplish their object without it, as there was no doubt of their right to the said leasehold premises."

[633] entered; and neither he nor his solicitor (who had been constantly communicated with upon this business) took any precautionary measure to prevent the grant. Nor can any advantage accrue to the appellant by revoking the administration; for all acts done under it are good. [634] There are various authorities to that effect. Packman's case (6 Co. 18, 19. Cro. Eliz. 459). Blackborough v. Davis (1 Salk. 38. 1 Lord Ray. 684).

For upwards of twenty years the appellant has been in a condition to obtain an inventory and account of Thomas Hubbert's estate, and to see to its proper administration; and yet till the year 1827, when he was applied to upon the subject of this grant, he had never interfered in the management of this property, nor advanced any claim in respect to it; but, on the contrary, he had allowed his rights, if rights he has any, to remain so dormant that it was only after the most diligent and laborious search that it was discovered he was the representative of the intestate's next of kin. And during a long course of years Mr. Rowcroft remained in quiet possession; the property was improved by him, and dealt with in a variety of transactions, and it has now passed to a bonâ fide purchaser for a valuable consideration. Under these circumstances the limited administration has been properly decreed; and the appellant has failed to shew any title in order to impeach the grant.

Mr. Knight on the same side. The administration under discussion not being one granted in contravention of any statutory provision, the only substantial question is whether it was an act in which a judicial discretion was unsoundly exercised, on the part of the Court below, to such an extent as to render [635] it fit to be corrected on appeal; for the Court below certainly was entitled to exercise a discretion: there is no positive rule or clearly settled practice giving preference to kindred in cases of this description; and there are familiar instances of frequent occurrence in which an administration, in such exercise of discretion, is granted to strangers in blood in preference to claims of affinity and kindred. The whole question then turns upon the exercise of the discretion.

In the present case nothing is suggested against the solvency or respectability of the administrator; he was nominated on the part of persons in the apparent ownership and peaceable possession of the property. And what did the grant of administration confer on him? a burthen or liability merely, and no benefit. The Court, granting the administration, neither did nor could give or strengthen any beneficial right, or do more than render the administrator a trustee for those really entitled (whosoever being); and he is bound to assign or distribute accordingly. Did the grant vary, or in any respect prejudice any remedy or right of Sir Lumley Skeffington? Not in any sense. If he were in possession of the administration he could bring no ejectment; he must apply to a Court of Equity; and in support of his claim he might have filed his bill against White as soon as the administration passed the seal.

Thomas Hubbert had the terms in question, but Alexander was his administrator, and assigned them; and the whole matter to which the present administration relates is an equitable, or a possible or a supposed equitable, right to [636] call back the terms from the legal holders of them (of course not before the Court on this occasion), that is, to call them back for the benefit of the person or persons representing the general personal estate of Thomas Hubbert. Sir Lumley Skeffington's sole remedy therefore in respect of the property (the possession of which is admitted to be, and to have long been, adverse to him and his family) must be in any event, and in any event must have been, by filing a bill in equity. Has he that right the less by means of the existing grant? Certainly not. Could he have had, or can he have, it the more had the grant been to him or were it now to be made to him? Certainly not. Has the act of the Ecclesiastical Court been such as to throw a difficulty in his way or a slur on his title, if any? Clearly not. The functions of that jurisdiction are not of a nature to be allowed that effect, nor does any Temporal Court give any such effect to any such act. The grant may have rendered it necessary to make the administrator a party defendant to any suit in equity by Sir Lumley Skeffington; but that is too weak a ground to afford an argument; and such must have been the consequence of nominating any administrator except Sir Lumley Skeffington himself, who, in fact, does not allege himself to be the personal representative of either his father (who survived Lady Skeffington, and became entitled to her personal estate) or of Mrs. Dawson. In fact, however, the administrator has actually assigned the terms, which were the whole object of his administration, and so remains without estate or interest; and it is clear law that the validity of that as-[637]-signment will not be affected by a revocation of the grant of administration.

How, therefore, independently of any question as to the ultimate validity of Sir Lumley Skeffington's claim of property, can it be said that the Court in a matter of discretion has gone so wrong as that it is fit to reverse what has been done? In such cases where the beneficial right of property is not concerned, and a mere matter of official duty is in question, a Court of Appeal ought not to interfere unless on very strong and cogent grounds. It ought to act as the Courts of Equity do in the case of receivers, holding it not sufficient to say that the inferior judge has, of two persons proposed to him, selected the worse, or has selected one than whom fitter persons could be suggested, unless a positive case of unfitness can be established against the person appointed.

But if the question of the probability of the ultimate success of Sir Lumley Skeffington's claim of property be considered, it will be found not worthy of countenance or attention. His claim is founded on the allegation that the terms not only were, but continue to be, as to the beneficial interest in them, part of Thomas Hubbert's personal estate. As has been said before, this claim, if tenable, can only be prosecuted in equity in any event; but is it one which a Court of Equity will assist? Is not Sir Lumley Skeffington bound to shew that it is or may be so, before he can ask for a revocation of the grant? If every fact stated in Jones' affidavit should appear in a Court of Equity, a bill filed by Sir Lumley Skeffington in respect to this claim would be demurred to. A Court of [638] Equity however does not assist stale demands, and generally considers twenty years of adverse enjoyment as a complete bar. In the present case Alexander Hubbert became administrator of Thomas in February, 1791, on the renunciation of Thomas' next of kin; and it is manifest on the whole evidence that from that time down to the year 1826 neither of the next of kin, nor any claiming under or in right of either of them, ever had or sought possession or enjoyment of the property, or any part of it, or any interest in it. The possession and enjoyment have continued and are still adverse. How, then, even upon Sir Lumley's own shewing, can a Court of Equity act? The disabilities of infancy, imprisonment, and foreign residence are out of the case; and that of coverture does not apply; for not only is the question one of personal estate, but Donovan, who must have died before the year 1808, as his will was proved in March, 1807, survived his wife; and as to Lady Skeffington, she too was survived by her husband, though when he died or when Lady Skeffington died, their son avoids mentioning. But was it not his duty to inform the Court, and is any thing to be intended in his favor in a case such as this? In fact, however, upon the question of length of time, it is immaterial under the circumstances when Lady Skeffington or her husband died.

The present, then, is not a case in which, on Sir Lumley Skeffington's application, the Court ought to revoke a limited grant of administration such as this is—a revocation which may do harm and injustice, but cannot advance any right, nor do any party any good.

[639] He cited Packman's case (6 Co. 18), Squib v. Wyn (1 P. Wms. 382), Beckford v. Wade (17 Ves. 87), Macleod v. Drummond (ib. 165), Chalmer v. Bradley (1 Jac. & Walk. 51), Lord Cholmondeley v. Clinton (2 Jac. & W. 1), Price v. Copner (1 Sim. & Stu. 347), Hickes v. Cooke (4 Dow, 16).

Lushington and Addams for the appellant. The first question is whether the Court could grant such an administration at all without first citing the next of kin or their representatives, and giving them the option of taking a general grant de bonis non. Secondly, whether this proceeding be justified by the general law, or by the particular circumstances of the individual case.

It was not competent to the Court to grant any administration at all in this case, without first citing the next of kin or their representative, the present appellant; he had a prior right to the administration, a right of which he could not be deprived. For grants of administration are not to be considered according to what may be the interests of parties in Courts of Law or of Equity. It is perfectly clear that, on the death of Thomas Hubbert, the Court was bound to grant the administration to the next of kin, if they had chosen to take it; but they renounced. The effect, however, of that renunciation was not to renounce any benefit from whatever surplus there might be after payment of the debts. We allow that during the life-[640]-time of the creditor administrator the next of kin could not have taken the administration from him; but on his death the right of the next of kin revived. The renunciation was not perpetual. This was admitted in the sentence of the Court below.

Many reasons occur why a next of kin will renounce an administration in favour of a particular creditor, as confidence in the individual, affairs embarrassed; and in this instance the creditor administrator was the deceased's partner, and the transactions were extremely complicated. It does not follow that an estate is insolvent because the next of kin renounce. In West India and mercantile estates solvency may be, and often is, doubtful. Such a state of property will lead to a temporary renunciation of the right to administration. The next of kin then being entitled to the grant on Alexander Hubbert's death, how can they be deprived of that grant without their own consent or without a citation. Where a party has a title to a prior grant, whether of probate or administration, the universal practice of the Court is to cite that party before a grant can issue to any other person. In cases of probate the executor is cited before a grant to a residuary legatee; a residuary legatee is cited before a grant to a specific legatee; so in administrations, the next of kin are cited before a grant to a creditor. Such is the universal practice, and so strictly held, that there must be a citation on the Royal Exchange when the parties are out of the kingdom. On what principle could this grant be made without a citation? We contend that for want of a citation, [641] and upon the ground of a prior right in the appellant, this grant must be repealed. It has been said that the statute of 21 Hen. 8, c. 5, applies only to the next of kin at the time of the death; but no decision to that effect has been cited. On the other hand, it is clear that if this grant had not been a departure from ordinary practice, it would not have been moved in Court; and usage and a long course of practice will make a law.

The Court below said that the next of kin had lost their rights by time, by events, and by their own laches. But the principle is not applicable to such a subject matter. Invariable practice proves the contrary: the executor or next of kin can only be barred by a renunciation, or by an actual service of a decree, and a refusal to appear: but not even by that, in the case of an executor. But what time is a bar? Where is the rule? how is this to be decided? If there is no specific period, what a field of litigation is opened! Is time to be a bar at the end of ten, fifteen, or twenty years? or is it to be a bar to next of kin, and to no one else? Will creditors be barred? In the present case there is equal laches. Again, what events—what circumstances shall bar? This is also too indefinite; the Ecclesiastical Court has no such discretionary power.

The present claimant has no title whatever: he is not a creditor of the intestate; he is not a nominee of the creditors: he is simply a nominee of persons in possession of the intestate's property. There is no authority which lays down that possession for a certain length of time will give a title to an administra-[642]-tion. But this administration was not granted on the ground of title: that was expressly disclaimed.

The consequences of such a grant are most serious. Here is a very large property to which administration has been taken under 50l.; and to whom is the administration granted? What security does this grant to White, a mere nominee, afford to the rights of others? Much confusion must ensue if it be sustained: every distinct leasehold estate will have its separate grant; and upon these, a cæterorum grant. We do not admit that all mesne acts done under this administration would be good; but if they are, what prejudice will the repeal of the grant occasion to those on whose behalf it was made? If the parties in possession of this property have a good title, no possible injury can result to them from the refusal of a grant to their nominee; they may compel the administrator to perfect this title; but they never would have resorted to this strange mode of proceeding if it had not been to cover some latent defect. It was not necessary to enter a caveat, because no such grant had ever been made without a previous citation.

The grounds stated in the protest are, that the premises are sold, and that the vendors were entitled "to the sole equitable right, title, and interest" in them. No account was ever rendered by Alexander Hubbert of his administration: he mortgaged the leaseholds and paid the creditors, but made no assignment of the property. An untrue representation of the state of this property was made in the first instance, and, after the unsuccessful negotiation with Sir [643] Lumley Skeffington, was still persisted in, and carried on by clandestine proceedings.

Preston on the same side. Although the next of kin of Thomas Hubbert renounced for the purpose that letters of administration might be granted to Alexander Hubbert, this renunciation was only for the convenience of collecting the assets. The beneficial interest in the surplus assets after payment of the creditors remained with the next of kin, and now belongs to the appellant as their representative, and it conferred on him a right to require letters of administration of the assets, remaining unadministered at the death of A. Hubbert, to be granted to him. Though he should obtain administration cæterorum, the limited administration granted to White would suspend the right to sue at law, if the remedy were legal; and will supersede, except through the medium of a Court of Equity (even if a Court of Equity will have jurisdiction to act), the right to require a conveyance from the persons who now have the legal estate.

The letters of administration to White are not in the ordinary form of letters of administration, obtained by the owner of the inheritance when an assignment is requisite of a term attendant on the inheritance; they are of a mixed character. They assume that all the beneficial interest in the leases, or terms, had become vested in Thomas Rowcroft by payment of debts to the value of the leases, and through him in Davis and others, his assignees, and who applied to have administration granted to their nominee. Aware of the difficulties to which the case was [644] exposed, the letters of administration treat the terms as an asset to be administered, and yet the stamp is as for a nominal asset, and not proper for an asset of value to be applied in a due course of administration.

The material statement in the administration is that which will be noticed in the progress of the argument; and on which it will be necessary to offer some detailed observations, and yet from the history of the transaction it is evident that this asset never was duly administered: it remained part of the assets of T. Hubbert, even down to the death of A. Hubbert. Instead of being sold it was pledged partly by way of security for several annuities, and partly by way of mortgage, in consideration of sums raised to obtain money to be applied in part payment of the composition with the creditors of T. and A. Hubbert. The statement that W. Davis and others became entitled as well to the freehold and inheritance as to the sole equitable right, &c., to and in the remainder of the said term of years, granted as aforesaid, founded as it was on the allegation that "although no actual assignment of the leases was made by A. Hubbert to Rowcroft, yet he, Rowcroft, was in possession, and had the sole management and controul of the premises therein granted, and was in the sole receipt of the rents and profits thereof, from or before the year 1795 to the year 1818," is a mere fallacy. It is language which states facts, but not the spirit, the truth, or the legal result of the facts. It conceals the real character of the transaction. It treats Rowcroft as being, and being allowed to be, the beneficial owner. It follows up the [645] history of this possession by a statement that during such period he paid the several annuities charged on the premises, and all other outgoings. Compare the dates and real character of Rowcroft, and this statement is devoid of all foundation in truth and in law; as the root of an equitable or adverse title. Rowcroft was the partner of A. Hubbert, and had embarked in his speculations, and, for the convenience of their partnership concerns, he had joined with him as a surety to pay a composition to the creditors on their debts, claimable out of the partnership assets of T. and A. Hubbert, and, in aid of them, out of the separate assets of T. Hubbert. Rowcroft resided in England, while A. Hubbert (from about 1794) resided at Ostend, where he died.

On account of A. Hubbert's residence out of England, and the partnership and the guarantee given by Rowcroft jointly with Hubbert, and the annuities which had been granted (and for which Rowcroft had made himself liable), Rowcroft was entrusted or authorized to receive the rents of this leasehold estate; more especially as the means of answering the annuities, as they became due. He was a mere agent of the administrator. The fact of granting annuities, secured on the leases, as an asset, instead of selling the leases, is of itself a ground of equity in favour of the next of kin; and meets, and completely refutes, any notion that Rowcroft had made the asset his own individual property by paying debts beyond the value.

In opposition to the cases cited in support of the argument on the other side Sir Lumley Skeffington relies on the case of Pickering v. Lord [646] Stamford,(a) to shew that this asset was unadministered, and that time does not run against the claim of next of kin, to call for the due application of an unadministered asset. How could an administrator, by granting annuities which might determine at an early period by the deaths of the lives, realize to himself the profit, if any, of a transaction so irregular, and so contrary to the duty of an administrator in the due and proper discharge of his office, which makes it imperative on him (unless he takes a different course for the sake and benefit of the next of kin) to sell, and by that means ascertain and obtain the full and actual value of the asset. By granting annuities, instead of selling the terms, the administrator has, in fair inference and in the contemplation of a Court of Equity, made a bargain to secure an ultimate advantage to the next of kin and to himself. The composition was also for the benefit of the next of kin; and not of the administrator quà administrator. Whatever the administrator might have done, Rowcroft was without any power, without any right, except so far as he was entitled to be indemnified from his suretyship to the creditors and to the annuitants. He was only the deputy, the agent of the administrators, except so far as an equity arose to him to be indemnified as surety; and his receipt of rents, down to the death of A. Hubbert, was as such agent, deputy, or surety: and whether in one or in the other character, his possession was not adverse in the lifetime of A. Hubbert, [647] but was a possession under the title of A. Hubbert. From the death of A. Hubbert there was a suspense of the representation to T. Hubbert, and by a settled rule of law (a) time or adverse possession could not begin to run until there was a representative to Thomas, and no such representation has existed since the death of A. Hubbert, in 1806.

(a) 2 Ves. jun. 272, 581. See also Cubbidge v. Boatwright, 1 Russ. 549.

At his death the annuities were existing; also the mortgage for 1500l. made by A. Hubbert to Margaret Smith, who assigned in 1795 to Davis, a trustee for Rowcroft; and then Rowcroft assumes the new and additional character of mortgagee: and yet his equitable title is not by the letters of administration placed on that footing: nor could it have been done with any color of reason or equity, since he had also the duty to collect and receive the rents, to answer the annuities while they continued; and one of these annuities determined in 1821 and the other in 1824. Besides, neither A. Hubbert nor Rowcroft ever attempted to assume or to claim this asset as their own property. The statement in the letters of administration of equitable merger is devoid of all principle, for Rowcroft had in 1797 purchased the reversion of the property, subject to an interposed interest; and there was not any merger at law or in equity. Instead of treating Rowcroft or Hubbert as beneficial owner, there was a recital in the mortgage to Smith in 1805 (only one year before A. Hubbert's death) that A. Hubbert had taken out administration of the effects [648] of Hubbert, and was indebted to Rowcroft in 7878l. and upwards: and Rowcroft being indebted to Smith and Co. in 15,000l., he deposited the title deeds to the freehold interest he had purchased, and an attested copy of the two leases, as a security for repayment of the 15,000l.; and he assigned to Messrs. Smith the debt due to him from A. Hubbert, whether in his own right or as administrator of the effects of T. Hubbert; and without distinguishing the amount due from the administrator as such, from the sum due from A. Hubbert individually. This deed repels every presumption, every notion, that Rowcroft had a beneficial interest in the leases on the ground of purchase; or as having made the asset his own: indeed he had not, whatever A. Hubbert might have had, any right to treat the asset as made his own property, by payment of debts beyond the value. And Rowcroft, and those who claim under him, could not avail themselves of any title, as owners, under A. Hubbert; since, as against A. Hubbert, they claimed to be creditors on the leases, and not owners of them: and the existence of the debt, as a debt, is recognised as late as September, 1805, while A. Hubbert is living, when Rowcroft granted an annuity to Mrs. Logie: but the terms of the deed are not stated, and it is to be inferred that they are injurious, not beneficial, to the title asserted on the part of Rowcroft. And the terms of the security for an annuity to Charles Logie, in September, 1802, are also withheld in the statement of the history of Rowcroft's title. Another important feature in this case arises not from inference, but from documentary state-[649]-ment. It is that the money for the annuities, and the money advanced by Mrs. Smith on mortgage, were raised to be applied in part of the composition to the creditors. And by the new arrangement with the creditors in March, 1793, for payment of the remaining part of the composition, it appears that (a) Stanford's case, cited Cro. Jac. 61. Murray v. East India Company, 5 Barn. & Ald. 216.

A. Hubbert and Rowcroft were in advance 2500l. only. They state their own insolvency, and exhibit a particular of the outstanding debts of the partnership (being sums to a considerable amount), and they specify these leasehold estates as a remaining asset, without affixing any sum as the value of the same; it was, of course, the asset of the administrator as such. And when Rowcroft paid Mrs. Smith in 1795, his motive for so doing was expressed to be, that "Rowcroft was unwilling that the mortgaged premises of A. Hubbert should be immediately sold."

All these statements and transactions negative the claim of Rowcroft to be, or to be considered, as in adverse possession, or to be treated as owner, in or after 1795. And unless he became owner in the lifetime of A. Hubbert, there has not existed since his death any representative who could confer a title on him, or against whom time could run. Even after the death of A. Hubbert, Rowcroft, still acting honestly and honourably towards the persons interested in the assets of T. Hubbert, assigned not the leasehold estate as a property, but the debt of 7878l. due to him from A. Hubbert, and afterwards assigned his interest to them in trust to sell. This was so late as the 19th January, 1815, while the annuities were still continuing. In 1818 Davis and others obtain a release of the equity [650] of redemption in liquidation and discharge of their debt; and this release or conveyance was made subject to the annuities and to the leases. Now even an administrator in full power and right cannot sell or mortgage in consideration of a debt due from himself personally, so as to prejudice the next of kin. That the release was made subject to the leases fully proves that they were not, and were not treated to be, merged in the inheritance as attendant. The leases could not be noticed for any other purpose than to shew that Rowcroft did not mean to assert a title to the benefit of them, as against the representatives of the next of kin, the rightful owners of them. Thus the equity, on which the letters of administration were granted, entirely fails. And such equity, if it had existed to the fullest extent in which it is asserted, would not, in point of law and ecclesiastical jurisdiction, support the grant.

The grant has been made improvidently, and been obtained by surprize. It is in contravention to the rights of Sir L. Skeffington to be the sole and general administrator, unfettered by a grant which would exclude him from the only advantages he seeks to obtain from a grant, full and unlimited, of letters of administration to himself. What is his right? His right is to have this asset administered, and to call for the legal estate, and to settle all the demands of A. Hubbert and of Rowcroft, and the persons claiming to be incumbrancers on this asset.

It was urged that the limited administration did not interpose any impediments to the prejudice of an administrator cæterorum. That argument was offered without due consideration. [651] In the first place, White is constituted the representative of Thomas Hubbert as to these terms. No suit can be instituted in equity in respect of this asset, without making White a party. To increase the number of parties to a suit in equity is in itself a difficulty, an evil, an injury. Besides, a Court of Equity cannot treat Sir L. Skeffington, being only an administrator cæterorum, as having a right to administer this asset, or control the assignment of the terms, or require an assignment of the legal estate, or to settle the accounts so as to clear this asset of its incumbrances. The answer of a Court of Equity to the suit of Sir L. Skeffington for these objects would be—You must displace the character of the special administrator before you can, in respect of this asset, be a plaintiff in this Court. It is obvious, then, that these letters of administration are injurious to the appellant. The grant is the commencement of a new and bad system. It is not warranted by law, or sanctioned by practice. It brings the appellant into conflict with a stranger who has not any right to administer any part of the assets as assets. It makes it at least necessary that White should be a party to every suit in equity in respect of this asset; and perhaps, and probably, the grant, if continued in force, will impede and bar his right to institute any suit concerning this asset or the accounts with which it is connected. It gives to White, while the administration is in force (and so his counsel have argued his case), the power to administer this asset, to call for an assignment of the legal estate, and to adjust and settle the accounts of the incumbrancers.

[652] These letters of administration are, in their tendency and in their object and effect, a release of the equity of redemption, and an attempt to exclude the investigation of a long and intricate transaction, involving an equitable title which ought to be open for examination in a Court of Equity.

The Prerogative Court, assuming a jurisdiction which exclusively belongs to a Court of Equity, has decided on the equitable title as between opposing and conflicting parties.

The merits of the appellant are clear: he has a right to have general letters of administration, and to be unfettered with any difficulty from the Ecclesiastical Court, in the assertion of his equitable title as administrator.

By decreeing the nullity of their administration, no person will be injured or prejudiced; the rights and interests of all parties will be restored to a proper footing, leaving the administrator at full liberty to prosecute any just and lawful or equitable claims; and leaving to Davis and others all the powers which of right, and by the rules of law or equity, belong to them of resisting and defending themselves, if they can, against the claim of the administrator.

The Court pronounced for the appeal, directed a monition to issue to call in the limited administration, and condemned the respondent in costs.

[653] WESTMEATH v. WESTMEATH. 15th July, 1829.—The Court will pronounce an Irish peer in contempt for non-payment of costs, and direct such contempt to be signified, leaving the Lord Chancellor to decide whether the writ de contumace capiendo should issue.

[See Supplement, p. 1.]

This was an application to pronounce the Marquess of Westmeath to be in contempt, and to direct his contempt to be signified for not obeying a monition to pay the costs incurred, on behalf of Lady Westmeath, in the Court of Delegates. The costs had been taxed at 201l. 4s. 8d., and a monition for the payment thereof had been personally served upon the marquess, and returned into Court on the 25th of May.

Lushington and Addams in support of the application. Unless Lord Westmeath is protected as an Irish peer, the Court must pronounce him in contempt: and the question is whether, as an Irish peer, it ought on that account alone to refuse this application? By the fourth article of the Union with Ireland, Irish peers, except in certain cases, are to be sued and tried as peers, and to enjoy all the privileges of peers as fully as peers of Great Britain (40 Geo. 3, c. 67, art. 4). And we are not aware that, as relates to this case, any distinction can be made between an English and an Irish peer. An Irish peer is exempt from arrest on ordinary civil process. Coates v. Viscount Hawarden (7 B. & C. 388). Considering, then, that Lord Westmeath is entitled to the same privileges as a [654] British peer, would this Court pronounce a British peer in contempt? The consequences of such a decree need not be regarded by this Court, for it would be a matter for the Court of Chancery to determine whether the writ de contumace capiendo should issue. It is only incumbent upon this Court to decide whether Lord Westmeath has, or has not, been guilty of a contempt in not paying the taxed costs. To pronounce a peer in contempt is no breach of privilege; it is not an arrest of the person; it is only an initiatory process. The 53 G. 3, c. 127, has substituted the writ de contumace capiendo for the writ de excommunicato capiendo. The same regulations govern the latter as applied to the former writ. And the language, both of the 5 Eliz. c. 23, and of the 53 G. 3, c. 127, is general. There is no exemption for peers. In definitive sentences the Ecclesiastical Court can still pronounce a party excommunicate: and in the statute of 5 & 6 Edw. 6, c. 5 (s. 2), against quarrelling and fighting in the church, it is enacted, "That if any person shall smite or lay violent hands, &c. that then ipso facto every person so offending shall be deemed excommunicate." Privileges of peers may avail in cases of small but not of great importance. 2 Hawk. P. C. 152. For the purpose of this argument there is no distinction between a spiritual and a temporal peer: and in the Bishop of St. David's case (a) the bishop was taken upon several significavits, and on one for non-payment of costs.

[655] Bayley, J. Were the costs incurred before or after he became a peer?

Argument resumed.

They were incurred after: the bishop pleaded his privilege as a peer. In Rex v. The Bishop of St. Asaph (1 Wills. 332) the Court said: There is no doubt but an attachment "may issue against a peer." And Viner, citing Harris v. Lord Mountjoy

(a) Lucy v. The Bishop of St. David, 2 Ld. Raym. 817, 7 Mod. 56, 117.

(2 Leonard, 173), says: "For execution on a stat. staple merchant, on the stat. of Acton Burnel, or on the stat. of 23 Hen. 8, the body of a baron shall be taken in execution; for by these statutes such persons were not exempted" (Viner, tit. Peer (D.), s. 3). It is laid down that a peer shall not be arrested in debt or trespass, Countess of Rutland's case (6 Co. 52); and the reason is that a peer is supposed to have sufficient property by which he may be compelled to appear. But the Ecclesiastical Courts have no jurisdiction over property: and the only mode they have of enforcing their decrees is by proceeding against the person: they cannot touch the goods. In some instances those Courts might proceed in pœnam; but if this monition be not enforced, the effect will be to release all peers from the operation of the matrimonial and testamentary law of this country. For instance, the husband could never be compelled to appear in a suit for the restitution of conjugal rights; or, if he did appear, he could not be compelled to proceed one step further than he pleased: he might continue before the Court so [656] long as he entertained hopes of success, and no longer: he might disregard the judgment of the Court; so that, being a peer, he might at pleasure separate from his wife. Thus, in suits for nullity of marriage; adultery; cruelty. And in all these cases the costs of the wife are a necessary part of the proceedings; she cannot obtain justice without them. So also in matters of testamentary law. A peer might retain an original will in his custody, or keep an administration improperly obtained; and the Court could not, in either case, proceed effectually against him. And this reasoning applies to all cases in every other branch of ecclesiastical jurisdiction. But, it being clear that contempt is substituted for excommunication, and that a peer enjoys no absolute privilege of exemption, the Court, we apprehend, cannot in this case decline to enforce its monition.

Bayley, J., referred to Comberbach's Reports, p. 62; and also to the case of Lord Cromwell, who, in the time of Queen Elizabeth, was discharged after an attachment had issued against him (and been returned) for disobedience to an injunction in Chancery. Selden—Of the Privileges of the Baronage—vol. iii. p. 1543, c. 4 (fol. ed.), S. C. Dyer, 314.(a)[1]

The Court directed the case to stand over for a further argument upon three points:—

1. Whether, before the stat. of 5 Eliz. c. 23, the Ecclesiastical Courts could put in force any [657] further proceeding against a peer, after excommunication.
2. Whether the 5 Eliz. applied to peers, and made any alteration in that respect.
3. The effect of the 53 G. 3, c. 127.

5th November.—Lushington. Prior to the stat. of 5 Eliz. c. 23, excommunication might be pronounced by the bishop, or by his judge, or by the Court of Delegates; and, on the excommunication being signified into Chancery, the writ de excommunicato capiendo issued; but not till after an expiration of forty days from the time that the excommunication had been published. In ancient times interdicts were also issued by ecclesiastical authority, and these included towns and cities. The writ de excommunicato and the imprisonment that ensued were only one consequence of excommunication. Other consequences and disabilities necessarily attached to a decree of excommunication, whether a significavit issued or not. The party excommunicate could not sue or be a witness; he was disabled from being an executor, or at least his service of that office was suspended. And that a plaintiff had been declared excommunicate and not absolved was a good answer to an action.(a)[2] These were among the civil disabilities attaching upon excommunication only.

The 5 Eliz. c. 23, was "an act for the due execution of the writ de excommunicato capiendo;" that is its heading: and the object of the statute was to enforce the writ and make it [658] more effectual; not to diminish any of the former powers, but to increase them; nor did it supersede the writ de excommunicato capiendo at common law; that still remained. The writ was originally returnable only into the Court of Chancery; but this statute, by its second section, directs that it shall be returnable into the Court of King's Bench. Penalties in certain specified cases were superadded. Sect. 13 enacts that there must be the same additions as were required by stat. 1 Hen. 5, c. 5, and it may be a question (not necessary for me now to discuss) whether this statute extends to peers.

(a)[1] The fullest statement of Lord Cromwell's case is in D'Ewes' Journal, 203.

(a)[2] Of excommunication, its division and effects, see Lyndwood, lib. v. tit. 17. Ayliff's Parergon, p. 255, et seq.

Bayley, J. You cannot have a capias against a peer, because you may have a distress infinite.

Argument resumed.

Prior to the 53 G. 3, c. 127, a sentence of excommunication, independent of the writ, carried with it other severe punishments. There is nothing to shew that a peer might not be excommunicated; and, putting the writ de excommunicato capiendo out of the question, be subjected to all the other consequences of excommunication. The precedents from the Delegates (a) prove that the judges, sitting under [659] respective commissions in this Court, have executed such a power: and why should not the writ de excommunicato capiendo follow upon the decree. Excommunication in this class of cases is now taken away by 53 G. 3; and [660] if the writ de contumace capiendo is not substituted for it in the case of peers, then this statute has abridged and nullified the power of the ecclesiastical courts over peers: for, before that statute was passed, those courts exer-[661]-cised over them excommunication and its penal consequences. It cannot be presumed that the legislature intended to reduce the power of the ecclesiastical courts, and leave them without any remedy against peers.

(a) The precedents cited were as follows:—

Countess of Meath v. Earl of Meath. Delegates, 6th Feb., 1724.

A bill of costs porrected and taxed against the carl. Monition decreed for payment sub pœnâ excommunicationis.*[1]

Delegates, 27th Jan., 1725.—The earl was condemned in expences under pain of excommunication.

28th Apr., 1726.—Holman and Duthick alleged that the monition for payment of expences had been served upon the earl upwards of thirty days.*[2]

Lady Cavendish Harley (by her Guardians Lords Paget and Pelham) v. The Dutchess of Newcastle and Lord Clare. 27th May, 1715.

The Dutchess of Newcastle condemned in costs, and a monition decreed against her to pay the same sub pœnâ.

Earl of Leicester v. The Countess of Leicester.† 6th November, 1738.

Joselyn Earl of Leicester being thrice called, and not appearing, the judges directed him to be excommunicated for not giving in his personal answers; but not to be extracted till after next Court.

Lady Cranstoun (Wife of Lord Cranstoun) v. Marshall. 9th May, 1770.

Monition for costs was decreed against Lady (or Lord) Cranstoun, fifteen days after service.

15th November, 1770.—Collins left in the registry a schedule of excommunication against Sophia Lady Cranstoun, wife of James Lord Cranstoun, in case costs were not paid pursuant to the monition.‡

Countess of Ilay v. The Earl of Ilay. Consistory, Mich. Term, 1st Session, 1718.

The judge, at petition of Sayer, pronounced the Earl of Ilay contumacious, and assigned to hear upon Sayer's petition, and continued the certificate to the next session.

Note.—From that day the cause stood out, and on each Court the pain of the earl was reserved.

Consistory, Trinity Term, 1st Session, 1719.—Proclamation was made for the earl, and he not appearing, Sayer alleged and prayed as "in chartâ;" and upon his petition the certificate was continued.

---

*[1] There appears a void of fourteen months in the assignation book, but this cause is set out in June, 1725, in the next book without reference to the monition, and so continues.

*[2] The rest of the assignation was indistinct; but the words "eum pro excommunicato denuntiavit" seemed to form a part of it. It was, however, impossible to ascertain whether a significavit followed.

† This cause is described in the assignation book, Sidney v. Sidney. Costs and alimony were given; but the excommunication does not appear to have been extracted. A monition by ways and means for costs was extracted; but no further proceedings.

‡ No further assignation in respect to this case.

Daubeny, LL.D., referred to the Articuli Cleri (9 Edw. 2, st. 1, c. 12), with Lord Coke's Commentary upon it, 2 Inst. 630, to shew that in respect to tenants in capite —summoned to Parliament to attend the King—the writ de excommunicato capiendo was never denied.

Bayley, J. If the Court should pronounce Lord Westmeath to be in contempt, and direct a significavit, not only the Lord Chancellor has an opportunity of considering what he will do in the matter; for he may refuse, in the first instance, to grant the writ or quash it afterwards; but, before the writ issues to the sheriff, it goes into the Court of King's Bench, to be entered [662] of record, and that Court may annul it, if there is any thing apparent on the face of the instrument to nullify it.

Park, J. As the statute prevents the Court from qualifying its certificate and adopting any other than the prescribed form, the significavit should not issue merely in common course from the office, but the attention of the Lord Chancellor should be called to it.

The proctor for Lady Westmeath informed the Court that the order in the cursitor's office was, that in all cases where a significavit was prayed against a peer the seal should not be affixed without notice to the Lord Chancellor.

The proctor then exhibited his affidavit, stating that the costs had not been paid to Lady Westmeath nor to himself; and the Court pronounced Lord Westmeath to be in contempt and directed the certificate to issue.

Lady Vane v. Lord Vane. Mich. Term, 3rd Session, 1736.

Cheslyn returned citation, and prayed an appearance, or that Lord Vane be pronounced in contempt. The judge pronounced Lord Vane in contempt, but reserved his pain, and continued the assignation to next Court.

Lady Ferrers v. Laurence Lord Ferrers. Mich. Term, 2nd Session, 1757.

Proclamation for Laurence Earl Ferrers, and he not appearing, Crespigny accused his contumacy and prayed him to be decreed excommunicate for not giving in his answers.

The assignation and certificate to next Court, upon which day Earl Ferrers being thrice called and not appearing Crespigny accused his contumacy, and the judge (Sir Edward Simpson) at his petition pronounced him contumacious for not giving in his answers, but reserved his pain and continued the certificate and assignation to next Court. From which day the assignation was continued to the by-day, when the earl not appearing, Crespigny accused his contumacy, and porrected a schedule of excommunication, which the judge read and signed in the presence of Stevens, and continued the rest of the assignation to the first session of next term.

11th January, 1757-8.—A requisition, to take Lord Ferrers' oath for absolution, decreed at the petition of her proctor, and also for his answers.

Lady Ferrers v. *Robert Lord Ferrers. 23rd May, 1792.

Heseltine alleged that Lord Ferrers had not paid the alimony due to his client pursuant to the monition with which he had been personally served; and therefore prayed the Judge to decree Lord Ferrers excommunicate, and porrected a schedule of excommunication which he prayed the Judge to read and sign; but the Judge (Sir Wm. Scott) declined doing so, and continued the certificate to next Court.

Note.—The certificate was continued for several Court-days; and the alimony was at length alleged to have been paid.

After these cases Lushington referred to 3 Selden, p. 1478, for the case of the Earl of Cromwell, in Edward the First's reign, who, in Westminster Hall, was served, as he was going to parliament, with a citation out of an Ecclesiastical Court, at the suit of Bogo de Clare and the prior of St. Trinity, London. The earl sued them for the contempt, and recovered a thousand marks damages. And in the same parliament the Master of the Temple petitioned that he might distrain for rent in a house in London, which the Bishop of St. David's held of him: "In qua non potest distringere in tempore parliamenti." But the answer was "non videtur honestum quod rex concedat quod ille de consilio suo distringatur tempore parliamenti, sed alio tempore distringatur per ostia et fenestras, prout moris est."

---

* See 1 Hagg. Con. 130.

FREE, D.D. v. BURGOYNE. High Court of Delegates, February 15th, 1830.—A clergyman may be deprived for fornication without previous monition or suspension. Sentence of deprivation affirmed with costs.

[Referred to, Martin v. Mackonochie, 1883, L. R. 8 P. D. 201.]

From the sentence of deprivation pronounced against Dr. Free in the Court of Arches, in Trinity Term, 1829 (O. J. by Burgoyne v. Free, D.D., supra, 456), Dr. Free prosecuted the present appeal: and on this day, before Gaselee, J., Vaughan, B., James Parke, J., Sir Herbert Jenner, LL.D., Dr. Phillimore, Dr. Gostling, Dr. Haggard, and Dr. Chapman, the cause was argued, on the same evidence as in the Court of Arches, by Lushington and Dodson, LL.D., for the respondent; and by Dr. Free.

[663] In the course of the argument a doubt was suggested by the Court whether deprivation, without any antecedent monition, or suspension, was the proper punishment for fornication; but—after a reference to various passages in the canon law, to reported cases,(a) and upon a [664] consideration that if a monition was not necessary to precede a sentence of deprivation on account of adultery, nor a sentence of suspension for any offence, no reason nor principle seemed to exist why it should be required in respect to deprivation for aggravated and notorious fornication (more especially in a case where there was full proof of such a series of offences, and that in consequence thereof the parishioners had, for a length of time, almost wholly ceased to attend their parish church)—the Court affirmed the sentence of the Court of Arches with costs, and remitted the cause.

On the by-day in Hilary Term the proctor for the respondent brought in the remission, when the judge, at his petition, directed a certified copy of the sentence of the Court of Arches to be transmitted to the Consistorial and Episcopal Court of Lincoln, in order that it might be officially communicated to the diocesan.

(a) Among the authorities referred to were the following:—

Mandamus quatenus Clericos qui in Subdiaconatu et supra fornicarias habuerint, studiosè monere curetis ut à se illas removeant. Si vero acquiescere contempserint, eos ab ecclesiasticis beneficiis usque ad satisfactionem congruam suspendatis, et si eas, suspensi presumpserint detinere, ipsos ab eisdem beneficiis perpetuo removere curetis Decretal, 3, 2, 4.

Decernimus ut ii qui in ordine Subdiaconatûs et supra uxores duxerint aut concubinas habuerint officio atque Ecclesiastico beneficio careant. Decreti, pars 1. Distinctio, 28, c. 2.

Si quis Clericus adulterasse aut confessus aut convictus fuerit, depositus ab officio in monasterio toto vitæ suæ tempore detrudatur. Decreti, pars 1. Distinctio, 81, c. 10.

Romanus, Ecclesiæ Theanensis, Clericus pro crimine adulterii quod admisisse perhibetur à Clericatûs ordine depositus in monasterio ad agendam pœnitentiam ex nostra jussione detrusus est. Ibid. c. 11. Presbyter aut Diaconus, qui in fornicatione captus est, deponatur. Ibid. c. 12. Si quis Episcopus aut presbyter aut Diaconus fuerit fornicatus aut mœchatus deponatur, et ab Ecclesia projectus inter Laicos agat pœnitentiam. Ibid. c. 13. Si quis Sacerdotum officium contumaciter deserens fœminam sibi potius elegit sicut sponte ob fornicationem dimittit officium ita ob prevaricationem dimittere cogatur, etiam invitus, beneficium. Ibid. c. 17. Qui, ut fornicari eis liceat, Divinum officium derelinquant, sicut se ab officio justissime alienos faciunt, ita beneficio Ecclesiarum privatos esse adjudicamus. Ibid. c. 18. Si quis ex illis adulterii, scortationis aut incestus convictus fuerit—the Reformatio Legum prescribes first, forfeiture of goods: deinde, si quod illi beneficium fuerit, postquam adulterii vel incestus vel scortationis convictus fuerit, ex eo tempore protinus illud amittat nec illi potestas ullum aliud accipiendi: præterea, vel in perpetuum ablegetur exilium, vel ad æternas carceris tenebras deprimatur. Reformatio Legum, 24 b. c. 2, tit. "Ordiamur ab Ecclesiarum Ministris."

12 Eliz. Burton, parson of Isboch in Leicestershire, was deprived for adultery. 6 Co. 13 b. Latch, 22. Hobart, 293.

16 Eliz. Another case—without the name. Ayliffe, 47.

27 Eliz. A case occurred in which it appeared that one Fox had been deprived for incontinency. Cro. Eliz. 789.

Ayliffe says: Since the Reformation we have had, in our law books, some instances of clergymen being deprived for adultery [referring to those just mentioned]. These cases are enough to shew that the ecclesiastical law in this point is allowed by the Judges of our Common Law to continue in sufficient force amongst us for deprivation

[1] SUPPLEMENT.

THE EARL OF WESTMEATH v. THE COUNTESS OF WESTMEATH. Consistory Court of London, Easter Term, 2nd Session, 1826.—In answer to a suit for restitution of conjugal rights brought by the husband, legal cruelty being established, but a reconciliation and matrimonial intercourse having afterwards taken place the Court enjoined the wife to return to cohabitation, holding that there was no proof of subsequent misconduct by the husband, sufficiently removing the bar of condonation and reviving the previous cruelty, to entitle the wife to a sentence of separation.—Reconciliation will supersede the ground of complaint in the Ecclesiastical Court, as it annihilates articles of separation at common law.

[Reversed, p. 61, post. See Russell v. Russell, [1897] A. C. 395.]

This was a cause of restitution of conjugal rights brought in the Consistory Court of London by the Marquess of Westmeath against the Marchioness of Westmeath, his wife, in which the citation was returned on the first session of Easter Term, 1821; on the fourth session of Trinity Term a libel in the usual form, and consisting of seven articles, was admitted; it pleaded "the marriage on the 29th of May, 1812, cohabitation at various places, and the birth of two children; but that on the 14th of June, 1819, the Marchioness of Westmeath quitted his house and had since refused to cohabit with him." On the first session of Michaelmas Term the marriage was confessed; and on the first session of Hilary Term, 1822, an allegation consisting of thirty-three articles with ten exhibits annexed was admitted, wherein Lady Westmeath, after pleading the marriage, cohabitation, and birth of children, by way [2] of further answer to his libel, alleged in substance: "That soon after July or August, 1812, Lord Westmeath began to treat her with great cruelty and harshness, and was guilty of acts of violence and indignity on several occasions in 1813 and 1814; that in 1815 her health was much affected; that notwithstanding this the marquess continued without cause to quarrel with and abuse her; that on such occasions his language and behaviour were most violent, and she was kept in a continual state of alarm and fear, till at length she intimated to him, that unless he ceased so to treat her she should be compelled to proceed for a legal separation; that he persisted in that his ill treatment, but that, in September, 1815, on his promising to alter his conduct, and on the intercession of a mutual friend, she agreed to forego her intention of applying for a divorce, and consented to continue to live with him." It further pleaded "a specific act of violence in December, 1815, a continuance of his ill conduct, and that in consequence thereof in the summer of 1817 she declared her intention to apply to the laws for protection, but that on his proposition it was agreed that he should execute a deed of separation on his return from Ireland, whither he was then about to proceed; that during his absence in Ireland he wrote certain letters (six of which were exhibited) expressing his contrition for the cruelty of his conduct, and that the marchioness moved thereby, expressed by letter a disposition to forgive him; and that he in answer thereto wrote another (exhibited) letter, alluding to an arrangement he contemplated making, to provide against a recurrence of his ill treatment to his wife; that shortly afterwards an indenture, dated the 17th of December, 1817, [3] was drawn up, by which that arrangement was carried into effect; and wherein it was amongst other things recited, 'that disputes and differences had existed between the marquess and his wife, and had arisen to such a height that they were on the point of separating, living apart, and not cohabiting together; but by the intervention of mutual friends the said marchioness had consented to live and cohabit with the said marquess after he should have executed the said indenture, and thereby made such provision for their issue, and also such provisional maintenance for his wife, the marchioness, as therein after mentioned;' and it contained a proviso, 'that in case it should happen that, by a renewal of such disputes and differences, the said marchioness should find herself compelled to cease to cohabit with her husband, that then such an annuity should be raised by the trustee from the marquess' estates, as should, by the advice of their mutual friends, be agreed upon to be a proper and on the score of this crime. Parergon, 47. And in page 208 he mentions, among the causes of deprivation, gross scandal, incontinency, drunkenness after monition.

---

Incontinency is stated also as a cause of deprivation in Godolphin's Abridgment, p. 307, 2 Burn. Ecc. Law, 143, 405, 8th ed.

sufficient sum for her separate maintenance.'" It further provided, "that a separation was only to take place in case of ill-usage or gross abuse from Lord Westmeath to his said wife."

The allegation then pleaded "a renewal of cohabitation in January, 1818, and a violent menace at Easter, 1818; and that in May, 1818, further articles of separation were drawn up, which were executed on the 8th of August, though purporting to bear date on the 30th of May; that at the earnest intreaty of the marquess, and by the advice of her friends, the marchioness reluctantly consented to allow the marquess to have a separate bed-room in her house; that he still con-[4]-tinued frequently to quarrel with and abuse his wife, and used gross and insulting language to her when in the last stage of pregnancy:" it then pleaded "sundry other specific instances of harsh and violent behaviour and language; and that by one of such instances happening on the 20th of June, 1819, the marchioness, being very much alarmed and terrified, immediately quitted her house, and sought the protection of her friends; and that since the 30th of May, 1818, being the day of the date of the aforesaid indenture of separation, the marchioness had not cohabited with her husband, and since the 20th of June, 1819, had wholly lived separate and apart from him."

On this allegation thirteen witnesses were examined; and Lord Westmeath's answers were taken: and on the 14th of January, 1823, a further allegation, consisting of twenty-five articles, and charging adultery with five different persons from the year 1817 to the latter end of 1822, was admitted on the part of the Marchioness of Westmeath, and on it twelve witnesses were examined.(a)

On the 24th of March, 1824, a defensive allegation, consisting of forty-nine articles with forty-two exhibits annexed, was admitted on the part of the Marquess of Westmeath: the first twenty-five denied or explained the several charges contained in Lady Westmeath's first allegation; the remaining articles contradicted her second allegation. On this allegation twenty-five witnesses were examined. On the first session of Trinity [5] Term the Court admitted an allegation exceptive, first to the credit of one of the witnesses to the charge of cruelty, on the ground that she had negatived an interrogatory, inquiring specifically whether she had made a certain declaration respecting Lady Westmeath's conduct, which declaration it was now pleaded expressly that she had made; and, secondly, to the credit of three of the witnesses examined on three out of the five charges of adultery on the part of Lord Westmeath, on the ground that they had been convicted of, and sentenced to fine and imprisonment for, a conspiracy by corrupt means and false oaths to establish that Lord Westmeath had committed adultery with one of the five persons. The copy of the record of conviction was exhibited. On this allegation three witnesses were examined. To these two pleas Lady Westmeath gave in her answers.

The cause came on for hearing in the Consistory Court of London on the third and fourth sessions of, and the by-day after, Michaelmas Term, 1825; on which days the evidence was read; and on the first, second, third, and fourth sessions of Hilary Term, 1826, the cause was argued by Jenner and Phillimore for the Marquess of Westmeath: and by Lushington and Addams contrà; and on the second session of Easter Term judgment was pronounced.

Judgment—Sir Christopher Robinson. This is a suit of restitution of conjugal rights brought by Lord Westmeath against Lady Westmeath, in which the citation was taken out on the 11th of April, 1821, and returned the 11th of May; and on the 27th of June a libel was given [6] in, pleading the marriage in 1812, and cohabitation till the 14th of June, 1819, when it is alleged "Lady Westmeath quitted Lord Westmeath's house, without any just cause, and has since refused to live or cohabit with him, though application has several times been made to her for that purpose;" and it concludes with the usual prayer "that she may be compelled to return and cohabit with him, and treat him with conjugal affection."

This is the substance of the original complaint in this cause, which has since branched out into a great variety of particulars. On the part of Lady Westmeath an allegation was admitted in January, 1821, in justification of her conduct, pleading sundry acts of cruelty and insult, and alleging "that since the 30th of May, 1818, she had ceased to cohabit with Lord Westmeath, under a deed of separation, and that since the 20th of June, 1819, she had been compelled to leave her house, and in consequence of his continued ill usage had lived separate and apart." In January, 1823, a second allegation was admitted, consisting of twenty-five articles, pleading sundry acts of adultery committed by Lord Westmeath between the years 1815 and 1822, with several women, viz. Anne Connell, Jane Smyth, Catherine Flinn, Mary Brenan, Anne Hythe. Those which relate to Anne Connell, Catherine Flinn, and Anne Hythe have not been insisted on. The charge respecting Anne Connell has been proved to have originated in false information, for which three persons, Anne Connell, Patrick Farley, and John Monaghan, have been convicted of conspiracy, and are now suffering punishment in Ireland. It will not be necessary for me to go into the evidence on those charges which have [7] been abandoned, and without doing that, it would be improper to make any particular observations upon them to the disadvantage of the other parts of the case; but I think I am bound to say that the information on which they have been constructed has been collected or adopted with less caution than ought to have been used in a matter so deeply concerning the honour and reputation of both the noble persons who are affected by it.

(a) It will be hereafter observed that the charges, as to three of these persons, were abandoned; and, as to the other two, were held both by the Judge of the Consistory, and by the Dean of the Arches, to be not established.

I shall proceed, first, to examine the evidence on the charges of adultery, according to the order observed in the argument, and also because it will be more convenient for the discussion of the several parts of this case. The first charge relates to Jane Smyth. The remarks, which have been made on the want of caution in collecting the information on which some of the charges of adultery have been founded, apply strongly to the commencement of the history of the connexion with this woman, as it is set forth in the allegation. Things are pleaded relating to the intimacy alleged to have been formed in the family of Lady Glengall, the aunt of Lord Westmeath; to her being pregnant, and being delivered of a child, and to the manner in which Jane Smyth was introduced into the service of Lady Westmeath, which appear to have had no existence in fact. Lady Glengall deposes "that Jane Smyth never lived in her family;" and that all which is stated on that part of the case is unfounded.

It is alleged, however, in the fourth and following articles of the allegation, that in March, 1821, Lord Westmeath was lodging in the house of a person of the name of Winsor, in Bolton Street, Piccadilly, where he occupied a sitting room, two drawing rooms, and three bed rooms; one for Mr. Jeffries, who was living with him, and two for [8] himself and his servant: "That on a day in that month he told Mrs. Winsor he expected an Irish gentleman to visit him, and requested another bed room to be prepared: that this was done accordingly, and on the same day, during the absence of Mrs. Winsor, Jane Smyth was introduced into the house, and her boxes were taken up to her room, which was a back room on the upper story, over the bed room of the marquess, and not far from the room in which Mrs. Winsor herself slept; that many indecent familiarities passed between the marquess and the said Jane Smyth, and on several nights after the family was gone to bed she staid in the bed room of the marquess until two or three o'clock in the morning; that on one night in particular Mrs. Winsor staid below till one o'clock; that on going up stairs, in passing Lord Westmeath's bed room she heard him and Jane Smyth conversing together; that she afterwards watched to see when she would go to her bed room, but that she did not do so, and that she remained in Lord Westmeath's room all night, and that she slept with him; that in the month of April, the marquess having removed to lodgings in Woodstock Street, Jane Smyth frequently called on him there, and they were alone together in his bed room for a considerable time; that she visited him also in the same manner in other lodgings in Cavendish Street, Cavendish Square, and in Bury Street, Jermyn Street, in January, and April, 1822." These are the acts alleged with respect to Jane Smyth.

The twentieth article pleads: "That, in March, 1822, the marquess being in Ireland at his house at Clonyn, directed Bennett, his servant, to enquire where one Mary Brenan, who was a [9] common prostitute, resided, and sent a message by him and an offer of money if she would come to him at Clonyn House; that she accordingly came on the next day, being Sunday, 31st of March, and was privately admitted by him, and went again, and was admitted in like manner several times, during the following week; that she staid with him alone for a considerable time, and that they then committed adultery.

These are the only specific charges of adultery which have been insisted on. The witnesses produced on the first are Mrs. Winsor and Mary Wheaton, her maid servant, Benjamin Wall, and Mary Smith; and on the latter, Edward Bennett and Mary Farley.

The account which Mrs. Winsor gives is, "That the Marquess of Westmeath took her lodgings from the 22d of February till the 22d of March, 1821; that his uncle, Mr. Jeffries, occupied one of the bed rooms, which he changed for the back drawing room when Lady Rosa came; that Lady Rosa, being a child of seven years of age, was brought by her governess every morning to see the marquis; that one morning, after he had been there about ten days, he detained Lady Rosa, and the governess went away without her, though with great reluctance; that on the same day the marquess came into the kitchen, and desired her to go into Piccadilly to get some raspberry jam for Lady Rosa; that deponent wished to send the servant, but he desired particularly that she would go herself; that during the time of her absence, which was not more than a quarter of an hour, a woman (Jane Smyth) was introduced into the house, who was afterwards employed in waiting on Lady Rosa."

[10] The witness seems to consider the manner of this woman's coming into the house as a feint practised upon her; but her language is not very accurate. She says only "it must have been, she has no doubt, in her absence that the female came into the house." She did not see her on the first evening, and she did not come down stairs for two or three days. The servant, Mary Wheaton, says "Jane Smyth came in the evening." However that fact may be is not very important, as the Court cannot consider that circumstance as furnishing any inference as to the purpose for which Jane Smyth was brought into the house. It is certain that the primary object must have been to attend Lady Rosa, and there could be no surprise on the part of Mrs. Winsor in this respect, as when the governess went away she must have expected some female would come to attend her. There seems to have been no motive for any artifice, and there is no appearance of any such effect being produced on Mrs. Winsor; for she seems to have provided for her as one of the family, without requiring any explanation respecting her; and Carbery says she ordered him to carry her boxes up stairs without expressing any surprise or dissatisfaction to him. The account which Mrs. Winsor gives of the adultery is, "That she observed no indecent familiarities, but that the marquess and this woman behaved to each other in terms of great freedom: she never called him 'lord;' she paid no respect to him as her superior, though she was a very common woman, and not fit to be about Lady Rosa; his lordship was just as familiar with her, and spoke to her with unbecoming freedom and familiarity: it was not the courtesy of a superior to an inferior, but the freedom and [11] familiarity of an equal." She says, "Jane Smyth came to her room very late sometimes; as late as two or three o'clock; and that on one night, happening about a night or two before Lady Rosa went away (which must have been about the 16th of March), between the hours of one and two, as she was going up stairs to bed, quietly, because it was late, as she passed the door of the marquess, she heard the voices of the marquess and Jane Smyth, in his lordship's bed room; they appeared to be talking and laughing in a very familiar way. She stopped a moment or two and listened, to be sure that she heard them, and to be sure of the voices; she did not pay attention to them in order to hear what they said, and she does not remember that she did hear so distinctly as to have understood what they, or either of them, said. She staid but a very short time, a few moments, and all that she can depose is that, from the sound of their voices, she did distinguish the said marquess and Jane Smyth were talking and laughing familiarly together in his lordship's bed room. She could not judge from what she heard whether they were in bed or not: she did not hear the said Jane Smyth come to her room all that night, and knows not whether she went to her own bed or not: she did not watch or listen for her, but being fatigued she went to sleep. Till that night, though she had often thought their conduct improper, and unbecoming in their manner of speaking to each other, it never crossed her mind that any thing of a criminal nature passed between them. Jane Smyth had some dresses that she was making up, and she thought she might sit up and work [12] at them in Lady Rosa's room: but after what she heard, as before deposed, she thought differently, and her belief was, from all she has deposed, that a criminal and adulterous intercourse was carried on between them, and it was in furtherance of it that she was in his lordship's room that night." She says on the interrogatories

"that Lady Rosa's room was adjoining to the marquess'; that they were small rooms with very thin deal partitions; that the door was usually open; that Lady Rosa went to bed about eight o'clock; that the marquess retired to his bed room about that time, after tea; that he dined at home every day, and spent every evening at home." She gives an account of the position of her own room and Jane Smyth's, from which it appears they were not adjoining rooms; but that there was a small intermediate room in which her servant slept. She says "that she will not swear that she ever saw any indecent familiarities pass between them; that Jane Smyth came to bed at a late hour almost every night; that she cannot depose that she knew from what room she came—whether the marquess' or Lady Rosa's; that on the particular night to which she has deposed she did not watch whether Jane Smyth would go to her own room." This is the whole of her evidence. Her maid servant, Mary Wheaton, is examined only to the 2nd, 3d, and 4th articles of the allegation; neither of which point in any manner to any fact of adultery, and therefore her evidence adds little to the account given by Mrs. Winsor. She speaks only to a woman named Jane Smyth, coming to wait on Lady Rosa, in the manner described. On the 3d, 16th, and 17th interrogatories she says "she never [13] saw them alone together, or knew of any thing improper, nor ever saw any indecent familiarities between them: she does not know that Jane Smyth ever staid in Lord Westmeath's bed room till two or three o'clock in the morning."

On the effect of this evidence it is impossible to say that it amounts to the proof that is usually required to support the charge of adultery. There is no act spoken to which indicates any thing like passion or personal attachment. The woman is described as a very common person, not fit to be about Lady Rosa, and as not possessing any particular personal attractions. The purpose for which she came into the house was avowedly of another kind. The governess continued to come to the house, backwards and forwards repeatedly. No suspicion appears to have been excited in her mind, nor in Mrs. Winsor's, till the night shortly before Lady Rosa and the marquess went away, and on her going away Jane Smyth was discharged.

The whole effect of this evidence resolves itself into the description which Mrs. Winsor gives of the "talking and laughing" which she heard on the night described as she was going to bed. That in itself is scarcely more than what may be supposed to have passed, according to the account of the familiarity subsisting between his lordship and this woman, in the many hours that she was attending Lady Rosa in the adjoining room; and though I cannot disbelieve the fact altogether, nor explain it satisfactorily, so as to reflect any credit on his lordship's prudence or sense of propriety; it furnishes scarcely any inference of an act of adultery at that time committed; it points rather to a habit of intimacy than to any thing [14] specific occurring at that time. As to habitual criminal intimacy, the inference is contradicted by the train of thinking which Mrs. Winsor describes herself to have entertained respecting them; and when I consider the manner in which Mrs. Winsor acted, in not making any communication to her servant; in not pursuing her suspicion, even to the indulgence of the most ordinary curiosity; that she made no complaint to the marquess, but has acted so as to exclude all confirmation or test of the accuracy of her suspicions, it would be too much for me to adopt her conclusions as legitimate proof of an act of adultery. I cannot attribute any such effect to it.

But it is said that it is not on one intimacy subsisting between them that the inference of adultery is founded; that Smyth continued to be in his service till April or May, 1822, and visited him at the different lodgings which he occupied. The only other witnesses who speak to any connexion between the marquess and Jane Smyth are Mary Smyth, the mistress of the house in Woodstock Street, at which the marquess lodged for about ten days, from the 27th of April, 1821, and Benjamin Wall with whom he lodged in Bury Street, from the 20th of April to the 18th of May, 1822, and Carbery, Lord Westmeath's servant, who is examined on Lord Westmeath's defensive allegation.

Mary Smyth says, "That Mr. Jeffries had been lodging with her for a fortnight or three weeks before, and continued there some months after the marquess went away, and had been before a customer of her husband's." She says that "Jane Smyth's mother washed for Mr. Jeffries; that Jane Smyth came to the house sometimes for [15] the linen for her mother, and at other times, when the deponent did not know why she came. She came quite as often when Mr. Jeffries only lodged there as when Lord Westmeath was there. She does not know that she ever came to see Lord Westmeath; that she always asked for Mr. Jeffries. That she never saw her with Lord Westmeath, and she cannot depose that she ever was alone with Lord Westmeath, or was ever in his apartments." She says on the second interrogatory, "That she told Lady Westmeath in answer to her enquiries what she has now deposed, and that she thought Jane Smyth came more to Mr. Jeffries than to the marquess." This evidence is the more important, as it negatives the habitual intimacy which is supposed to have existed between the marquess and Jane Smyth, as it applies to a period of time shortly after the act described by Mrs. Winsor; and it is perhaps not entirely immaterial to observe that it was after the commencement of these proceedings when Lord Westmeath must have been apprized that it behoved him to be most particularly cautious with respect to his own conduct.

Benjamin Wall says, "That Lord Westmeath lived in his lodgings from the 20th of April to the 10th of May, 1822; that on one day, being either the next day or the day but one before he left his lodgings, Lord Westmeath, on coming in about noon, said, 'When my maid servant comes, shew her up stairs.' That in about five minutes a female, whom he had never seen before, came and asked if Lord Westmeath was come in; he directed her to the second floor: she went up stairs, and in about an hour afterwards she went out alone. She was about [16] twenty-three; he has never seen her since, and was not up stairs whilst she was there; he does not know that she went into his bed room; he does not know a female of the name of Jane Smyth; he does not know that any female called on his lordship more than once."

There is nothing in this evidence that applies particularly to Jane Smyth; and it is much too slight to support any suspicion of adultery committed at that time. Carbery admits that Jane Smyth called on Lord Westmeath at Mr. Smith's lodgings, but he does not know that she called at Mr. Wall's occasionally or ever; and I see nothing that identifies Jane Smyth as the person calling on him on that occasion. It is said that he admits there were opportunities on which they might have committed adultery, but he denies strongly all knowledge or belief of the fact; and therefore he cannot be said to assist the evidence which has been relied on in proof of this charge.

With respect to the adultery pleaded to have been committed with Mary Brenan, the witnesses are Bennett, the servant, Mrs. Farley, and her husband; but the last witness' deposition has not been referred to, as he is one of the persons convicted in Ireland of a conspiracy with respect to the charge of adultery with Anne Connell. Of the two former it may be sufficient to say that they do not speak to any act or behaviour approximating to proof of adultery; but I think it is due to the marquess that the amount of the evidence on this charge should be more particularly stated.

Bennett says, "That he had lived many years in the service of Lord Westmeath; that in the end of March or beginning of April, 1822, the marquess asked him if he knew a girl of the name [17] of Mary Brenan who had lived with the widow Wren, and had a child by her son; that he desired him to go and tell her to come to him, and he would give her a guinea, and if any body asked where he was going he was to say he was going to see if there were any wild fowl on the lochs. That he went, and thinking that he knew what his lordship wanted he gave her an idea of the business, and she refused to go, and would by no means go with him." This does not very well agree with the description of this woman as a common prostitute. "He then returned and told Lord Westmeath, who seemed disappointed, and asked 'how he could get her to Clonyn.' He replied 'that if he sent her word that he wanted to see her about Wren, and that he would make him marry her, she would be likely to come.' That he did so, and she agreed to come the next morning at 10 o'clock. The deponent did not see her then: he met her between 11 and 12 o'clock going away to mass; he saw her at Clonyn the next day, on Monday, and Wren was with her; Lord Westmeath told him afterwards 'that the girl had been crying to him to make Wren marry her; but I can't make him, or I can't do it for her.' Excepting what he has deposed, he does not know that they were ever together. He cannot depose that he believes the marquess did commit adultery with Mary Brenan. He does not know that she is a common prostitute; she had a child by Wren, being a single woman, but he knows nothing more against her than that."

This is the substance of his deposition. In his answer to the fifty-third interrogatory he says, "That he did not tell Mary Brenan that Lord [18] Westmeath would give her a guinea, though his lordship had told him to tell her so. That offer was not made, though Lord Westmeath had authorized him to make it." What he means by giving her an idea of "the business" on which Lord Westmeath wanted her, as he had said before without mentioning this chief inducement, is not very intelligible; and I think it is very probable that what he has said about "that business," as he calls it, is entirely an invention of his own. The facts that are stated respecting her going to Clonyn shew clearly that she had another object in going there, and do not in any manner support that part of this man's evidence.

Mary Farley says, "She never saw Mary Brenan before the Sunday: all that she saw then was that she was in the yard at ten o'clock: how long she was there, or what she came for, or whether she was in the house, or in company with the marquess, she cannot say. She saw her there again on the Monday about ten o'clock with a young man of the name of Wren, and also Wren's uncle: they were there about half an hour; neither of them went into the house. She watched them on that day, but not on the Sunday. She only just saw Mary Brenan enter the yard, and that was all; she does not know that she was a common prostitute. She never heard that of her."

Carbery and Michael Beatty, who have been examined on the defensive allegation of Lord Westmeath, admit that Mary Brenan came to Clonyn on the Sunday morning; but Beatty swears "that he heard Lord Westmeath ask her what she wanted: she seemed to be telling her story, and he heard Lord Westmeath tell her he [19] could give her no summons then, and he desired her to send Wren to him the next day." He says "she was then but a few minutes talking, and, as he believes, in the passage all the time." Wren also speaks to the fact of going on the Monday or Tuesday with his uncle and Mary Brenan in consequence of her complaint to the marquess, and in obedience to his lordship's orders or summons. The complaint, therefore, must have been made on the Sunday morning, when Beatty says the orders were given to attend the next day.

It is clear from all the evidence on this part of the case that the marquess had an honourable and meritorious object in his mind, as one reason for sending for Mary Brenan. As for any purpose of criminal gratification there is no evidence but what rests on the inconsistent account given by Bennett. This man, though in the confidence of his lordship, according to the first part of his evidence, does not pretend that Lord Westmeath told him that any thing of that kind had actually passed, though he speaks to a declaration "that he could not effect his object of inducing Wren to marry her."

Nothing which has been said by these witnesses, or by any other, supports the representation of gross or habitual profligacy against Lord Westmeath which is the colour and complexion of the charges in the allegation. The description of Mary Brenan as a common prostitute is completely negatived. She had been confined not long before this transaction is supposed to have taken place; as Patrick Farley says, "It was at the end of 1821 or beginning of 1822 that she left the place to lay in, for she was far advanced in pregnancy." She is anxious to be made an [20] honest woman, as it is called, by marrying Wren. Lord Westmeath was also solicitous to effect that union; yet he is represented to have been basely adding to her injuries, and heaping disgrace on the man whom he was endeavouring to persuade to do an honourable act by making all the amends in his power to an injured woman; and this on the very eve of his departure for England on the Wednesday following. I think this imputation on Lord Westmeath is not in any manner credible.

It may be proper to advert also to what is the account which is given by Patrick Farley, who, as I have said, has been convicted of a conspiracy on another charge. He says, "He was steward to Lord Westmeath; that on the 30th of March, having occasion to find fault with Bennett for neglecting his work, Bennett mentioned to him the message which he had carried from the marquess to Mary Brenan: at first he could not believe it, but he repeated his statement, and added she was to come to-morrow at 10 o'clock. That he then determined to watch her himself in the stable opposite his lordship's study window: in a few minutes he saw Mary Brenan coming towards the house across the lawn, his lordship then opened a door leading to the lawn, admitted Mary Brenan and took her into his study; that he then went up to the window about ten minutes after they went in, and saw them on the floor in the act of adultery; that he went away immediately to his business in the yard, and about three-quarters of an hour afterwards he saw his lordship let her out, in the same manner that he had admitted her; that he saw her again at Clonyn on [21] the Tuesday, coming out of the house with young Wren; that Lord Westmeath put on his great coat, came out of the house and followed her very carelessly, but how far he cannot say." This is an account which might agree very well with the gross and habitual profligacy charged in the libel, but I think it does not accord with any view which the Court is warranted to form as to his lordship's conduct, or with the evidence which I have before stated respecting Mary Brenan's habits, her positive rejection of the first offers that were made to her, and the avowed object of her interview with Lord Westmeath. I make this observation, not to reject the testimony of this man because it has not been relied on, but to justify the opinion which I feel myself bound to express, not only that the charge of adultery with Mary Brenan is not proved, but that the whole surmise of such a purpose, so far as it rests on that part of Bennett's evidence which cannot be contradicted except by Lord Westmeath himself—and his answers on the second allegation have not been called for—is not deserving of any credit.

I come now to the charge of cruelty, alleged on behalf of the marchioness, in her first plea, as her justification for not returning to the society of her husband; and in so doing I shall examine the facts as they are to be collected from the evidence, without defining a priori the principles of law to be applied to them. I have prescribed this rule to myself, in order that I may avoid the danger of appearing to bend my view of the evidence in the slightest degree to any standard of principle so assumed.

I have been under the necessity of abstracting [22] the evidence for the most part from the voluminous bulk of the papers and the disconnected arrangement of the several parts, but I have endeavoured to do it principally in the words of the witnesses, and, if I should appear to be inaccurate in any part, I shall hope to be reminded of it.

The allegation pleads, in substance, "The marriage in 1812, and cohabitation at different places, first in August, 1812, at Black Rock near Dublin, when it is stated the marquess began to treat his wife with great cruelty and harshness; that he frequently quarrelled with her without just cause, and on such occasions behaved to her with great violence, and used the most coarse and insulting language; that in January, 1813, they returned to Hatfield House, where, shortly afterwards, he quarrelled with her and abused her in very opprobrious language in the presence of Sarah Mackenzie, and that in order to conceal the same from her family she desired Sarah Mackenzie not to mention it to any person."

Sarah Mackenzie denies altogether any knowledge or observation of improper behaviour at Black Rock; she says "she neither saw nor heard any thing particular in her presence at Hatfield; but having observed that at the Black Rock the marchioness was dull and apparently unhappy, and also at Hatfield, seeing there was a coolness between them and that Lady Westmeath was unhappy, she took an opportunity of speaking of it to her ladyship and lamenting it; that Lady Westmeath referred it to the behaviour of Lord Westmeath to her, but begged her not to mention it: she gave no reason for saying so, but only desired her not to [23] mention it." No other witness speaks to this period.

The sixth article pleads, "The return to Ireland in May, 1813, to the Earl of Westmeath's house at Clonyn. That, during their residence there and about the end of that year, the marquess took possession of her pin-money, and refused to supply her with money to defray the necessary expences; that he kept her destitute of money for several months together; that when she applied to him for money he flew into a violent passion and behaved to her with the greatest brutality; that he used the most opprobrious language, swore, and called her a damned bitch, and threatened that he would kick her to hell, and beat and kicked her with great violence, so that she was much bruised thereby and suffered great pain."

Sarah Mackenzie is the only witness on this article. She says "she was in the situation of lady's maid and housekeeper." She deposes to a great want of money, and describes in strong terms the privations which the marchioness suffered on that account. But she knows nothing of the marquess' means of supplying her with money; and therefore the Court can draw no inference from that circumstance. It is stated by counsel that their income was something more than £2000 per annum; and there is certainly no appearance of extravagance in the description given of their manner of living. It is suggested that the money was misapplied to other objects; but there is no proof on that point from which the Court will be justified in drawing any particular conclusions.

Sarah Mackenzie goes on to say, "That when [24] Lady Westmeath asked his lordship for money he abused her; he never abused the deponent, but she has heard him abuse Lady Westmeath on such occasions; she has heard him call her 'a damned bitch,' and say that he would 'kick her to hell;' he put himself into the most violent passions; he was more like a madman than a reasonable being; she never saw or knew of any provocation that Lady Westmeath gave him; she wished for a quiet life, and the deponent has known her leave the room to avoid any thing unpleasant when he was inclined to quarrel; Lady Westmeath is a quick-tempered woman, and, when irritated, she would shew it, but she was never inclined to quarrel, and never began by giving any provocation, to the deponent's knowledge. The deponent never saw Lord Westmeath beat or strike Lady Westmeath, but she has seen marks of violence on her, and knows that he did beat her as she will depose." She speaks again of the want of money, and says "that Lady Westmeath was obliged to cut up her own body linen to make some for her child; that he would be kind to her at times, but then his passion got the better of him, and his evil disposition, and he would quarrel with Lady Westmeath as though it was for the sake of it, and he behaved like a brute to her; though she bore so much for him, he did not take common pains to provide her with such comforts as might have been had, and deponent can truly say that her ladyship's life was then only wretchedness. She cannot depose more particularly to words of abuse which she has heard Lord Westmeath use towards his wife, but he would curse and swear at her many times."

[25] I have stated this woman's evidence thus much at length, because it may be necessary to say a word or two as to the credit which is due to her: she has been described as a prejudiced witness; she appears to have been much in the confidence of Lady Westmeath, to have obtained a situation for her husband from Lady Westmeath's influence, and to have been employed in providing for some of the Irish witnesses during their stay in England for several months. There is the less occasion, however, for the Court to be minute in estimating her credit, because the counsel on the other side have admitted that they rely on her only so far as she may be confirmed by Lord Westmeath's letters or other evidence. That certainly is a very fair criterion. It may be fit that I should say, however, on the general character of this person, that I see nothing to impeach her credit: she had been a very old servant in Lord Salisbury's family and had gone to live with Lady Westmeath on her marriage: she appears to have obtained some degree of respect from Lord Westmeath, as there is one instance of a message from her in one of Lady Westmeath's letters that implies at least a favourable acceptance of it on the part of his lordship: but I think the evidence which I have read is liable to some exception on account of the very general terms in which it is expressed.

She describes, so far, no particular incidents, but rather her own conclusions, drawn from an indiscriminate reference to indefinite periods of time. For although the subject of the sixth article is confined to the events of 1813, and particularly the close of that year, it is evident, from what she says of Lady Westmeath cutting up her own linen for her child, that she has gone forward [26] and anticipated many things of which, in her own words, "she is hereafter to depose"—being things that happened after the confinement of Lady Westmeath in May, 1814. None of the witnesses on Lord Westmeath's allegation refer to this period except Dr. Barlow, who was examined as to the state of Lady Westmeath at that time, but on which he has nothing very particular to say. I have looked over the letters of this period, which are the first fourteen; and it is admitted that they contain no complaints; perhaps they go a little further. No. 13, on the 31st September, 1813, contains minute calculations as to domestic expences in the most free and affectionate terms, which are scarcely reconcileable with the supposition of any hardships or injury sustained by Lady Westmeath at that time on account of Lord Westmeath's misapplication of the common funds; for in No. 14, which is of the 3rd November, 1813, she rebukes him for unnecessary anxiety about her health; she says, "My health is as usual, why so ready to accuse me of wishing to torment you?"

It has been said of the letters that they give but a very imperfect view of the state in which the parties lived, as they are selected from favourable periods. That is true, undoubtedly, as to other periods; but it is to be recollected that, in this allegation, the disputes are said to have prevailed in the first year of the marriage, though they have not been proved or insisted on: and for the purpose of contradicting that part of the charge these early letters are not immaterial.

I have now gone through the first eighteen months or two years of this inauspicious marriage; and the statements as to this period must be pro-[27]-nounced to be not supported by any proof. I come next to a more specific act of violence, charged as happening about the time of the marchioness' first confinement—in April or May, 1814. That is described in the argument as the first act of violence. It is pleaded on the seventh article of the allegation that "on a night, happening in the month of April, 1814, the marquess, without any cause or provocation, after they had retired to rest, quarrelled with Lady Westmeath, who was then near to her confinement, that he used violent language towards her, struck her several blows, and kicked her on the side, by which she became extremely ill and suffered great pain; that, being alarmed at her manifest illness, he then called up Sarah Mackenzie to her assistance; that she declared to Mackenzie, in the presence of Lord Westmeath, that her illness was occasioned by his having beaten and kicked her, and he admitted that he had done so."

The account which Sarah Mackenzie gives of this act is nearly in the words of the plea: she says, "She was called up about four o'clock; that on entering Lady Westmeath's chamber she found her in bed, and Lord Westmeath standing in his dressing gown; that she asked Lady Westmeath if she was taken ill? Lady Westmeath said 'that Lord Westmeath had beaten and kicked her, and she was in very great pain.' He said, 'Emily, you provoked me to do it.' Lady Westmeath looked at him but said nothing. She then asked the deponent why she had come, and bid her go to her own room again. Lord Westmeath appeared to be frightened."

This is the whole of her evidence, and there is no confirmation of this account by any other [28] witness. Elizabeth Kernan is examined, on Lord Westmeath's allegation, to contradict it by proving that she knew nothing of it; but it is doubtful whether she was in the house on the particular day. She speaks, however, of the manner in which they lived together during the time that she lived in the family—from the middle of April, 1814, for nine months. She speaks very respectfully of Lady Westmeath, and appears not to depose under any prejudice against her: she says, "She had frequent opportunities of knowing and observing how they lived together; she never saw him behave with violence or unkindness, and that she never saw a happier couple." Mary Macarthy, who was the monthly nurse, and commenced her attendance in May, and Dr. Barlow, the medical attendant on Lady Westmeath in her confinement, speak generally to the same effect. The utmost, therefore, that the evidence on this article can prove, if taken without deduction, is only the admission of some act of unbecoming violence on the part of Lord Westmeath; but it does not shew the circumstances attending it, by which the Court may be enabled to form an accurate judgment of the nature or extent of the injury inflicted.

Amongst the letters are two which were written on the 18th and 19th of April; they are filled with domestic occurrences; and in another letter of the 9th of August in the same year, which has been the subject of observation, there are chidings for too great a solicitude to hear from her; and in it there is the expression, "You know when we are friends I never omit to write." But it would be straining the interpretation of those expressions too much to suppose that they referred [29] to any such causes of disagreement as are described in this article.

The next article describes the use of intemperate language, rather than an act of personal violence during the confinement of Lady Westmeath; he is represented to have abused her for not suckling her own child, asking, "Why the devil she could not?" and to have refused to procure a nurse, and to have threatened at the same time to disinherit Lady Rosa, and settle all his property on his brother. On this article there is no witness examined who was present at the time. Sarah Mackenzie does not speak to it. The nurse and Dr. Barlow strongly contradict that part which relates to the refusal to procure a wet nurse, for two were actually procured, and it appears clearly that previous arrangements had been made for that purpose. If any words were used of the import of those pleaded, they could only have applied to the short time which might pass before the second nurse could be procured to supply the place of the first, who was dismissed as insufficient. There would have been no proof of violence on this charge if it had not been for the recital of it by Lady Westmeath, in the presence of Lord Westmeath, in the interview described in the evidence of Mr. Wood. The silence, or want of denial of the charge at that time, on the part of Lord Westmeath, implies that something had passed, as may be collected also from the manner in which the eighth article is counterpleaded and explained in his responsive allegation. I shall have occasion to read Mr. Wood's deposition on the following charges, and will not stop to advert to it now, as it does not, I think, substantially prove any thing like a malicious or determined [30] purpose to expose Lady Westmeath to inconvenience in any thing that passed relating to the suckling of the child: it relates at most to the indulgence of a pettish and peevish spirit, and of intemperance of speech, of which there are but too frequent indications, and perhaps on both sides, in the history of these parties.

Mr. Wood describes the threat of disinheriting Lady Rosa to have been referred to the time of the confinement; and Lord Westmeath admits that something of that kind passed, which was undoubtedly very harsh and unkind, particularly at that time; but the notion of disinheriting an infant daughter, in favor of a brother, when there was a prospect of a numerous issue of sons and daughters, was an extravagant suggestion, and could only have been a transient threat, uttered without any serious meaning, and I should imagine without effect in occasioning apprehension or anxiety to Lady Westmeath.

I approach, now, to a period which appears to me to present greater difficulties. On the former part of the case, to which I have hitherto adverted, I have expressed my reasons for considering the evidence in support of the several charges to be defective, either in substance or in certainty. But on the facts pleaded to have occurred between the summer of 1814 and December, 1915, inclusive, I am bound to confess that I think the result of the evidence is of a different character. It relates to the matters pleaded in the 9th, 10th, 11th, 12th, and 13th articles of the allegation, and is spoken to by eye witnesses; it is explained, or palliated, rather than contradicted, in the counter allegation; and it is confirmed by the admissions, on the part of Lord Westmeath, in his own letters, and in the expres-[31]-sions which are attributed to him in the deposition of Mr. Wood.

The account given by Sarah Mackenzie of the occurrence pleaded in the 9th article is, "That in July or August, 1814, they went to dine with the Earl of Westmeath in Dublin, intending to go to the play. Lord Westmeath came home early, ordered horses to be at the door the next morning, and the deponent to pack up Lady Westmeath's things. They returned home late, and Lady Westmeath, being informed of what had been done, said that she was not to be spirited out of the town in that manner: the deponent saw something had been amiss. At an early hour the next morning Lord Westmeath came to the door of the adjoining room, called her up, desiring her to go and ask Lady Westmeath to forgive him, as he had often done; but Lady Westmeath had fastened her door, and they stood as long as an hour and a half; he begged her to let him in, and promised that he would not beat her any more; at last she opened the door and he went in. In a little while she heard Lady Westmeath call 'Murder;' she went in, and they were both out of bed, and he was about to strike her, which she prevented. He was swearing and abusing Lady Westmeath, and talking so fast that she could not well know what he said. Lady Westmeath said he had been beating her, which he did not deny. She prevailed on them to go to bed, and left them; and, as she says, the next morning Lord Westmeath himself procured a lotion which was applied to her breasts for several days, as she was much bruised, and they were fearful it would [32] end in a cancer." This fact, as to the procuring the lotion, he himself admits.

The tenth article of Lord Westmeath's allegation states this matter a little differently; but does not substantially contradict it. It alleges "some provocation in the abrupt return of Lady Westmeath from his father's house, before dinner, whilst the company were assembled in the drawing room, to Leinster House, where they were residing; that he followed her in order to prevent a repetition of such conduct: he determined to leave Dublin the next day, and gave the orders for packing up;" as described by Mackenzie, "but soon afterwards countermanded them; that in the evening the marchioness having been informed of such orders became very much exasperated, and for several hours, and until day-light, refused to permit him to come to her chamber; that she used gross and insulting language, and finally, in order to prevent a continuance of such abuse, he placed a pillow over the face of Lady Westmeath, who was then in bed, but he did not attempt to smother her, nor had any intention to injure her, but instantly took it away again." On this statement I have to observe that it does not fill up the whole time to which it refers; and of the two statements I must confess that of Mackenzie appears to be more natural and credible.

Lord Westmeath admits the placing the pillow over the mouth of Lady Westmeath; that she called out, and Mackenzie came into the room; but he denies the striking and the other parts of that charge. There is no witness examined on that part of his explanation which relates to the [33] previous circumstances that led to this dispute, and might be capable of proof. The act of placing a pillow over his wife's mouth, by force, and in such a manner as to make her scream out for assistance, was in my opinion a most violent act; it was a most unfortunate act, to say the least of it, in this respect, that it is almost incapable of being justified by any explanation whatever, coming only from the party himself. A further test of the truth of the evidence of this act will be found, I think, also in what is admitted by the marquess as to procuring the lotion, and the reference to it at the meeting described by Mr. Wood.

The eleventh article pleads a disturbance of a similar kind, occurring in October or November, 1814, in the middle of the night, at a visit at the Duke of Leinster's seat; but on this charge the evidence of Sarah Mackenzie is not so distinct: she does not specify the time further than as being between August, 1814, and the journey to France in December, 1815; she says only "that she was awakened by Lady Westmeath running into her room, followed by Lord Westmeath: she was flying from him, and he was endeavouring to induce her to go back, saying the servants would hear them, but he did not otherwise make any promise of good conduct in future, nor did he express any sorrow for what he had done. Lady Westmeath appeared very much frightened, but she does not know that she was hurt. They returned to their room:" and she speaks to the confusion in which she found it—"the water had been emptied into the fire: the bed was in confusion, and the clothes." There is no appearance of exaggeration in this account, as it does not go quite so far as the facts [34] pleaded. It closes the evidence of this woman, and I think in a manner not unfavourable to her general credit. What she says afterwards about Lady Westmeath's health, in attributing it to the ill usages she received, is less material, as the fact is admitted in the adverse plea that she was in a low and nervous state of health, though not owing to such a cause; and if there is any truth in the conclusions which I have drawn from the facts of the case, it is impossible that they should have occurred without producing some effect on her spirits and, as may be presumed, also on her health.

I come now to read the deposition of Mr. Wood, against whom strong exceptions have been taken with respect to his credit, on account of the enmity which he is represented to bear to Lord Westmeath. He appears to have been formerly a friend of the family, and to have been so treated; but it is said that Lord Westmeath has been in confinement, in the King's Bench, at his suit, since 1819. That cannot have proceeded solely from malice on his part; nor do I see reason to suppose that a gentleman of respectability, as he appears to have been, would so far forget the obligations of his oath, or his honour, as to be influenced by any such considerations in the testimony that he may be called upon to give in a Court of Justice. It is said also that he has shewn a disposition unfavourable to Lord Westmeath in the part which he has taken in reading the allegation of Lady Westmeath to his daughter, observing on the parts to which she could speak. I shall certainly be on my guard against placing too much reliance on any witness in a cause of this description; but I see no reason to reject, or substantially to disbelieve, the testimony of this gen-[35]-tleman, or of his daughter; and I will here also dispose of the exception which has been taken to her evidence. It is founded on a conversation with Mr. Giles at a ball, and the circumstance that she did not recollect it when put to her on interrogatory. The substance of it was that Mr. Giles asked her in familiar conversation, and as a friend to Lady Westmeath, what Lady Westmeath was about in resisting Lord Westmeath in his proceedings in Chancery. She replied, "Lady Westmeath had always succeeded in getting what she wanted by bullying him, and she supposed she was doing the same now." She has denied that she used such words, and has sworn she did not know to what conversation the interrogatory could allude. Mr. Giles, in his examination on the exceptive plea, disclaims any imputation on her credit from this denial; as he says from the tone and manner in which the conversation passed it is probable Miss Wood might not recollect it. Both Mr. Wood and his daughter have enjoyed the confidence of Lord Westmeath; and all they know relating to this case has arisen out of that confidence. The manner in which Mr. Giles addressed himself to Miss Wood, in the conversation relating to Lady Westmeath, shews that he did not treat her then as a prejudiced person; and with these observations I will proceed, cautiously, certainly, but not with distrust affecting their general credit, to examine the evidence of Mr. Wood and his daughter.

Mr. Wood speaks to no particular act of cruelty. He says, on the 10th article, "That after the death of Lord Westmeath's father, in the latter end of 1814, they came to Dublin, and the intercourse between them and the depo-[36]-nent's family was then continual. Lady Westmeath was then in a weak and nervous state, and entertained apprehensions of a consumption; she was attended by Dr. Hervey and Dr. Percival, who are since both dead. He says that he witnessed no aggressions, but he was repeatedly solicited by Lord Westmeath to intercede for him with Lady Westmeath; that in September, 1815, he was a fortnight in Dublin, and saw them frequently. On one occasion, at the Waterford Hotel, there was a serious misunderstanding between them. Lady Westmeath was threatening that she would proceed against his lordship for a separation, or rather was making a declaration of the necessity of such a step; that she enumerated various instances of ill-treatment and cruelty, the principal features of which had been acts of violence, which had not been the subject of previous interference on the part of the deponent. That he remembers particularly she complained of his treatment during her confinement, his threat to disinherit Lady Rosa, and his discontent and anger at her for not nursing her child, but she mentioned he had beaten her several times, and particularly at Leinster House; and also upbraided him for not making the settlement on the children, as he had promised to do, on the death of his father. During that time he was walking about the room apparently annoyed by the recital, and striking his head occasionally; but he acknowledged distinctly the truth of what she said: he denied nothing; he did not recriminate or accuse her; he appeared to be sensible of the impropriety of his conduct, and expressed his regret and contrition, and pro-[37]-mised to make amends and that he would never repeat his ill-treatment of her. That on this assurance a reconciliation took place, and he left them reconciled."

This is the substance of his deposition in chief: he speaks to no act of cruelty committed in his presence; but he heard much on the occasion described. Interrogatories are addressed to him, which suggest other causes of disagreement, rather than imply any contradiction of the existence of unhappy differences between the parties; but the witness adheres firmly to the above account, and positively asserts that Lord Westmeath acknowledged that he had been guilty of personal violence to Lady Westmeath by actually beating her. The effect of this however alone is not very precise; it goes principally to confirm the accounts of other witnesses, and supplies a test by which the Court may judge of the real state in which the parties were living, so much at variance with many parts of the correspondence which have been exhibited.

That correspondence has been opposed to the credibility of this account; and the attention of the Court has been particularly called to No. 22 and No. 23, being letters written by Lady Westmeath on the 7th of April and 19th of August, 1815; and it is said that the discussion must have related to the settlement of Lady Rosa rather than to any enumeration of grievances, or to any mention of a separation, and that it is incredible that any thoughts of separation should have been entertained at that time. The allusion to a separation occurs however previously in that letter; and in one before, which is dated on the 3d of April; and therefore that observation is not founded. In the thirteenth article of the marquess' allegation also [38] it is said that the meeting was for the purpose of discussing the propriety of making the settlement on Lady Rosa; that the differences and disputes and disagreements, referred to at the meeting, related to two natural children which the marquess had before marriage, and to no act of unkindness, and it was, on this subject alone, that he expressed his regret that any such disagreements should have arisen. We have the fact however of such a meeting, and of the temper prevailing at it fully established; and the only question is as to the immediate subject of the disagreement. Considering the temper of the parties, it is probable that any disagreement, however originating, would not be confined to one topic: and I collect from Lord Westmeath's answer that the complaint became eventually more general. The sentiments of affection and kindness, which the letters exhibit, are not more at variance with the supposition of disagreements of one kind than of the other. I think, therefore, that this charge is by no means effectually repelled.

The next act of cruelty is that alleged to have been committed at Granvilliers, on the journey to Paris in December, 1815. The thirteenth article of the allegation charges, very summarily, that on that occasion "he abused the marchioness and swore at her in a most outrageous manner, and then struck her a most violent blow with his fist, pushing her at the same time with great force, so that she would have fallen on her head in the fire-place if she had not been caught and prevented by Miss Wood." The witnesses who speak to this fact are Miss Wood and the servant maid, Janet Service, who were the only persons present. They differ a little in circumstances. Miss Wood says "that Lady Westmeath, herself, [39] and the servant, were in the bed-room, and that the door was not opened immediately for five minutes to Lord Westmeath, but that the delay was unavoidable." The servant says "she came up stairs with Lord Westmeath, and the door was opened immediately on his knocking." Miss Wood says the blow was on the upper part of her breast near the shoulder. The servant says it was on the lower part of the back. They both agree that they came late to a bad inn at Granvilliers, and Lady Westmeath complained, in the hearing of Lord Westmeath, though not to him, that it was more like a brothel than an hotel. The expressions used to him were only, "What a place is this that you have brought us to." Miss Wood does not even speak to any conversation, but she says "that Lord Westmeath came into the room with wood for the fire: that her back being turned, she did not see what passed, but heard a blow given by Lord Westmeath, which would have knocked Lady Westmeath down if she had not caught her: that he exclaimed at the same time, 'Go to hell, I wish I had never seen you.'" Service says "the blow was struck in consequence of the question asked by Lady Westmeath —'What place is this that you have brought us to?' It was about the small of the back that he struck her, and the blow seemed for a time to take away her ladyship's breath." No further account is given of what passed afterwards, except that Lady Westmeath retired into the inner room, in which Miss Wood slept, and staid there till five or six o'clock in the morning, when by the persuasion of Miss Wood she returned to her own room, and it appears they went on to Paris the next day.

[40] It is not denied in argument that something of this kind occurred, but no satisfactory explanation is given on the part of Lord Westmeath of what actually passed. From the different accounts given of the part of the body on which the blow was struck, by Miss Wood and Service, I may infer that it was not so violent as to occasion bruises, or leave any visible marks; but I think I am bound to conclude from the evidence that violence was used on that occasion, and that a blow was given, either with the fist, or with the open hand, as seems to be suggested, which was unjustifiable. Miss Wood and Service say they did not witness any other act of violence, nor any other instance of gross or abusive language in France, though they describe the general temper of Lord Westmeath to be very irritating and blameable in their opinion. They attribute the illness of Lady Westmeath at Paris to the effect of this conduct. In this, however, I think they betray a little of the exaggeration which usually accompanies the testimony of partial witnesses: for they admit particular instances of great attention and kindness in the behaviour of Lord Westmeath to his wife during her illness, and witnesses examined, on the part of Lord Westmeath, as to the manner in which they lived in Paris, describe Lady Westmeath to have been much in society, and in general good health and spirits, taking the diversion of hunting, and partaking of all other amusements.

On this review of the evidence respecting the scene at Granvilliers I should be glad enough to make any deduction in the evidence of the two witnesses, on the score of partiality, if I knew where I was to stop; but being furnished with no [41] explanation that appears to me more satisfactory than the account given by these witnesses, I think I am not warranted entirely to disbelieve them. Lord Westmeath himself admits, in one of his letters, occasional intemperance of speech on other occasions, and particularly that he had threatened "to turn Lady Westmeath out of doors." The same threat is complained of by her in her letter marked thirty, though I do not perceive that in that letter she adverts to his behaviour at Granvilliers. The expression is not, therefore, so incredible or irreconcileable to the habits of Lord Westmeath as I might have expected. On the whole of the evidence applicable to this part of the case, I do not feel myself at liberty to disbelieve the account given by Lady Westmeath's witnesses, and if that is believed, there can be but one opinion of the impropriety, and, I think, of the legal character of the act of violence described to have been committed on this occasion.

They stayed about nine months in Paris, and afterwards went to Spa, and returned to Ireland about the end of 1816. Nothing particular occurred during that period. The fourteenth article charges "violent conduct and gross and opprobrious language on an occasion happening in December of that year, when they were proceeding to embark for England." Janet Service is the only witness examined on it. She says "they came down in the carriage to embark; Lord Westmeath being on the box: he was for going back as it was too rough: Lady Westmeath said it would be better to enquire if there was any danger; he would not attend to her, but put himself in a great passion, and ordered the coachman to [42] drive back. Lady Westmeath said, 'Will you just hear me for a moment—only just hear me,' on which he became quite furious, and ordered the footman, who was down waiting at the door, to get up again, and pay no attention to her, saying 'he was master and would be obeyed.' He was much vexed, and seemed as if he would have struck her, or pushed her down in the carriage; deponent was alarmed for the child and cried out. Lady Westmeath sat down, and the carriage drove back to Dublin." On this statement, which has the appearance of being rather inflamed, it was an accidental occurrence growing out of his anxiety for their safety, according to the judgment which he had a right to form of the danger of embarking at that time. There was no actual violence, nor any threat or opprobrious language which the witness is able to describe. The witness says "it was bad enough at other times, when the witness only was present, but she thought it much worse on this occasion, because the men-servants were witnesses to it, and it was insulting and degrading Lady Westmeath before them." Her comments on this occurrence bear the appearance of being overcharged; and however much the description may keep up the colouring as to the hasty and intemperate habits and manners of Lord Westmeath, it states no acts of personal violence, and adds very little to charges of actual cruelty.

I now come to a part of the case which is rather of a novèl kind. The fifteenth and following articles relate to a series of negociations, and acts done, in effecting a voluntary separation between these parties, which exhibit rather an extraordi-[43]-nary specimen of matrimonial law. There is a continual charge of frequent quarrelling and abusive language, but the specific acts that are pleaded are very few, and of those some are not proved. They plead "that in consequence of the aforesaid ill treatment, Lady Westmeath in the summer of 1817 again declared her intention of applying to the laws of her country for protection, but agreed to abandon such intention on his proposing to execute a deed of separation; and instructions for such an instrument were accordingly given to Mr. Sheldon; that in October in that year Lord Westmeath, being in Ireland, expressed his contrition for the cruelty of his aforesaid conduct towards her, in sundry letters" that are exhibited: "that Lady Westmeath being moved by such letters expressed a disposition to forgive him, and he promised to execute a deed to provide against any recurrence of his ill-treatment." A deed was accordingly executed in December, 1817, for a separate maintenance, and which is also exhibited. "That they thereon lived and cohabited together: that about Easter, 1818, he renewed his ill-treatment; she complained to her friends, and implored their interference that legal measures might be adopted on her behalf to obtain a separation: that a meeting took place between Mr. Sheldon, Mr. Stephens and Mr. Wood. The draft of articles of separation was prepared in May, 1818; it was delivered to a stationer to copy; Lord Westmeath obtained possession of, and destroyed, it." The conduct of Lord Westmeath in attempting to destroy that agreement has been the subject of strong and severe animadversion in the argument; but that is not [44] strictly a point in the case which I have to determine, and therefore I shall not advert to it further than as it is an incident in the general history of the parties. It has not been the practice of the Ecclesiastical Courts to consider such agreements as affecting in any way the legal relation of the parties; (a) and, therefore, a breach of such an

(a) In Smith v. Smith (Consistory, 1781), in a suit by the husband for restitution of conjugal rights, the wife pleaded articles of separation with a clause that the husband should not proceed in the Ecclesiastical Court. This plea however was overruled, and the Court (Dr. Wynne) observed "that it believed it was the first time the question had come directly before it, and was surprised that it should be brought forward." That case was cited by the same learned Judge in Fletcher v. Fletcher (Consistory, 1786), where, on a suit for restitution by the husband, the same point was raised, and decided engagement can hardly enter into the strict and accurate examination which I am bound to take of the evidence, as it may support the charge of cruelty. Another draft, however, was prepared and executed in August following, making a separate provision of £1300 per annum for Lady Westmeath, and containing the usual engagements not to require cohabitation, or to resort to the process of the law for that purpose. During the whole of this time, from the summer of 1817 to August, 1818, no specific act of cruelty is pleaded, except one about Easter, 1818, occurring at Hatfield, in which Lord Westmeath is described "to have seized a poker and to have brandished it over her head, threatening to kill her." But on this charge no witness is produced. Sarah Johnson lived with Lady Westmeath from June, [45] 1817; but she speaks to no specific act at the time. The Marchioness of Salisbury expressly denies that Lady Westmeath made any complaint to her of the violence described in this article.

The letters of Lord Westmeath, which form the introduction to this part of the case, are seven in number, written from Ireland in the months of September and October, 1817. They are written, in a very impressive strain of the deepest and most intense self-humiliation, to an offended and injured woman. They ascribe to Lady Westmeath the character of an affectionate wife, and many excellent qualities, and, in so doing, remove from her much of the blame of this unhappy quarrel. The terms are general, however, in most parts, and for that reason not very distinct in their application: No. 5 acknowledges that he threatened to disinherit Lady Rosa and turn Lady Westmeath herself out of doors; which seems to refer to the acts of violence charged to have been committed in April, 1814, during the confinement of Lady Westmeath, and afterwards acknowledged, in the conference with Mr. Wood, at the Waterford Hotel, as spoken to by that witness. It implores compassion and pardon for the brutality which he had shewn to her in individual instances; and expresses "an earnest anxiety that arrangements might be made to secure her in case of any unfortunate recurrence." These are his own expressions. He adverts to the suspicion entertained of his continued intimacy with the mother of two natural children, which he had had before marriage, and admits that appearances might justify the supposition that it was the cause of [46] such threats. He disavows the fact, however, and it is strongly disclaimed by counsel, and there is nothing before the Court that shews any such intimacy was continued. The tenor of these letters does, I think, very much confirm the account given by Mr. Wood of similar confessions at the meeting at the Waterford Hotel in Dublin in September, 1815. The result of this correspondence, however, leads to a reconciliation which was granted in Lady Westmeath's letter of the 18th October, 1817, and was most gratefully acknowledged in Lord Westmeath's answer of the 26th.

He returns to England and cohabits with Lady Westmeath; and in November, 1818, Lord Delvin was born. In the meantime it appears that Mr. Sheldon was employed in preparing the deed of reconciliation, as it is termed, to which I have before adverted. That instrument recites the marriage settlement by which Lady Westmeath was to have a jointure of £3000 per annum, and that no provision had been made for the issue: it then recites, "That whereas disputes and differences had existed and arisen to such a height that they were on the point of separating and living apart, but by the intervention of friends she had consented to live and cohabit with him after he had executed these deeds, and thereby made provision for their issue." It then covenants that, "in consideration of such consent he settles his estates as is therein described, with a proviso that in case it shall happen that by a renewal of such disputes and differences as had already caused their separation she should find herself compelled to cease to cohabit, she shall [47] receive yearly such sums as by their mutual friends shall be agreed to be a proper and sufficient maintenance, with a further proviso that the payment should be suspended during any subsequent reconciliation, and be resumed on any future separation to take place in consequence of ill-usage and gross abuse." All that is specific is the arrangement for a separate maintenance. The sum of money, and the nature of the ill-usage which is to give effect to it, are left to the arbitration of friends. Lord Westmeath covenants that in any on the authority of the former case. And the principle of those decisions has been acted upon in subsequent cases. See further upon this subject, Roper on the Law of Husband and Wife, vol. 2, c. 22, 2nd edition.

---

separation he will execute the usual articles; and such an instrument was prepared in May, 1818, which contains articles to that effect, and assigns to Lady Westmeath a specific sum of £1300 per annum.

The depositions of Mr. Sheldon and Mr. Stephens relate principally to the execution of these deeds. Mr. Sheldon was the confidential agent of Lord Salisbury and of Lady Westmeath, and was adopted also as a common friend by Lord Westmeath, notwithstanding Mr. Sheldon's request that he would employ some other professional person. He speaks to the acknowledgment on the part of Lord Westmeath, in the summer of 1817, of his own ill-treatment of Lady Westmeath as the cause of the separation which Lord Westmeath had prevailed on Lady Westmeath to abandon, by the most humiliating concessions and promises of amendment. The depositions of these gentlemen, however, relate principally to the execution of the deeds, and to the admissions of the marquess as to past misconduct. They did not see Lord Westmeath use or threaten to use any personal violence to Lady Westmeath; and it is not an insignificant circumstance in [48] this case that Lord and Lady Salisbury have not appeared as the natural protectors of their daughter in these disputes; as it is said, "Lord Salisbury would have nothing to do with them." The present marquess, then Lord Cranborne, was named trustee in the settlement, but without his consent; and he says he was not privy to the arrangements. He speaks, but very generally, as to his knowledge of the conduct of the parties. He says "he was in the habit of going to their house in Bolton Street, and so far as he saw of the conduct of Lord Westmeath during Lady Westmeath's pregnancy in 1818 he did not actually see anything amiss, but he does not mean to depose that there was nothing amiss in it."

The twenty-fifth and twenty-sixth articles relate to the manner in which they lived in separate apartments in Stratford Place. The twenty-ninth pleads an attempt to compel her to give up the deeds, with a declaration that he would force her to give them up, and threats to challenge Mr. Wood, who was a trustee. The thirtieth pleads the last act of violence in his conduct towards Mrs. Wetherly the housekeeper, and towards Lady Westmeath, on the 20th of June, 1819. These latter instances may be classed together, as they constitute the principal or only charge of personal violence in the latter part of the case, as they happened about the same time, and proceeded from the same cause, from an impatience of the state in which he had placed himself, and from a desire to reclaim and assert his marital authority. The account which is given of them by the witnesses, Johnson and Wetherly, is very similar, and there is no reason to question the truth of their [49] evidence. Sarah Johnson says, "She lived as lady's maid with the marchioness from April, 1817 to 1821. She went with her to Hatfield in July, 1817, where they staid seven months. She then removed to Stratford Place, and in January, 1819, to a house in Bolton Street. During the first part of the time Lord Westmeath and the marchioness slept in adjoining rooms, and communicating with each other; and they held intercourse, for Lady Westmeath became pregnant. It was on the 18th of May, 1818, that they separated, and the door of communication was fastened. She says they were continually quarrelling, but of the particulars of any quarrel in Stratford Place she cannot depose, as they spoke principally in French. In Bolton Street Lord Westmeath had a sitting room and a bed room adjoining to that of Lady Westmeath, but the door was secured. There were violent disagreements between them; how they began she cannot depose; he used to threaten that he would assume his rights again and be master, and bring down her little ladyship to her proper level, and shew her to the world in her true character. On one occasion his lordship found his way into her bed room, when she was dressing for an evening party; the deponent was with her; he began in French; he was quite frightful from rage, and stormed and raved like one that was mad; he proceeded afterwards in English. It was against Mr. Wood, her ladyship's trustee, that he was most violent, applying to him all odious appellations; he said he would challenge him, and make him fight in France; Lady Westmeath was much terrified. He continued there as much as half an hour. This was in May, 1819." [50] But it is to be remembered that in April, 1819, Lady Westmeath had sent a message to him by the cook "that she would not dine with him any more." Johnson speaks also in part to what happened in June, 1819; but it will be more convenient to refer first to Mrs. Wetherly, the person principally concerned in that scene.

Mrs. Wetherly says, "She lived as housekeeper to Lady Westmeath in Bolton Street. One day in June his lordship desired her to come into the dining room, which was his sitting room; he asked her what wages were due to her, as he was about to discharge her, having given her warning about six weeks before (as is stated by another witness); he desired to see her books, keys, and accounts. She told him she was her ladyship's servant, and could not give them up; he was in a great passion, and flew out at the deponent; he called up the man servant, and sent him for a constable, and as he had used personal violence to her once before, she did not know but he might do it again; so she made her escape and went to Mr. Wood's house, where Lady Westmeath then was, and told her what had passed, and she did not return to Bolton Street for some days." Miss Weldon, who was the governess in Mr. Wood's family, fills up this account. "She accompanied Lady Westmeath to her own house; they went into the housekeeper's room; it was plain from the state of the presses and drawers that they had been forcibly opened; Lord Westmeath was in a most violent and extraordinary passion, amounting almost to fury; though apparently a good deal exhausted; he was as pale as a sheet of writing paper, his lips quivered, his whole frame [51] shook with rage; Lady Westmeath asked him 'what he had been about;' he replied, 'I have been breaking open your presses, and I will do it again; I will shew you that I will be master in this house.' She said 'she should apply to her trustees.' He said 'he should like to see the trustees that would dare to interfere.' Lady Westmeath left the room, and returned again in about a quarter of an hour, when she and the deponent went away together to Lord Salisbury's house, and Lady Westmeath has not since resided in the same house with Lord Westmeath."

Sarah Johnson describes what passed when Lady Westmeath went up stairs; "Lady Westmeath called to her, and she attended her in her bed room: Lord Westmeath was then with her: Lady Westmeath said, 'I desire, Lord Westmeath, you will leave my room:' he said 'he would not; he would come into her room when he pleased; that he would have no more of their separate doings; that he would be master of his house, and would have no more interference of that family in his concerns.' He went down accordingly; Lady Westmeath took away some papers, and went to Arlington Street, and has not since cohabited with him." This account of Lord Westmeath's determination to enforce his marital authority is confirmed by Mr. Stephens, who says "that when he was in England in March and April, 1819, Lord Westmeath was living in Bolton Street in separate apartments; that he complained of it to him as a grievance; and expressed his intention to enforce his marital rights, as he understood, by proceedings at law." These are the only specific charges of [52] cruelty spoken to by any witnesses after the reconciliation. On the other side, Lady Salisbury and Lady Glengall, Lord Francis Hill, and the Rev. Doctor Wellesley, who frequently visited the parties at their residences in 1817, 1818, 1819, strongly negative the imputation of any acts of violence, according to their knowledge or belief.

On this review of the general conduct of Lord Westmeath, I am constrained to say that there appears to me to be much in the evidence relating to his conduct in the years 1814 and 1815 which borders closely on legal cruelty, according to the strictest definitions which have been given of it. And I think the acts of personal violence then inflicted might have sustained a suit for divorce on that ground, if they had then been made the subject of legal complaint. But it must always be remembered that a natural test of injuries of this kind is the sense in which they are received: if they are not resented as injuries at the time, a state of things intervenes which either detracts from the weight of particular evidence, when brought forward at a subsequent period, or may introduce quite another view of the relative situation of the parties. Reconciliation will supersede the ground of complaint in these courts, as it annihilates even special articles of separation at common law.(a) It is true, however, that past injuries may be revived; and the real question appears to be whether the acts, proved against Lord Westmeath in the latter parts of this history, will have that effect.

Mr. Wood says "there was a reconciliation in [53] 1816." The letters that passed in the autumn of 1817 establish the same fact: and the events which followed in 1817, 1818, 1819, do not furnish any instance of personal injury, or amount, in my opinion, to more than disagreements of mutual ill-temper and ill words. What will be the result of such a state of facts? The law was explained in the case of D'Aguilar v. D'Aguilar, by my learned predecessor, to this effect; "That though condonation might be taken away by subsequent facts, they must not be slender facts, but such as would be sufficient to found a sentence." (a) In a late case of Durant v. Durant (vol. i. 763), the present very learned Dean of the Arches, adverting to that dictum in D'Aguilar, qualified those expressions as too large, by referring to what occurred in the final judgment: but, from what fell from the Dean of the Arches on that occasion, I infer that the facts, though slighter than might be required to found or support a sentence of divorce alone, must be such as partake of the nature of legal cruelty, being such in character and effect as might justly revive the fear of injury attributed to the original acts.

(a) See Roper on Husband and Wife, vol. 2, c. 22, 2nd edit.

The whole question will turn, then, on the application of the principle so explained to the circumstances of this case; and I sincerely lament that it has fallen on me to draw the very nice and delicate distinctions on which such a question may depend. Then what has been the reconciliation? and what the revival in this case? Mr. Wood says "the [54] conference at the Waterford Hotel ended in a reconciliation:" and whatever might have been the effect of the violence committed at Granvilliers, cohabitation followed uninterrupted during the two following years. In the Christmas of 1816 there is this remarkable declaration of Lady Westmeath to her father, "That Lord Westmeath had been so uniformly kind to her that she could not bear to see him unhappy." This was said indeed on the occasion of a request to obtain a loan of money for their common use; and the immediate object of the declaration may a little detract from its sincerity; but it shews the placable state of Lady Westmeath's feelings as to the past, and proves that present grievances were not intolerable. The renewal of complaints on her part, in 1817, as appearing in her letters, was founded principally on the subject of the natural children, and the demand of a settlement. The settlement is conceded in December, 1817, and the parties live together: Lady Westmeath becomes pregnant, and is delivered of a son in 1818: they visit together at Hatfield in January, 1819: Lady Westmeath declares to Lady Salisbury "that they are well together:" they live in the same house and at the same table till April, 1819, when Lady Westmeath sent a message by the cook "that she would not dine with him any more."

In May, 1819, the scene occurs which is pleaded as an attempt to make her give up her deeds, and is described by Sarah Johnson. It is confined to a dispute of words, originating in a resolution on the part of Lord Westmeath, whether prudently or imprudently acted upon I will not say, to reclaim his marital authority. The last disagreement was of the same [55] kind. Lord Westmeath asserts his authority over Mrs. Wetherly, and discharges her. The breaking open of drawers and presses in the housekeeper's room was a violent and unseemly act, but it was directed principally against the housekeeper, who resisted and denied his authority; and the scene which ensues with Lady Westmeath was incidentally occasioned by her coming in, and exhibits little more than passionate words and ill-manners.

The counsel have represented these acts as a breach of the deed, and as cancelling the reconciliation, and reviving the former complaint, even if the particular acts done should not be deemed sufficient to constitute an original case: but I do not feel myself warranted to adopt that construction. The test of legal cruelty, on which the judgment of this Court must be founded, is of a severer kind. If the husband could with safety be admitted to daily intercourse, in a state of subordination and subjection, there must have been an absence of any apprehension of danger to life, limb, or health, the ordinary criteria of legal cruelty in these Courts; and the breach of that subjection alone, without cause of reasonable apprehension of personal danger, though accompanied with rudeness and ill-manners, will not in my judgment constitute a case of cruelty, or revive former injuries. Whether such conduct was a breach of the articles of separation, I will not venture to determine. However improper it might be, it was not an injury of a personal nature: it was not only an injury infinitely slighter than the original acts of cruelty, but not of the same character, nor threatening the same consequences.

(a) D'Aguilar v. D'Aguilar, 1 Hagg. Con. 134, notis. But, for the substance of the libel, and of Lord Stowell's observations upon its averments, together with his final judgment in that case, see vol. i. 773, et seq.

In the case of Beevor v. Beevor, Arches, 1803, Sir William Wynne said, "The Court would [56] hesitate a long time before it would go a step further than it had hitherto gone to decree a separation on mere suggestion of violence, of temper, and ill words. A reference was made on that occasion to the case of Salisbury and Salisbury, in the Arches in 1721, in which Dr. Bettesworth held that a libel might be admitted without blows; but the cruelty there pleaded, of constant threats and abuse, was not deemed sufficient to authorize a separation, or operate as a bar to a suit of restitution of conjugal rights, which was the nature of those proceedings. The principles laid down by Lord Stowell are to the same effect. In the case of Evans and Evans that eminent Judge thus explains them—"That mere austerity of temper, petulance of manners rudeness of language, want of civil attention and accommodation, even occasional sallies of passion, if they do not threaten bodily harm, do not amount to legal cruelty. They are high moral offences in the marriage state; but still they are not that cruelty against which the law can relieve." And again, after stating what is not legal cruelty: "These are negative descriptions of cruelty: they shew what is not cruelty, and are perhaps the safest definitions than can be given, in the variety of possible cases that may come before the Court. I take it that the rule usually referred to in our books of practice is a good general outline of the canon law, the law of this country on this subject: the danger of life, limb, or health is usually inserted as the ground on which this Court has proceeded to separation. The Court has never been driven off this ground" (1 Hagg. Con. p. 38, 39). And on an attentive comparison of all the cases that have been alluded to [57] I think I may affirm that the Ecclesiastical Courts have, hitherto, been uniformly strict in requiring proof of actual injury, or of real apprehension of injury, as it may affect the safety or health of the person, to justify divorce on the ground of cruelty.

Looking then to the obligations of marriage, and of nuptial cohabitation, so strongly upheld by the ecclesiastical law; looking to the great interests that are connected with it in the institutions of this country; and reflecting on the importance of adhering strictly to the principles which have heretofore been held in these Courts on this subject, and which are incidentally made the test of civil rights in the construction of the courts of common law and of equity, I do not feel that I can conscientiously pronounce a sentence of divorce in this case.

Foreseeing the possibility of such a result, I was desirous that the parties might reflect on the situation in which they and the Court might be placed. I intimated a wish also that it might be considered in argument whether any state of facts, short of legal cruelty, would warrant the Court to hold its hand, and dismiss a suit of this kind, without a positive decision on the point put in issue between the parties. The counsel on both sides have concurred in thinking that there is no middle course; and there would undoubtedly be great difficulties in the way of such a distinction, under the very strict rules which this Court has always applied to uphold the sacred obligations of marriage.

In the case of Sir George and Lady Warren, in 1771, and in the case of Evans v. Evans, in 1790, which were cases of great animosity and [58] strong recrimination, the Court adhered simply to the line of its duty in pronouncing on the insufficiency of the charge of cruelty, leaving the law to take its course. In the former case, restitution was actually enforced by the authority of this Court. In the latter, divorce being refused, the disagreements probably subsided in terms of private separation, which had been before proposed. But the Court was no party to such a compromise: it did not disown the feeling of disinclination to incur the risk of provoking further disagreements between the parties; but it vindicated, in strong and forcible language, the necessity of upholding the general policy of the law in opposition to such feelings, and in disregard of an over anxious solicitude for the effect on the particular case.

A dictum of Lord Stowell, however, has been cited, in which that eminent person is represented to have said "that it had not been decided in these courts that there must be legal sævitia to bar a suit of restitution, or that something short of legal cruelty might not have that effect" (Gregg v. Gregg, Consistory, Trinity Term, 1821). That observation was thrown out, on the admission of the wife's defensive allegation, to a suit for restitution, and with reference, I think, more especially to a particular article, which pleaded threats and menaces to compel the wife to part with her property. In my note of that case the learned Judge observed, "I have not said there might not be cases so near to sævitia as to warrant the Court to forbear, but I lay down no proposition on that point at present." The case did not come before Lord Stowell again, and [59] nothing, as I understand, occurred to raise that point at the final hearing. The inference to be drawn from the words of Lord Stowell, therefore, are rather adverse to such a distinction; if it is considered that, in the long and accurate experience of that learned person, who presided in this Court for more than thirty years, his memory did not furnish him with any authority for a more explicit declaration on this important point. Without saying that such a distinction may not be justified, under very strong circumstances, and in the wisdom of a superior Court, I feel myself compelled, in the conscientious discharge of my duty, to adhere to the principles on which this Court has hitherto acted; and to declare that in my judgment the evidence in this case does not warrant me to assume such a discretion.(a)

Great, therefore, as the responsibility may be, [60] as I am reminded, in pronouncing that this lady is bound to return to the society of her lord, it is a responsibility which the law imposes upon me, and I must support it. The same law lays on her the obligation of complying with its injunctions; and I close this painful discussion with the consolation of thinking that she will have ample means of correcting my judgment by appeal, if it is wrong; or that it will rest with herself to reconcile it with her own happiness and comfort, if it is right.

The Court pronounced that Lady Westmeath had failed in proof of the allegations given and admitted on her behalf, and assigned her to return home to the Marquess of Westmeath, and restore to him conjugal rights, and decreed a monition against her so to do.

From this sentence an appeal was immediately interposed to the Arches Court of Canterbury. On the first session of Trinity Term, 1826, the inhibition and citation were returned; on the first session of Michaelmas Term the process was brought in; and the cause was argued at the close of Michaelmas Term; and on the third session of Hilary Term, 1827, the Court proceeded to give sentence.

[61] Arches, Hilary Term, 3rd Session, 1827.—In answer to a suit for restitution of conjugal rights the wife (having pleaded cruelty and adultery) proved several acts of personal ill-treatment, violent behaviour and language, from 1813 to 1817; a separation was then agreed upon, but, on a reconciliation, matrimonial cohabitation and intercourse were renewed. The Court, on appeal—holding that adultery was not proved; that cruelty up to 1817 was proved, and that though afterwards there was no personal violence, his conduct, exciting reasonable apprehension of it, revived the former cruelty—decreed a separation, and condemned the husband in the costs in both Courts, except those incurred by certain charges of adultery.—If legal cruelty be established, a subsequent reconciliation and matrimonial intercourse form a legal bar to a separation for such preceding cruelty. And the question then is whether any subsequent acts take place furnishing fresh grounds of legal complaint, or at least reviving former wrongs, and, in connection with those former wrongs, creating reasonable apprehension of a renewal of ill-treatment.—The force of condonation as a bar varies according to circumstances. The condonation by a husband of a wife's adultery, still more repeated reconciliations after repeated adulteries create a bar of far greater effect than does the condonation by a wife of repeated acts of cruelty.

(a) On this general question the "Reformatio Legum" remarks: "Si rixæ, contentiones, injuriæ, concertationes, acerbitates, contumeliæ, luxus, pravitates multiplicis generis tam vehementer exæstuant, ut in eisdem ædibus conjuges commorari nolunt, nec cætera matrimonii jura sibi mutuô præstare, pœnis implicentur ecclesiasticis, et in easdem ædes compellantur, et etiam revocentur ad pia inter se communicanda matrimonii officia, modo nulli tales casus inciderint propter quos ipso jure divortium petere liceat." De Matrimonio, cap. 11. See also De Adulteriis et Divortiis, cap. 11, 12. The French law appears to have allowed, on account of the husband's ill-treatment, "la separation d'habitation" upon slighter grounds than the Ecclesiastical Courts of this country. Pothier, "Traité du Contrat de Mariage," chap. 3, s. 1, 4th edit., vol. 3, p. 374. And the general principle of the ancient canon law seems to be expressed in these terms: "Si tanta sit viri sævitia, ut mulieri trepidanti non possit sufficiens securitas provideri, non solum non debet ei restitui, sed ab eo potius amoveri." Decret. Greg. lib. 2, tit. 13, c. 13, ad finem.

—Cruelty generally consists of successive acts of ill-treatment, if not of personal injury, so that something of a condonation of the earlier ill-treatment necessarily takes place.—If a wife, after legal cruelty, consents to a reconciliation and to matrimonial cohabitation, former injuries would revive by subsequent misconduct of a slighter nature than would constitute original cruelty, though the reconciliation would be a bar if no further ill-treatment took place.—A deed of separation, upon mutual agreement, on account of unhappy differences, though containing a covenant not to bring a suit for restitution of conjugal rights, is no bar to such a suit.—On the execution of articles of separation, not followed by matrimonial intercourse, the wife's reluctant assent to the husband having a bed-room in her house, at the earnest intreaty of him and of mutual friends, and on his declaring "that he should be merely under the roof by sufferance," is no continuation of a former condonation.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This appeal from the Consistory Court of London was, in the first instance, a suit for restitution of conjugal rights, brought by Lord Westmeath against Lady Westmeath, his wife. In answer to this demand Lady Westmeath pleaded that Lord Westmeath had treated her with cruelty; and she afterwards, in a second allegation, charged Lord Westmeath with adultery committed subsequent to their separation. Lord Westmeath gave in a defensive plea denying both charges. On each side a great number of witnesses, on the whole exceeding fifty, were examined.

The Judge of the Consistory Court pronounced that the wife had failed in proof of both her allegations, and decreed that she should return to matrimonial cohabitation. From that judgment Lady Westmeath has appealed, and I am now to determine whether the sentence ought to be affirmed or reversed.

By the counsel on both sides the case has been characterized as one of a very painful description. It has been very elaborately and, I may truly add, very ably argued here; and it has been stated that it underwent a most ample discussion in the Court below; and that the learned Judge, in delivering his sentence, adverted to all the circumstances alleged in plea, and to the several parts of the evidence on both sides, expressing very fully the precise grounds of his decision. Those grounds were:—

[62] First: That the adultery was not proved.

Second: That the cruelty, in the first instance, was proved, but that its effect was removed by subsequent cohabitation.

Third: That after this condonation, as it is technically called, there were no acts of cruelty proved, sufficient either of themselves, or as a revival of former cruelties, to entitle the wife to a sentence of separation.

And finally: That as she was not entitled to such a sentence the law knew no other course than to compel a return to cohabitation.

These also are the positions upon which the counsel have mainly relied here.

As the case, then, is of this distressing character, as every part of it has been so thoroughly investigated, and as the grounds of decision in the Consistorial Court were so distinctly laid down, I could have wished to consider myself relieved from the necessity of going, in detail at least, over those points respecting which I clearly concurred with the Judge of the Consistory, reserving myself to state, more at length, those other points, if any, upon which I might have entertained some doubts; if not even a difference of opinion; but as it has been urged in argument that Lord Westmeath has not been proved guilty of any cruelty, and that he is anxious to have his character cleared from that imputation, it becomes my duty to enter more at large into that branch of the case than inclination would otherwise have led me.

The parties were married in May, 1812, and finally separated in June, 1819; and this period, therefore, embracing seven years of cohabitation, must be examined. The cause has been depend-[63]-ing above five years, and is loaded with an immense mass of evidence. For the purpose of tracing the way more readily through this maze of facts, an outline of some prominent features may be stated with convenience, adopting the division of the history made by counsel.

First: From the marriage in May, 1812, to the latter end of 1815.

Second: Thence to the latter end of 1817.

Third: Thence to June, 1819, when Lady Westmeath finally left her husband.

During the greater part of the first period, namely, from May, 1813, to September, 1815, the parties dwelt at Clonyn, in Ireland, the Westmeath family seat; but the late Lord Westmeath, the father of the party in this suit, was then residing at Dublin, where he died towards the close of the year 1814. About the end of May, 1814, Lady Westmeath, then Lady Delvin, gave birth to a daughter, Lady Rosa Nugent, who is still living. Unhappy differences arose between these parties during their abode in Ireland, and had nearly produced a separation; but, in September, 1815, upon a discussion of the subject, and by the interposition of a friend, they were reconciled, and came over to England, intending afterwards to proceed to France. At the end of 1815, when the second period commences, this intention was carried into execution. They continued abroad till the autumn of 1816, then returned to England, paid a short visit to Ireland, and again came back to England.

In the course of the years 1816 and 1817 their unhappy disputes were renewed, and reached such a height that Lady Westmeath insisted on a separation; but a reconciliation again took place, [64] upon the execution by Lord Westmeath of a prospective instrument, which was signed in December, 1817. The parties then resumed their cohabitation, and lived part of the time in Saville Row, and part in Stratford Place; and Lady Westmeath again became pregnant, and gave birth to a son in November, 1818; but long before that event the differences between the parties had recommenced, and formal articles of separation were entered into, bearing date the 30th of May, 1818. Subsequent to these articles, by which 1300l. a year was settled as a separate maintenance for Lady Westmeath, no matrimonial cohabitation took place between the parties; but at the earnest desire of Lord Westmeath, and by the recommendation of friends, in order that the separation might not be known to the world, Lady Westmeath was prevailed upon, reluctantly, to consent to Lord Westmeath having a bed in the house where she resided. About Christmas, 1818-19, Lady Westmeath removed to Bolton Street, Lord Westmeath still being allowed the use of a bed-room: for a time they generally dined together, but in April that intercourse was broken off, and, at length, in June, 1819, in consequence of certain transactions which then occurred, Lady Westmeath withdrew altogether from her husband's society.

Neither party, however, had recourse at that time to the Ecclesiastical Court. Lady Westmeath, relying on the validity of the deed of separation, and on the separate maintenance provided by that deed, did not bring any suit for divorce by reason of cruelty against her husband; nor did Lord Westmeath apply to the Spiritual Court to interpose its authority to compel the return of his wife to cohabitation; but he applied to the Court [65] of Chancery to enforce the delivery up of the articles of separation,(a) and it was not till after proceedings of nearly two years' duration in Chancery, and just before the matter was finally decided, and when it was pretty well ascertained that he could not succeed there, that he instituted a suit in the Consistory Court against his wife for restitution of conjugal rights. The wife, then, as matter of defence, charged the husband with cruelty, and on that ground prayed a sentence of separation; a prayer which, according to the established rules of these Courts, she had a right to engraft on the proceedings commenced by the husband. But in consequence of this delay in resorting to the proper tribunal, the Court is placed under the disadvantage of having to decide upon facts spoken to by witnesses, whose memory and recollections may have become in some degree faint and confused by the interval that has been suffered to elapse between the transactions and the time of making their depositions.

After this general view of the history of the parties and of the suit, the Court has to consider the case, and to pronounce whether the husband is entitled to its aid in order to compel his wife's return to him; or, on the other hand, whether the wife, in her defence, has established a right to a sentence of separation, or is on any ground to be released from the effect of the proceedings instituted on the part of her husband.

Before entering upon the particular points of the case it may be proper to notice one or two [66] occurrences tending to create a strong prepossession in regard to the merits. One is that a part of Lady Westmeath's family is unfavourable to her defence; so far, that her mother, who would most naturally be expected to be strongly prejudiced in her behalf, has been called as a witness in support of the husband's plea. A feeling against Lady Westmeath's cause might well be excited by this circumstance, but too much weight must not be given to it; for if it should appear that Lady Westmeath was anxious, perhaps generously and wisely, to conceal from the knowledge of her family any ill-usage she might experience; that the commencement of her unhappiness, which had nearly produced a separation, took place during a considerable residence in Ireland; that yet the causes of complaint after discussion were for a time extinguished by a reconciliation before their return to England in September, 1815; that the mother was so averse to publicity, and to the affair becoming "town-talk," as to urge her daughter to a renewal of cohabitation, even after Lord Westmeath had consented to sign articles of separation; that this feeling became almost a morbid sensibility upon the subject; and that at length she became for some cause highly offended at her daughter; the fact, so much calculated at first sight to produce an unfavourable impression against the wife, would, on a view of all the circumstances in evidence, lose much of its effect on my mind. I see no impropriety, nor any injudiciousness, nor want of proper feeling on the part of Lady Westmeath, in resorting for assistance to Mr. Sheldon, the old friend and legal adviser of her family, rather than to the family themselves; or in declining to annoy [67] her father with her grievances, who seems to have been extremely averse to interfere in any such domestic matters; or in abstaining from application to her mother, who was indisposed to listen to any remedy that might give publicity to the affair, or to her brother, who might have involved himself in a personal quarrel. None of these persons could give her legal counsel; it was that of which she stood so much in need; and properly enough she applied to the legal as well as the friendly advice of old Mr. Sheldon—the very person to whom her own family would probably have recommended her if they had been consulted.

(a) Westmeath v. Westmeath, Jacob's Rep. 140.

The other occurrence, tending to spread a heavier cloud of prejudice over her defence, is the production of a set of witnesses from Ireland in support of the charge of adultery; which witnesses have since been indicted for, and convicted of, a conspiracy against Lord Westmeath; and their depositions in this cause tend strongly to support the propriety of that conviction: yet, looking at all the circumstances connected with that part of the case, I see no sufficient ground to believe that Lady Westmeath herself was privy to that conspiracy, or to the falsehood of the charges to which the witnesses were brought to depose. She might be too credulous; but situated as she was, and looking back to some past events, it was natural she should lend an unsuspecting ear to such tales. Even her agents and advisers would readily give credit to them; but the conviction of these witnesses was calculated to occasion a prejudice greatly to the disadvantage of the defence set up by Lady Westmeath; and the Court itself, warned by the discovery of this per-[68]-jury, must look with greater caution and reserve at other parts of the evidence.

The witnesses referred to were produced in support of some of the charges of adultery; and as I concur with the Judge of the Consistory Court, that no part of the adultery has been proved, it may be convenient at once to dispose of that branch of the case.

The accusation of adultery with three of the persons has been distinctly and properly abandoned. As far as it relates to another person, of the name of Brenan, there is no proof by any credible witnesses of any fact from which adultery can be inferred. And although, in respect to the remaining person, Smyth, the evidence of Mrs. Winsor, could it be fully relied upon in all its parts, coupled with the subsequent calls of Smyth at three several places where Lord Westmeath lodged, would furnish grounds of pretty strong suspicion; yet considering that no indecent familiarity was ever seen, and that the circumstances deposed to are not in themselves so unequivocal as to exclude explanation consistent even with entire innocence, connecting them also with what has occurred respecting the other witnesses to adultery, I concur with the sentence already given—that the wife has not proved her second allegation, so as to entitle her to a sentence of separation by reason of the adultery of her husband.

In proceeding, then, to the consideration of the charge of cruelty, the original defence set up, and the material branch of this cause, it is necessary to examine—[69] First. The law that applies to such a charge.

Second. The character of the misconduct charged.

Third. The proofs in support of such charge.

In respect to the law, the question naturally occurs, What constitutes cruelty in the view of the law? It is difficult and hardly safe, and at the same time it is unnecessary, to define it affirmatively with precision. It can only be described generally, and rather by effects produced than by acts done; even the quotation from Clarke is very loose, and adopts this mode of describing by effects. "Si maritus uxorem inhumaniter verbis et verberibus tractaverit, et aliquando venenum loco potus paraverit, vel aliquod simile commiserit, propter quod mulier, sine periculo vitæ, cum marito cohabitare aut obsequia conjugalia impendere non audeat." (a) What amounts to "inhumaniter?" What is "aliquod simile?" What is the conduct "propter quod obsequia conjugalia impendere non audeat?" or (as the effect of this passage is stated in another authority) "per quod consortium amittitur?" These definitions leave the matter very undefined and loose. Clarke himself, though a highly respectable authority, yet only professes to write upon practice; and, in many respects, the practice of his day is become obsolete. The law may more satisfactorily be sought in adjudged cases, especially in the principles laid down by that highly gifted individual, the noble Lord who long presided in the Court [70] where the matrimonial law of this country is most frequently discussed. A very valuable collection of his decisions has been made. They have been accurately reported, and are entitled to be received as of the highest authority, not as making the law (for no Judge ever more carefully abstained from assuming such a power), but as declaring what the law is; and I must add that my own knowledge and experience, as far as they go, lead me fully to concur in the principles propounded in those passages which I am now about to quote. In the case of Evans v. Evans Lord Stowell said, "What is cruelty? In the present case it is hardly necessary to define it, because the facts here complained of are such as to fall within the most restricted definition of cruelty. I shall, therefore, decline laying down a direct definition. The causes must be grave and weighty, and such as shew an absolute impossibility that the duties of the married life can be discharged. In a state of personal danger no duties can be discharged, for the duties of self-preservation must take place before the duties of marriage" (Evans v. Evans, 1 Hagg. Con. p. 35). Further on he says, "Proof must be given of a reasonable apprehension of bodily hurt. I say an apprehension, because assuredly the Court is not to wait till the hurt is actually done; but the apprehension must be reasonable, not arising merely from diseased sensibility of mind" (ibid. p. 40). So in Harris v. Harris: "There must be something that renders cohabitation unsafe, or is likely to be attended with injury to the person, or to the health of the party. Words of menace may [71] warrant the Court to interpose, and prevent the actual mischief; but when such violence of language is accompanied with blows, it is a more aggravated case" (Harris v. Harris, 2 Hagg. Con. 148. S. C. 2 Phill. 111). Again, in Waring v. Waring: "The usual principles require that such complaints should be supported by proofs of violence and ill-treatment, endangering, or at least threatening, the life, or person, or health of the complainant" (2 Hagg. Con. 154. S. C. 2 Phill. 132). The same doctrine is held in the case of Holden v. Holden: "The Court has to decide whether the conduct of the husband amounts to that sævitia which authorises a separation. On this point the Court has had frequent occasion to observe that every thing is, in legal construction, sævitia which tends to bodily harm, and in that manner renders cohabitation unsafe. Whenever there is a tendency only to bodily mischief, it is a peril from which the wife must be protected. It is not necessary to inquire from what motive such treatment proceeds; it may be from turbulent passion, or sometimes from causes which are not inconsistent with affection. If bitter waters are flowing it is not necessary to inquire from what source they spring. If the passions of the husband are so much out of his own controul as that it is inconsistent with the personal safety of the wife to continue in his society, it is immaterial from what provocation such violence originated.

"Secondly: The law does not require that there should be many acts; for if one act should be of that description which should induce the Court to think that it is likely to [72] occur again, and to occur with real suffering, there is no rule that should restrain it from considering that to be fully sufficient to authorise its interference.

"Thirdly: It is not necessary that the conduct of the wife should be entirely without blame; for the reason which would justify the imputation of blame to the wife will not justify the ferocity of the husband" (Holden v. Holden, 1 Hagg. Con. 458). These, then, are the principles by which these Courts have been governed, and according to which it is my duty to decide. There must be ill-treatment and personal injury, or the reasonable apprehension of personal injury. What must be the extent of injury, or what will reasonably excite the apprehension will depend upon the circumstances of each case. So likewise what may aggravate the character of ill-treatment must be deduced from various considerations, in some degree from the station of the parties, in some degree from the condition of the person suffering at the time of the infliction. The complexion of individual acts may be heightened; nay, the acts may also change their very essence by the accompaniments. Not only particular stations and situations and the feelings almost necessarily arising out of them, but even acquired feelings may be entitled to some attention. In Evans v. Evans Lord Stowell's remarks establish (ibid. p. 38) that what wounds not the natural but the acquired feelings will not absolutely be excluded by the Court where they are stated merely as a matter of aggravation. A fortiori, then, feelings which naturally belong to a wife or to a mother of every station constitute a part of the consideration.

(a) Clarke's Praxis, tit. 107. Oughton, tit. 193, s. 18.

[73] What, then, is the character of the facts charged; between what parties, and in what situations? It may be sufficient to state that personal violence is charged; blows—blows repeated and severe, and aggravated by the high rank and station of the parties. The acts imputed, if proved by credible evidence, come directly within the strictest definition of cruelty—of aggravated cruelty. A blow between parties in the lower conditions and in the highest stations of life bears a very different aspect. Among the lower classes blows sometimes pass between married couples who, in the main, are very happy and have no desire to part; amidst very coarse habits such incidents occur almost as freely as rude or reproachful words: a word and a blow go together. Still, even among the very lowest classes, there is generally a feeling of something unmanly in striking a woman; but if a gentleman, a person of education, the discipline of which emollit mores and tends to extinguish ferocity; if a nobleman of high rank and ancient family uses personal violence to his wife, his equal in rank, the choice of his affection, the friend of his bosom, the mother of his offspring—such conduct in such a person carries with it something so degrading to the husband, and so insulting and mortifying to the wife, as to render the injury itself far more severe and insupportable. The particular situation of the parties when the ill-treatment is inflicted may create a still further aggravation; but it is unnecessary to anticipate the descriptions of such situations.

The peculiar nature and main features of the cruelty imputed may, however, be here conveniently noticed: it is not that of cold malig-[74]-nity, or savage, continual unfeeling brutality of disposition; it is not that of satiated possession producing disgust and hatred: the acts charged are not inconsistent with occasional kindness, with the existence and continuance of strong attachment; nay, even with violent affection; but the main features of the alleged cruelty are great irritability of temper, producing ungovernable passion, ending occasionally in acts of personal violence, and, of course, attended with the danger of a repetition of personal mischief. Such is the nature of the misconduct of which the husband is accused; and it is not extraordinary that Lord Westmeath should be anxious, if he can, to clear his character from such a stigma.

The principal witnesses to the direct ill-treatment and violent behaviour are domestic servants. Such must of necessity, for the most part, be the sort of evidence in causes of this description; for ill-usage of the species imputed is of a domestic nature. It generally takes place in secret, sometimes in the retirement of the night. Servants, more especially those about the wife's person, are alone likely to witness those acts. Even by them the acts themselves are not very frequently seen, and can only be inferred from the accompanying circumstances or the resulting consequence, or be proved by the husband's acknowledgments. From experience, the Court is well aware of the degree of caution with which it is necessary to listen to evidence of servants on such matters. Allowance must be made for some degree of bias, more especially when they are deposing to general treatment after a long lapse of time. In that case, circum-[75]-stances happening only occasionally are recollected prominently, and are heaped together in the mind so as to appear continuous in the memory even of a witness meaning to depose correctly. But, notwithstanding these objections, the testimony of such witnesses is not at once to be repudiated; for it may be the only means of arriving at truth and justice. If they give their evidence with reasonable fairness, without too much forwardness, and still more if they are confirmed upon facts capable of corroboration, they become entitled to credit even upon circumstances incapable of extrinsic confirmation. The Court, then, must weigh the depositions in this cause under these considerations, and must examine how far they are mutually supported, and particularly how they are corroborated by the admissions of the husband himself and by all the res gestæ.

It thus becomes necessary to travel through the facts in their detail, pursuing the order in which they occurred, and the outline already given.

Soon after their marriage the parties visited Ireland, came back to England the latter end of the same year, and about May, 1813, went to reside at Clonyn. During the remainder of the year there were occasional quarrels, but no acts of personal violence, so far as appears from the evidence. Mackenzie, who was Lady Westmeath's own maid, is the principal witness to the early part of the history: she had lived in the father's (Lord Salisbury's) family from her ladyship's childhood, and accompanied her when she married: she was, of course, much attached to her mistress, and has a strong bias in her favour; but she gives her evidence with considerable fairness, and is corrobo-[76]-rated and confirmed in most of what she states. She gives the following account of the earlier part of the cohabitation:—"About twenty-six years ago she went to live in Lord Salisbury's family, and lived there till Lady Westmeath married in 1812, when she went to live with her as her maid. In 1814 deponent married; then became the housekeeper at Clonyn; and so continued till 1819, when she and her husband, who was also in Lord Westmeath's service, were dismissed by his lordship. In 1812, and beginning of 1813, the parties resided partly at Black Rock, near Dublin; partly at Hatfield. In May, 1813, they went to reside at Clonyn, and continued there till September, 1815, when they came to England in their way to Paris, leaving deponent at Clonyn with the child under her care. At Black Rock and Hatfield she observed Lady Westmeath at times apparently unhappy, but she witnessed no quarrel and heard no improper language by Lord Westmeath. Observing that Lady Westmeath continued unhappy, deponent took an opportunity of speaking of it to her ladyship, who referred it to the behaviour of Lord Westmeath to her, but begged the deponent would not mention it. They had not been long at Clonyn when money for housekeeping was not to be had: Lady Westmeath was literally without money for months together. She cannot depose that Lord Westmeath positively refused to let her have it, but Lady Westmeath was continually fretting about it. Deponent has heard her beg him to let her have some; and say that if he would but let her have her pin-money she should not be so distressed as she then was. When tea and sugar and such articles were [77] wanted from Dublin there was no money to send for them, and Lady Westmeath has gone without them: she lived for economy whenever Lord Westmeath was from home as poor as any poor person could; and when she asked his lordship for money he abused her; deponent has heard him. On such and other occasions deponent has heard him call her a damned bitch, and say he would kick her to hell." These surely are words of menace. "He put himself into most violent passions; he was more like a madman than a reasonable being." Here is turbulent passion, not under his own controul! "Deponent never knew of any provocation Lady Westmeath gave him: she wished for a quiet life; and deponent has known her to leave the room to avoid any thing unpleasant, when he was inclined to quarrel. Lady Westmeath is a quick-tempered woman, and, when irritated, would shew it: but she was never inclined to quarrel, and never began by giving any provocation, to deponent's knowledge."

She then mentions "her misery for want of fuel, and from the wretchedness of the place; that she bore it with great fortitude;" adding, "that if Lord Westmeath had been kind to her, and whenever he was good tempered, she did not care what she put up with."

Here, then, if the witness be credited, is harsh treatment, unnecessary privations, words not only of reproach, but of menace: while, on the part of the wife, there is forbearance—no provocation. She is not the prior lædens, but shews every disposition to endure her privations with patience, "if his lordship would but be kind." The want of money will, however, be found, in Lady West-[78]-meath's apprehension and belief, to have been connected with another very galling circumstance, which will presently be noticed.

That there were quarrels at this time, and that Lord Westmeath admitted himself to be the aggressor and the person to blame in these quarrels, is confirmed by Mr. Wood, the near neighbour of the family (Rossmead, his residence, being about a mile and a half from Clonyn), who is appealed to and called in as the friend and intercessor of Lord Westmeath. He is considered as his friend throughout the transaction, and during all the cohabitation of these parties, or, at least, he ceased only to be so just at its very conclusion. He commences, at all events, as the friend of Lord Westmeath. If he became at length the friend and protector of Lady Westmeath, what is the inference? Why, the conduct of Wood bears testimony that Lord Westmeath was the offending party. It is true, however, that at the time of giving his evidence Lord Westmeath was imprisoned at his suit. That he was obliged to prosecute Lord Westmeath for conduct, the particulars of which do not appear, is no reason why his testimony should be discredited: a prosecutor's own evidence is received in direct proof of the injury for which he prosecutes. Mr. Wood is under some degree of bias, and is to be listened to with care, particularly in matters of mere opinion; but he is credible in regard to the facts to which he deposes, and, besides, he is fully corroborated.

There being, then, no sufficient ground for objection to this gentleman's testimony, I find him stating "that he was from time to time called on by Lord Westmeath to interfere on his behalf and to intercede for him, and to prevail on her [79] ladyship to overlook his aggressions, Lord Westmeath uniformly acknowledging that he had misconducted himself." I shall have occasion presently to refer to Mr. Wood's evidence more in detail, and to see how he is confirmed.

Lord Westmeath being sometimes in Dublin, during the year 1813 his wife wrote to him constantly. Fourteen of her letters of that year are exhibited; they are written in the terms and tone of an affectionate wife, and they are relied upon as a disproof of the facts deposed to. To me they appear in no degree inconsistent with occasional quarrels, and fairly to bear a construction very different from that which has been attempted to be put on them, and not discreditable to Lady Westmeath. In that view, they would tend to shew her good sense and good disposition in making no allusion to those occasional acts of harshness; and to evince that by conciliating conduct she hoped to soften the violence of her husband's temper. This rather seems the true view of them when connected with other parts of the case.

The transactions of the early part of the following year, 1814, become more material. Besides the endurance of many privations during the severe winter of 1813-14, when in a state of advanced pregnancy, an act of personal violence occurs which is thus deposed to by Mackenzie on the seventh article: "About a month before Lady Westmeath's confinement Lord Westmeath called deponent up, about four o'clock one morning, to go to Lady Westmeath; when deponent went, Lady Westmeath was lying in bed, and Lord Westmeath standing by in his dressing gown: deponent asked Lady Westmeath if she was taken ill: she said, No; but that Lord Delvin had been beat-[80]-ing her, and had kicked her in the side; and she complained of being in pain from it. Lord Westmeath then said, Emily, you provoked me to do it. Lady Westmeath looked at him, but said nothing to him; but asked deponent why she had come? Deponent said, Lord Delvin had called her. Lady Westmeath said she might go to her own room again. Lord Westmeath appeared by his manner, when he called her, to be frightened." An admission of the truth of the charge is here then necessarily implied from his observation, "You provoked me to do it." It is true that when he has done it he himself is frightened, and calls the maid; but he in effect admits that her statement is correct. How ungovernable must be the passions of a husband who, scarcely a month before his wife's confinement of her first child, can be hurried away to such an outrage: it requires no definition of cruelty to pronounce this to be an act of aggravated cruelty. "You provoked me to do it:" no provocation could justify or palliate it. It will hereafter be seen what calls forth similar inflictions of personal violence, when witnesses are actually present at the commencement of the quarrel. It may also be proper at this stage to enquire what is suggested on the part of the husband as the sort of provocation given by the wife to excite him to ill-treat her.

It appears that before the marriage Lord Westmeath had two natural children. This was not at that period communicated to his intended wife, as in candour as well as in prudence it ought to have been. He did worse than entirely conceal it; for that might have been imputed to a feeling of delicacy: he communicated one half of it; he [81] desired her brother, then Lord Cranborne, to mention it to her, that he had a natural child; not informing even him that he had two. The wife, however, afterwards discovered the fact. This shewed contrivance and deception, as well as concealment; and he asserts that she was constantly reproaching him because he had two natural children, instead of one only. This assertion, again, is only half the truth; or, rather, it is much less than half the truth. She complained that he had one of those children whilst paying his addresses to her; she complained that he had kept up a clandestine communication with this woman (a married woman) and her children, even after his marriage; she complained that a considerable part of his income, instead of being employed on its legitimate objects, namely, to provide for the comfort of his pregnant wife during the severe winter, was diverted in an unreasonable degree to the support of this woman and her children. What could be more galling and even heart-breaking to an attached wife than the belief, or even suspicion, that such was the case?

Mackenzie, to the eleventh interrogatory, answers: "Lady Westmeath did sometimes talk to the respondent about these two illegitimate children, unburdening her mind; for she was very unhappy about them and their mother." Lord Salisbury, to the tenth interrogatory, says: "Lady Westmeath has used very strong language in speaking of Lord Westmeath, in consequence of the deception practised upon her by him in having concealed a part of the truth from her; and her belief that further deception, respecting the mother of these children and his lordship's connection with her, was still prac-[82]-tised." To remonstrate on this supposed violation of her husband's duties was natural, and was justifiable. The evidence sufficiently proves, indeed Lord Westmeath's own letters shew, that she had some foundation at least to make remonstrances, without any very great proneness to jealousy.

The temper of this lady is suggested to be extremely violent; and it should seem that, when irritated, she could express herself with warmth, and even bitterness and acrimony, for she was not insensible to injuries and to insults; but she had considerable self-command, and her natural temper and disposition are described as being good: so say those who know her best, and upon interrogatories put to them by Lord Westmeath.

Lord Salisbury, to the seventh interrogatory, replies: "Lady Westmeath is of an amiable and easy temper; under circumstances of serious provocation she manifests great warmth, even to violence of temper; but not otherwise." So Mr. Sheldon, to the fifth interrogatory: "Lady Westmeath is not, to the respondent's knowledge or belief, a woman of a most violent and ungovernable temper; she is warm-tempered, but not an ill-tempered warmth; she is a woman of a very ardent and anxious, but affectionate, disposition, capable of being irritated by ill-usage; she is naturally of a most amiable disposition; she has, in the deponent's presence, reproached Lord Westmeath with considerable acrimony, but it was done with more of dignity than violence; though the respondent has seen her evince considerable irritation towards her husband, not unprovoked, as he believes."

[83] The Rev. William Stephens, Lord Westmeath's agent, gives nearly the same description of her temper, in answer to the seventh interrogatory: "He has seen violence of temper displayed by Lady Westmeath on the occasion of her complaints against Lord Westmeath, under her sense of his ill-treatment; he has heard her express herself in strong terms of contempt of what had been, to respondent's knowledge, Lord Westmeath's conduct, and which could not but excite the feeling in her mind."

It may be gathered from the general result of the evidence, and of the facts that these several accounts are not an unfair representation of Lady Westmeath's character and tone of mind. I shall not state the opinion of the servants, but their conduct speaks to the same effect. They live long with her, and are attached to her. Her own maids, three in succession, live with her till they marry, nearly three years each. I see nothing of a fretful, peevish, and worrying temper in her letters, still less of a perverse and malicious disposition that took delight in irritating and provoking a husband without cause. Behaviour which wounded her mind in its tenderest and best feelings—in her affections as a wife—in her fondness as a mother—afflicted her acutely; and she had spirit to remonstrate upon mal-treatment, and when it was aggravated by repetition she had firmness and resolution to insist upon redress and protection: but in all these letters in 1813 and the beginning of 1814 (and the fact is particularly deserving of my attention) there is no reference to complaints or quarrels, no spiteful allusion to the subjects even [84] that hurt her most—to this woman and her children.

I will proceed, then, to the charge in the eighth article of ill-treatment during her confinement in May, 1814. This is not deposed to by Mackenzie; it probably passed only between the parties themselves; and in contradiction to it, or at least its probability, are produced Dr. Barlow, the accoucheur, the nurse, and one of the servants (the cook) at Clonyn. They can only speak negatively "that nothing of the sort passed to their knowledge;" but they also say affirmatively "that Lord Westmeath was a most attentive, tender husband, and that they seemed the happiest couple that could be imagined." At such a time, if ever, at the birth of a first child, there would be a mutual kindness and the fondest affection. But what in reality did take place during even this very period? The very conduct imputed. Direct evidence could not be expected, but it is proved by the subsequent admission of Lord Westmeath, confirmed by his own letters. In 1815 Lady Westmeath distinctly accused her husband of these facts, and he as distinctly admitted them.

Mr. Wood, to the twelfth article, deposes: "He remembers, in particular, she gave an account that about a fortnight after she was brought to bed he had threatened to disinherit her child, and to settle his fortune upon his brother by the half-blood; his discontent and anger at her not suckling her child, and his unkindness, violence, and cruelty to her." "During this time Lord Westmeath was walking up [85] and down the room, apparently a good deal annoyed by the recital, striking his head occasionally, but he acknowledged distinctly the truth of all she said."

But that Lord Westmeath made such an admission does not depend upon either the credit or the recollection of Mr. Wood; it results from his own letters. In letter No. 30 Lady Westmeath thus writes to Lord Westmeath, in September, 1817: "When my child was twelve hours in the world, you told me 'you would be damned if you gave twenty-five guineas a year to a bitch of a nurse. Why the devil could I not nurse her myself?' though the doctor told you I was unable. Three weeks after the child was to be disinherited, and settle every thing upon Thomas; you took possession of my pin-money; would turn me out of doors if I dared to insist upon having it."

Lord Westmeath's letter, No. 5, is in answer: "Then was the folly of my saying I would disinherit Rosa. You can call it by any other name, though I was a brute to say it. Then there was my saying, in passion, I would turn you out of doors. If I was to qualify the brutality of such expressions, I should not be sensible of the light in which I cannot deny they deserve to be seen."

To what does this answer amount? He admits the fact; he does not deny the time at which it took place; he himself denominates it an act of brutality. The ignorance of this event by Dr. Barlow, by the nurse, and still more by Mackenzie, only shews Lady Westmeath's forbearance, and her wish to bear her wrongs secretly and in silence. But here, again, how ungovernable must have been [86] the temper of that husband, who, at such a time, would resort to such heart-breaking menaces.

During the subsequent part of the year 1814 acts of violence, deposed to by Mackenzie, are necessary to be stated. She thus deposes on the ninth and tenth articles. After relating that the parties went to Dublin after the confinement; that they staid at Leinster House, his grace being absent; that they went out one day to dine at the house of the late Lord Westmeath in the same street; that she was present when Lord Westmeath returned, and ordered his wife's clothes to be packed up, saying that horses would be at the door early the next morning to quit Dublin; that when they came home in the evening she saw that there had been something amiss; she proceeds: "At an early hour in the morning Lord Westmeath came to her and called her up," in the meantime Lady Westmeath had fastened her own door, "Lord Westmeath stood at it for as much as an hour and a half: he called to Lady Westmeath to let him in, and promised he would not beat her any more. At last she did open the door, and he went into his own room. In a little time deponent heard Lady Westmeath scream out 'Murder,' upon which deponent went into their room; they were both out of bed, and just as deponent went in he was about to strike her ladyship. Deponent stepped in, and saved her for that time. Deponent said 'words were bad enough without blows;' but he was swearing at and abusing Lady Westmeath, and talking so fast deponent could not well know what he said. Lady Westmeath then said 'he had been beating her again;' he did not deny it; she mentioned where he had struck her; deponent succeeded [87] at length in quieting him; prevailed on them to go to bed, and left them."

To the tenth article she deposes: "On the following morning Lord Westmeath went to get some lotion, and for several days it was applied, two or three times a day, by deponent, to a severe bruise, where Lady Westmeath said before that he had struck her on the breast. It was a very serious bruise, at first black, after a time all kind of colours. She remembers making a thick handkerchief to hide it, when they were going to the Duke of Leinster's country house. Lady Westmeath was for some time in great alarm, fearing it would end in a cancer; and the blow was enough to excite such an apprehension." These facts require no comment, and can receive no exaggeration nor aggravation. Here is beating, and beating a second time, in breach of a recent promise; and here is personal "violence," of that sort as not merely to hurt and injure the person, but to endanger health, and even life. Lord Westmeath's answers to some of these articles are not immaterial. The Court would willingly suppose that in respect to some of his answers his mind was so obscured by fury and rage that he did not accurately remember all the circumstances; he admits, in the seventh article, "that on one occasion he had slightly slapped his wife's face:" that article is confined to a transaction before her confinement, and he may understand the answer to be limited to facts prior to that period; but how does he answer to the substantive acts of violence, particularly to those laid in the ninth and tenth articles, when Lady Westmeath screamed out "Murder," and brought back Mackenzie a second [88] time to her assistance, and when the severe blow on the breast had been given? The ninth article pleads the first beating; and then goes on, "that shortly after Lord Delvin again quarrelled with his wife, used most violent language to her, and attempted to smother her with the pillows; that she screamed out for help, and her cries brought Sarah Mackenzie again to her assistance." Mackenzie, as already shewn, speaks to hearing the cry of "Murder," to going to Lady Westmeath's assistance, and to the other circumstances, stated above from her deposition, but she can say nothing respecting the use of the pillows. How, then, does Lord Westmeath palliate this in his own answers? "That Lady Westmeath having used insulting conduct and behaviour towards him immediately on retiring to bed, he admits that in his anger, on the impulse of his wounded feelings, and not with an intention of injuring her, he did for a moment, but without violence, place a pillow over the face of his said wife, but instantly took it away."

To the tenth article he says "that Lady Westmeath, having complained that he had hurt her neck, he did apply to Mr. Crampton, a surgeon; and admits that in order to conceal from Mr. Crampton the manner in which she had received the imagined injury, he did, at the suggestion of his wife, tell Mr. Crampton she had fallen against an imperial, or table. He admits that Mr. Crampton prescribed a lotion to be used."

Here then is a confession of personal violence in return for words; of personal violence of an extraordinary sort; "in his anger" putting a pillow over her face—the effects are such as to require medical aid—the blow is so severe as to bear the appear- [89]-ance of a fall against an imperial. If the false representation of the source of the injury was the suggestion of the wife, it only serves to evince the great forgivingness of her disposition, her long forbearance, and her desire not to expose her husband.

These answers go far to corroborate and give credit to the evidence of Mackenzie. That witness, on the eleventh article, states that they went for a few nights to the Duke of Leinster's country house at Carton; and then goes on, "In the course of the night, or early in the morning, deponent was awoke by Lady Westmeath's running into her room, followed by Lord Westmeath; she was flying from him, and he was coming after her to take her back to her own bed; she said she would not return; she told deponent 'that he had been beating her;' he desired her to come back; she said 'she was afraid;' he continued, first ordering, and then begging her to return; and saying 'that the servants would hear them, and that he would not touch her again if she would come back.' Lady Westmeath was apparently very much frightened at first. At length she consented to return; they went back, and deponent with them. The water jug had plainly been emptied in the fire, which had been so put out; the bed was in confusion; the clothes all pulled off and lying on the floor: deponent put that to rights for them, and then left them." These repeated acts of furious violence prove the character of his temper, on the point already noticed.

This concludes the transactions of 1814, and the confirmation of this witness will appear in the sequel. Lady Westmeath's letters in the remaining [90] part of this year 1814 are not very material: only two are exhibited, couched in the ordinary style of a wife to a husband, though, even here, the letter of the 14th of August shews there had been disagreements; for she says, "You know very well when we are friends I never neglect writing to you:" agreeing, therefore, with Mackenzie and Wood that at all times they had not been friends.

Under these injuries, personal and mental, that Lady Westmeath's health should have suffered, is not extraordinary; it is difficult to shew the cause of ill health; it certainly does not follow that because post hæc, therefore propter hæc; but here is the fact that her health was affected, and that she went to Dublin, in 1815, for medical advice, and was there under the care of three medical gentlemen. It is not probable, with her desire for secrecy, that she should communicate the cause of her illness, even to her medical attendants, and in writing to her husband whilst she was upon terms with him, and when both were cool and apart, it would have been ungenerous, as well as imprudent, to have referred her indisposition to his treatment. Making light of her illness, and saying "there was not much the matter with her," will bear an interpretation creditable to her judgment and forbearance; but the evidence of Lord Westmeath's friend, Mr. Wood, unless all credence is denied to it, gives a different account of her state of health.

During 1815 the same species of differences seem to have continued, and she began at length to entertain serious thoughts of a separation. In her letters of April, 1815, there are these passages: [91] No. 21 is dated April 3, 1815; and it appears from it that they had not been friends, and that some discussion respecting the woman and her children had taken place: it however begins kindly—"I do not know, my dear friend," and afterwards proceeds: "So much the better if you have not received my last, it would not have given you pleasure. I hope to hear from you to-morrow that you are in good health, and that the detestable subject will be at an end between us until your return. It will depend entirely upon yourself whether we are for the future to live peaceably and happy together; and, indeed, if you do not entirely get rid of the whole of that infamous gang, your good sense must tell you that it is impossible for us to live together without making ourselves miserable. If I were indifferent, or if I desired that you should have your objects and engagements separately from mine, I should, indeed, be more of a Madame Commode: but as you know well that I have no other object in the world than you, I cannot endure such a want of sincerity towards me. I must have all or nothing. You know my opinion in regard to your conduct before marriage; and God knows that that discovery was sufficiently afflicting to me, without having further to discover all that has since passed in that respect; but let us make an end of it: you have been the dupe of two wretches, the very dregs of mankind" [it appears that the woman had a husband], "and you and I have very nearly become the victims of our enemies, high and low, and this ought to be a lesson for us never to disguise any thing." She then goes on with affectionate cordiality, giving an account of herself [92] and her daughter, expressing anxiety about his health and safety, and adding, "If any thing should happen to you, recollect that Rosa and myself are beggars." Lord Westmeath's father was now dead.

In the letter dated April 8, 1815, there is the same disposition to kindness; but the same marks of her strong sense of injustice that are not discreditable to her. An intermediate letter had passed, to which this seems to be the answer.

"My dear friend,—Much obliged by the letter I received yesterday. I am very glad that you received mine, and that you wish to live peaceably together. I assure you, my dear friend, that it is only when you break my heart, and mortify me to the quick, that I have any intention of abandoning you; and put yourself in my place, is it not enough to have had the mortification of discovering that you are, by no means, what I believed you to have been before marriage, without having to blame you for your conduct after it?" The remainder of the letter is civil.

There is nothing in these letters inconsistent with Lady Westmeath's case, or to her disadvantage, either as regards her temper, understanding, or right feeling. Her resentment is expressed as an honourable and injured wife would express it; she indulges in no terms of violence or reproach, and is ready to forgive if the injuries cease and are not renewed. She does not, it is true, advert to acts of personal violence; but to a woman of such a mind and character, personal violence, inflicted in a moment of passion and irritation, would be easily overlooked, forgiven, and almost forgotten as soon as suffered: but mental injuries, such to use her [93] own expression, "as broke her heart, and mortified her to the quick," would sink deepest in her mind. Notwithstanding these sentiments, in other parts of this very letter she expresses herself in terms of kindness, conciliation, and friendship, and appears regardful of his health and safety; so that her writing kindly is no disproof of her feeling injuries keenly.

In September in that year, 1815, the parties were coming over to England, intending to proceed to France, accompanied by Miss Wood, the daughter of their neighbour and friend at Rossmead. Before they left Dublin a discussion respecting their differences took place at the Waterford Hotel; and Mr. Wood, as he had done on former occasions, acted as mediator between them, and gives the following account of that interview:—"In September, 1815, deponent went to Dublin, a visit to the Continent being contemplated by the parties, accompanied by deponent's daughter. Lord and Lady Westmeath were at the Waterford Hotel. There was at that time a serious misunderstanding between them, and Lady Westmeath was threatening that she would proceed against him, and apply for a legal separation. Lady Westmeath enumerated various instances of grievous ill-treatment and cruelty; the principal features were some particular acts of violence. He remembers, in particular, she gave an account that, about a fortnight after she was brought to bed, he had threatened to disinherit her child, and to settle his fortune upon his brother by the half blood; his discontent and anger at her not suckling her child; and his unkindness, violence, and cruelty to her. She mentioned his having beaten her several times; in [94] particular, she gave an account of a violent beating he had given her at Leinster House: she described it as of a nature that she was severely bruised, and that she carried the marks for a long time, and that he himself had gone the next morning to Surgeon Crampton, and had procured a lotion, under pretence that she had fallen against an imperial; that the marks continued so that she was obliged to wear something to cover them." This is a complete corroboration of Mackenzie. "She also upbraided him with not having made the promised settlement on the children, as he had pledged himself to do on the death of his father. During this time Lord Westmeath was walking up and down the room, apparently a good deal annoyed by the recital, striking his head occasionally, but acknowledged distinctly the truth of all she said. He did express regret and contrition for his conduct, and his wish to make her amends: and he, in a very serious manner, promised that he would fulfil his engagements in regard to the settlements, and that he would never repeat his ill-treatment of his wife. Upon this a reconciliation took place, and he left them reconciled." If, then, the witness is to be believed, and I have already said I see no reason for disbelieving him, his evidence is in unison with Mackenzie's account; and, what is more decisive, it is confirmed and admitted, not only by Lord Westmeath's whole conduct, but by his own letters. Here had been acts of cruelty committed sufficient to entitle her to a separation, if then demanded; but through the kind offices of Mr. Wood, from affection for her child, and, probably, affection for her husband not extinguished, she, with laudable forbearance, agreed to be reconciled.

Before the visit to France, Lord Westmeath [95] went back from England to Ireland; and during his absence Lady Westmeath constantly wrote to him. There are six or seven letters written during that short period, which are exhibited: they are such as a reconciled wife would prudently and properly write to an irritable and violent husband: they are kind: no expression of reproach occurs in them; no reference to what had passed in Ireland; but they furnish, in my judgment, no disproof whatever (for that was the purpose for which they were used) of injuries which it is alleged she had before suffered.

In December, 1815, the parties proceeded to France, accompanied by Miss Wood and Lady Westmeath's own maid, Janet Service, a Scotch girl, hired in Ireland in the early part of 1815. Mackenzie, who had married in 1814 and become housekeeper at Clonyn, remained there; Lady Rosa, the child, being entrusted to her care. The parties had a bad passage of seventeen hours from Dover to Calais, during which Lady Westmeath suffered much from sea-sickness, and Lord Westmeath was kind and attentive to her. It is not the result of the evidence that at that period, at least when he was in good humour, he was not kind, nay, that he was not extremely attached to her: but that fact only serves to prove more strongly the ungovernable force of his temper and passion, and the dangers consequent thereon. An instance occurred almost immediately. On their journey to Paris they stopped at a place called Granvilliers, and went to the post-house: whether there was a better inn, at which Lord Westmeath would not stop because too much was asked for the apartments, is not material; the accommo-[96]-dation at the post-house was not very good; Lord Westmeath went down himself to procure some wood for the fire; on his return, the door being fastened (the room was also probably a bed-room), he was detained a short time. Whether any thing before had passed to put him out of humour, or whether the detention at the door, or something said upon his entrance, provoked him, need not be inquired, but he struck his wife a violent blow, which not only hurt her, but seriously endangered her person; for, if not caught by Miss Wood, she would have fallen upon the fire-place, in a manner that might even have produced fatal consequences. The fact is proved by the concurrent testimony of Miss Wood and the maid-servant, Janet Service, who is since married, and has been long out of the employ of either party.

Miss Wood thus deposes: "She was standing by the fire, but was not looking that way at the moment when Lord Westmeath came into the room; her attention was suddenly roused by hearing a blow given, which, though she did not actually see struck, was most certainly given by Lord Westmeath, and at the moment when he struck her he said, 'Go to hell; I wish I had never seen you.' Lady Westmeath staggered, and was in the act of falling backwards, when deponent caught her; and, she being a very little woman, deponent was enabled to break the fall. In all probability she would have fallen with her head upon the dogs on the fire-place; the dogs being iron frames on which the logs of wood are laid: Lord Westmeath made no kind of effort to save her."

Janet Service thus details the same occurrence: [97] "Deponent went with, or just following, Lord Westmeath into the room. Lady Westmeath said, as soon as Lord Westmeath entered, 'My God! Lord Westmeath, what a place is this you have brought us to!' Whether he was angered by that, or what other cause, deponent knows not; but, going up to her ladyship, he struck her a violent blow, which would have knocked her down, had it not been for Miss Wood, who caught her falling, and said, 'Oh! Lord Westmeath, what a brute you are.' As Lord Westmeath struck her, he said, 'Go to hell: I wish to God I had never seen your face.' The blow for a time seemed to take away her ladyship's breath; his manner was very violent and outrageous."

This, then, is an act of personal injury amounting to cruelty, according to the strictest demands of matrimonial law, and proved by two unimpeached witnesses. This transaction is the more important because the Court sees the cause and the commencement of it. A wife, fatigued, coming in the evening to a French post-house, for so excuseable an observation on the badness of the accommodation, and with no other provocation, is immediately treated in the manner just related from the evidence of the two witnesses. It serves to illustrate what was the sort of provocation he might have received, which produced those nocturnal violences in Ireland, when unrestrained by the presence of third persons, and when his only excuse is, "You provoked me to do it." It evinces a temper that inflames by the slightest spark, or rather that, by a mere jar, explodes with these dangerous effects. It is the duty of the Court, when it considers other acts, [98] to bear in mind the species of temper which rules the person, who now demands to have his wife again placed under his marital authority.

The parties proceeded to Paris. Lady Westmeath was at first unwell; she afterwards became better, and was able to partake of the society and amusement of the place; but the same witnesses prove that there was the same general treatment: Lord Westmeath was frequently speaking in a loud angry tone, generally in French, so that Janet Service could not understand what he said, and Lady Westmeath was frequently in tears. Service says, "Though she could not understand his language, she could not mistake his manner; for that was violent and passionate, and frequently very unbecoming."

Miss Wood thus describes his conduct during their residence abroad: "She does not know that he sought occasions of quarrelling with his wife; but the slightest occasion excited his temper, which appeared to be ungovernable. She did not observe that Lady Westmeath provoked him, either intentionally or incautiously;

she conducted herself prudently towards him; deponent has seen her angry, but then it was not unprovoked, and she uniformly endeavoured to hide their quarrels."

What their common acquaintance, and persons meeting them in society (Lord Arthur Hill and Lady Glengall) might observe is of little weight. It is much to be feared that husband and wife, particularly among the higher ranks, who, from education and habit, have more command over their external behaviour, often appear to the world to be mutually civil and kind, when at home by their own fire-side, they are but ill at ease [99] with each other; and that many a wife is often obliged to wear a countenance cheerful, and clad in smiles, who carries with her under it but an aching heart.

In the autumn of 1816 the parties came back to England; went over to Ireland for a short time; and then returned again to England. At the Pigeon-house, when they intended to embark on their return, there occurred a scene of unseemly conduct and opprobrious language, in the presence of the servants, which though not attended with personal injury, was degrading, and strongly marked violence of temper.

Soon after their arrival in England in the beginning of 1817 an application was made to Lord Salisbury to advance Lord Westmeath part of a sum of money which would fall to Lady Westmeath at her father's death; Lady Westmeath joined in this request, and it is stated that she urged the compliance with it on the ground of Lord Westmeath's uniform kindness. This has been relied on as falsifying the charge of ill-treatment; it does not weigh much with me against the body of proof adduced in support of the imputed misconduct: if she in kindness towards her husband, or in some degree for her own convenience, comfort, and peace, joined in the application, and with earnestness—it is not to her discredit: if she alleged his uniform kindness in order to induce Lord Salisbury to consent to the advance of this money, the evidence satisfies me that she misrepresented the matter. At this period the parties resided in Saville Row, where their differences and unhappiness still attended them. Wetherly, the housekeeper, heard [100] "Lord Westmeath violently storming at her ladyship, who, as it seemed to her, was crying very much." Lady Westmeath at length applied to Mr. Sheldon, saying, "She could no longer bear it," and a deed of separation was in preparation, and agreed to; Lord Westmeath in the meantime going to Ireland.

Mr. Sheldon states: "Deponent had repeated conferences with Lord Westmeath on the subject. It was agreed that a deed of separation should be executed, and deponent requested and urged his lordship to employ some professional gentleman as his own legal adviser; but Lord Westmeath refused to do so, stating his entire confidence in deponent, and his disinclination that the matter should become known to other persons. Lord Westmeath left England for Ireland in the autumn, promising to execute the deed on his return. His lordship previously expressed great reluctance to execute such a deed, but at length consented; it being the only condition on which Lady Westmeath then declined to persist in her resolution to seek a legal separation by divorce. Lord Westmeath distinctly and unequivocally admitted his violent misconduct to, and ill-treatment of, Lady Westmeath; and so matters stood when his lordship went to Ireland in the autumn of 1817." It was at this time that the correspondence, to which I am now going to advert, took place.

It appears that Lord Westmeath, even before he left England, wrote to Lady Westmeath, endeavouring still to dissuade her from the separation, and that she answered his letters in terms of civility, but justifying the measure she had re-[101]-solved upon, by reference to the treatment she had experienced. Her letter, No. 30, was written in the latter end of September, 1817, and addressed to Lord Westmeath, at Leamington; it is produced by him, and is an important document in illustration of this cause. It contains an enumeration of the injuries of which she then complained, and was written, not for the purpose of reproaching and worrying him, but of justifying herself, in insisting at that time on a separation, to which he had agreed, but from which he was now endeavouring to persuade her to depart. It is not a letter written for the purpose of being shewn to third parties, in order to make her own story good; but it is addressed to him alone, and it is he who has produced it in the present suit, after his letter in reply to it had been exhibited on the part of Lady Westmeath. Her letter, and his answers, are keys to each other. It is difficult to suppose that this letter would contain a misrepresentation of facts, it being addressed to the very person who must be fully aware of any falsehoods inserted in it; but it is still more difficult to suppose, if it did contain falsehoods, that having received this letter, and written an answer in justification of himself, in extenuation of his misconduct, and with a wish still to dissuade her from a separation, he would not have pointed out any circumstances which she had either misapprehended or misrepresented; he would naturally deny, in excuse of himself, any accusations that were totally unfounded. In this view, it is extremely important to see the charges she makes against him in this letter to him; and the answer which he gives in defence of himself, against these charges. Her letter contains the following passage:—"Many thanks for your letter which I [102] received this morning. I hope, dear Lord W., you will not torment yourself, or me, any more with discussions upon the painful subject of the causes of our unfortunate disagreement: there is nothing more to be said upon the subject, and all the fine words, 'refinement, delicacy, &c.' ne changent rien à la chose. When I say you neglected me, I ought to say insulted me personally; and now you are trying to insult my understanding also. You still attempt to prove that 'you had not even persons in your imagination, and that you only thought of me.' I will just put down a few instances of your attachment to me and forgetfulness of others. You first took me away from all my friends; as good as shut me up in an obscure corner of the world, without horses, or servants to stir out. In the bitter winter of 13 and 14, I was in a room not papered, sashes rotten; with child, and very ill; not allowed any thing but green wood for firing, because turf was two shillings a kish instead of one. When my child was twelve hours in the world, you told me you would be damned if you gave twenty-five guineas a year to a b——— of a nurse; why the devil could not I nurse her myself, though the doctor told you I was unable. Three weeks after the child was to be disinherited, and settle every thing upon Thomas. You took possession of my pin-money; would turn me out of doors if I dared to insist upon having it. You beat me; you endeavoured to place (I will call things by their proper names) a pimp's daughter as my own maid, her nephew, a post-master; and all this time, when I was undergoing all the privations I mentioned for want of money, you could find money for a [103] prostitute; you could believe her word when she saddled herself and her children upon you, and did you the honour to tell you they were yours. You dared to tell me that you had injured her. You lived three years with me in constant deceit; at last, when your nurse's impertinence made it impossible to conceal the whole any longer, you made an agreement with me, and bound yourself by all that was sacred that there should be an end of the business upon conditions, God knows to that woman's advantage enough. Last year, when you returned from Spa, you began again and broke your most solemn word of honour; and you now dare to tell me that you never thought of any one but me. Lord Westmeath, I assure you I do not wish to speak harshly; but if you will persevere in asserting things that you know cannot be true, I must state facts to you. As to your anxiety to make up with me, the removal of the causes of disagreement was always in your power, but you never thought of that. In short, you thought (if I may apply the example to such a subject) that you could serve two masters; and you thought, that as long as you condescended to tell me I was your object, it was enough; I was to be satisfied with whatever you thought fit to do. You have been mistaken; and now, according to your disposition in every thing, you regret what you have yourself, with your eyes wide open, thrown from you.

"As to me, I freely confess that when Sheldon got me to agree to coming together again I never was deceived with a hope of its ever coming right again; I made the condition of those people being out of your reach, not because I [104] did not well know that there were other Frank Erwins in the world; but because I owed it to myself, not with my positive knowledge, to allow the slightest link of communication. The thing has failed, owing to the impertinence you have yourself taught the woman. To speak openly, nothing offends me more now than your persevering in saying you all along only thought of me. I wish Mr. Stephens to understand that the woman's being married"———

"What was owing to myself was, that, as far as possible, the thing should be as if it had not existed; if your word had been to be trusted there would have been no necessity of going out of the country; but remember your oath to me and them, and then ask yourself if you are to be trusted. Frankly speaking, I never will live with a man as his wife who thought any other woman and her children had the slightest claim upon him. You and I are not intended for each other, and cannot understand each other. Rosa is very well, and sends her love. I hope Leamington will agree with you.—Yours, in haste, EMILY."

This letter is certainly written in a tone of strong resentment; but with her view of the injuries she had suffered, and her repeated forgiveness of those injuries, it does not, perhaps, exceed what a wife so circumstanced, and adhering to her determination of a separation, was justified in stating in support of that determination. Her complaints are here then distinctly enumerated to him, not before third parties, but in the privacy of a letter. How does he answer? By denying any of the facts? No! he points out an unfortunate [105] coincidence in one or two circumstances, which he says were accidental and unconnected: but as to the rest of the charges there is no contradiction; all is acknowledgment, self-abasement, and contrition.

The first letter is dated Dublin, October 5th, and contains the following passages: —"My dearest Emily,—Although I would give up willingly the mention of the unfortunate unhappy state, as it is disagreeable to you, and indeed had intended it, yet your cold—worse than cold—your freezing letters go the length of incapacitating me, even for any part of the business I came about; I cannot raise myself from the paroxysms of anguish into which the hell of the style of your letters too surely acquaint me with, that I only live in your recollection to be detested. . . . I confess to you, Emily, that when I look back on the principal part of my conduct—that it was that of a person totally unworthy of such a friend . . . my only hope now, in this life, is to have some of your regard, and to shew you that I am full of remorse; but under your contempt and disregard I cannot live; I have, miserable and lost man that I am, too late, the belief that the money those devils have been supplied with, was only fuel wherewith to torment me and mine hereafter; but that is, thank Heaven, at an end: I trust you will know and believe it." Towards the conclusion he says, "Poor little Rosa! her mother deserved to have had a husband of whom she could have spoken to her, as I fear you never can of me; but it is bad for her, poor little thing, that the best she can know of her unhappy father is not to have known him at all. May God bless you, and comfort you, for the blast I have made [106] of your happiness." In this letter, then, he expresses contrition and deep remorse, but makes no attempt to gainsay the truth of the imputations made against him by his wife.

The letter, dated October 8th, has passages of the same tenor: "If existence has charms for others, there is nothing for me but dreariness. Kiss Rosa for her unhappy father."

The letter, dated October 13th, comes next. "My dearest dear Emily,—I am distracted, I am too miserable a wretch to live long; but, before I die, I hope to obtain your entire forgiveness." He then enters into an explanation about his property, and afterwards proceeds: "As to my oath, broken as you say it is, I acknowledge actually it is: and, as I tell you, I feel too bitterly having compelled you, my dearest and best friend—you angel, who devoted yourself for me—to think so ill of me as you do, to loathe me as you do, to live long. My state is absolutely intolerable, and, indeed, I do from my heart acquit you, for you deserved every thing the very reverse from me; I do however cling still to the hope, that when I am gone you will try to forget your wrongs from me, and endeavour to forgive them here. I have not now an object on earth, and I only wish and pray to die." The rest of this long letter is very much in the same strain, and of the same character—all humiliation, sorrow, and self-reproach; but he ventures upon no denial of his misconduct, and concludes; "Oh, pardon and forgive me, Emily; what a comfort it would be to my very great wretchedness, to think that I was dear to you in any degree." Letter No. 5 has no date; but by the answer seems to have been written the following day. Some extracts [107] from it have already been quoted, acknowledging specifically his unkindness and threats during her lying-in of her daughter. There are also these passages: "At one time I fully determined to go with the child, and never see you again: at another, to leave every thing with you, but go; at a third, to destroy myself; but it is evident I can do nothing." Further on he says, "Let pity for my misfortunes induce you to relent, Emily: if I was not a worthy object for your compassion and pardon for much brutality I have shewn you, in individual instances, I probably should not have the grace to ask it." He then, after a solemn protestation, says, "That, however disinheriting Rosa, and turning you out of the house, as it was threatened, coupled, as I truly see, in your mind, with appearances of improper consideration for other persons than you, I say, believe me, on that great oath, when I say, they were coincidences of chance, and produced by misfortune to undo me."

This is the only part of Lady Westmeath's charges which he endeavours to explain, viz.: that he did not employ those threats for the sake of, and with reference to, the woman and children who gave his wife so much anxiety. He says, again, in disavowal of that reference: "As I loathe the unworthiness which would make the principal and foundation of all your charges against me, so I never could be at ease in my mind to have it fixed upon me." This, then, is the only part which he attempts to extenuate; but the individual instances of much brutality, as he terms them, and which Lady Westmeath had enumerated in her letter, he does not deny, which goes far towards a full admission of them.

[108] Much in the same tone and feeling are the two following letters; but they were not received by Lady Westmeath till after the former letters had had their effect upon her heart, and she had consented to be reconciled. No. 6, dated October 19th, concludes thus: "For God's sake, believe me, my dearest Emily, my heart is worthy of your forgiveness, though I have wounded yours in its disinterestedness deeply; pray forgive me, and let me know how you do." Letter No. 7 is dated Dublin, Tuesday morning, and in it he says: "Thank God, Emily, I did not commit a last act of brutality and madness, by taking her (Lady Rosa) from you, who suffered twice what most mothers suffer, all through your time—mind as well as body. Oh, Emily, will you—will you forgive me!" By sufferings of mind must be meant his treatment of her at that time; it concludes, referring to a provision for the child. "I am anxious to comfort your true heart, as far as I can, on a point that evidently afflicts you, and leaves a sting, even in poor Rosa's existence, towards you." Previous, however, as has been already stated, to the receipt of the two last letters, she relented. She was not inveterate and obstinate; she had strong inducements to keep up, if possible, matrimonial society; her daughter was still unprovided for; her friends were, and possibly she herself was, averse to make her separation known to the world. She might also be alarmed lest he should commit an act of violence on himself; she therefore consented once more to try him, and, accordingly, on the 18th of October, 1817, writes the following letter:—"I have received your two letters, of the 13th and 14th of October, and their enclosure. Let us say no more about it, mon cher ami. I shall be happy [109] and willing to consider you in future, and if you can but permanently profit by all the misery we have gone through, I hope we may yet pass many years of comfort, and as if nothing had happened." This surely is no want of generosity. "On my part, I assure you I forgive you, and will sincerely try to forget; and on yours I hope you will excuse any violence of words on my part; for, after all, in any case, it is as useless as it is unnecessary, for it proves nothing one way or the other; I will say no more on this subject at present." She then proceeds to matters of business, respecting his property, and requests he will not return till he has settled all his concerns in Ireland.

In his answer, No. 8, he makes the most faithful promises: "I am sure, my dearest Emily, my dear little soul, you will not expect me to describe my feelings at your last letter. After your feelings had been so much wounded, I confess I did not expect so great a blessing; I cannot be too thankful." He then promises what his future conduct shall be; and in answer to that part of her letter where she apologises for any intemperate words, he says: "But, indeed, indeed I do, on my part, entirely forgive any thing I ever had to complain of; I well know I brought every thing upon myself, by a bad outset; I changed you, and therefore you cannot be justly chargeable. I must not neglect to say that I shall be anxious to make arrangements, such as you must naturally desire, to secure you in case of any unfortunate recurrence. I do not like to mention that, but it is necessary for you that it should be mentioned, and that your mind should be quite at ease on so important a point." This [110] was a right feeling of generosity and of self knowledge, to guard against a recurrence of ill-treatment. And in answer to her expressed hope "that he would permanently profit," he says, "You will be rewarded, I am sure, at the hands of providence for what you have done."

In consequence of this forgiveness, a deed of reconciliation is substituted for the articles of separation, by which Lord Westmeath contracts to make a settlement upon Lady Westmeath and her issue; but engages expressly, that if he renews his ill-treatment, she shall be at liberty to live apart from him; and this is said, and perhaps not improperly said, to be a prospective deed of separation, and of no legal validity;(a) but it is, on the part of Lord Westmeath, a solemn act, fully acknowledging, in general terms, his past misconduct and ill-treatment of his wife; and in that view, as evidence of the deliberate admission of the conduct imputed, it is not unimportant.

(a) See Durant v. Titley, 7 Price, 577, and Roper on Husband and Wife, 2nd edit., p. 269 et seq.

It has been said "that Lord Westmeath was inops consilii; that Mr. Sheldon was Lady Westmeath's legal adviser and attached friend;" but Mr. Sheldon states that, in each of these arrangements, he earnestly pressed Lord Westmeath to call in professional assistance; that Lord Westmeath refused, being anxious that the transactions should be known to as few persons as possible; but that he took great pains repeatedly to examine the deed himself, so that whatever it contains was carefully considered, and advisedly agreed to. This deed bears date on the 17th of December, 1817; and recites that the parties "were on the [111] point of separating; but by the intervention of mutual friends the said countess had agreed to cohabit with Lord Westmeath, after he shall have executed these presents, and thereby made such provision for their issue, and also such provisional maintenance for the said countess, as is hereinafter mentioned." After settling the property, then comes this proviso: "Provided always, and it is hereby admitted by the said earl, that the said countess hath agreed to live and cohabit with him on this express condition; that in case it shall unfortunately happen that by a renewal of such differences as had nearly caused such separation the countess shall find herself compelled to cease to cohabit, and to live separate and apart from him." Then, after settling her provision, it goes on: "But such separation is only to take place in case of ill-usage or gross abuse from the said earl to the said countess." Such, then, are the terms on which the reconciliation is effected. She consents to return to cohabitation, protected by this deed.

Pausing here, at the end of 1817, am I to consider the charge of cruelty established against Lord Westmeath? General violence of temper and several acts of personal injury are deposed to by three witnesses—Mackenzie, Miss Wood, and Service. The first speaks to what occurred in Ireland, the two latter to behaviour in France. These witnesses are corroborated by distinct parol admissions, proved also by three witnesses —Wood, Sheldon, and Stephens; still more fully corroborated by the correspondence, and by Lord Westmeath's own letters; and, finally, by this [112] very deed. On this body of evidence, I fully concur in opinion with the Chancellor of London, "that there is proof of cruelty sufficient to have entitled the wife to a separation, if such a sentence had not been barred by this subsequent reconciliation." But Lady Westmeath consented to be reconciled; the parties again cohabited, and she became pregnant. This return to cohabitation does certainly amount to a condonation, which forms a legal bar to a separation, on account of preceding cruelty.

The case then resolves itself into the question whether any subsequent acts took place, furnishing fresh grounds of legal complaint, or at least reviving former wrongs; and, in connection with those former wrongs, creating reasonable and just apprehension of a renewal of ill-treatment. This condonation has been termed conditional; but all condonations are impliedly conditional, though it seldom happens that the conditions are so expressly declared as in the present instance. Lord Stowell, in the case of Ferrers v. Ferrers, thus describes condonation and its effects: "Condonation is a conditional forgiveness, that does not take away the right of complaint in case of continuation of adultery, which operates as a reviver of former acts." (a) In the present case the condonation creates a bar; but it is a bar accompanied by circumstances rendering it an impediment as slight and as easily removed by "a reviver of former acts," as can well be described.

[113] The force of condonation varies according to circumstances; the condonation by a husband of a wife's adultery, still more, repeated reconciliations after repeated adulteries, create a bar of far greater effect than does the condonation by a wife of repeated acts of cruelty committed by the husband. In the former case the husband shews himself not sufficiently sensible to his own dishonour, and to his wife's contamination; and such reconciliations, often repeated, amount almost to a licence to her future adultery, so as to form nearly an insuperable and immoveable bar; but the forbearance of the wife, and her repeated forgiveness of personal injury, in hopes of softening the heart and temper of her husband, and under the feelings of a mother anxious to continue in the care and nurture of her children, are even praiseworthy, and create but a slight bar, removed by the reasonable apprehension of further violence. Forbearance in bringing a suit even, on a charge of adultery against the husband, is thus noticed by Lord Stowell in that same case of Ferrers v. Ferrers. "It may not only be excusable but meritorious, in hopes of reconciliation; and there is a great difference between the husband and wife on this point."

(a) Ferrers v. Ferrers, 1 Hagg. Con. 130. And, further upon the same case, see vol. i. 781*, notis.

Cruelty, in almost every instance, must consist of successive acts of ill-treatment at least, if not of personal injury, so that something of a condonation of the earlier ill-treatment must in all such cases necessarily take place. But, on the present occasion, the wife bears long in silence; she endures injuries personal and mental. In 1815 they become so far intolerable to her feelings that she talks of separating, but forgives, and is reconciled. In 1817 she again insists on a separation, but [114] after his letters—contrite—entreating—solemnly promising future kindness; on the execution of a deed, protecting her, as she vainly hopes, against a renewal of ill-treatment; at the earnest solicitation of her husband; and with the anxious desire of her friends not to make their disagreements known, she consents to make another trial. Under such circumstances the former injuries would be revived by subsequent misconduct of a slighter nature than that which would constitute original cruelty; and for this plain reason, that the apprehension of danger would be more easily and more justly excited. A bar the reconciliation undoubtedly would be, in case no further ill-treatment of any sort took place; if, from that time, the husband fulfilled his promises; if he discharged his marital obligations in the manner which the law requires, and, as it expresses it, "by treating his wife with conjugal kindness," the law would not allow the wife, from mere fancy and caprice, again to separate herself. It could, as the deed correctly expressed it, "only take place in case of subsequent ill-usage by the husband."

But what takes place? In the month of May the wife, notwithstanding her pregnancy, demands a separation; she will on no other terms abstain from a suit in the Ecclesiastical Court. The husband most unwillingly, but on her insisting, and in order to avoid meeting her complaint in a Court of Justice, agrees to a deed of separation, thereby confessing—and the parol evidence fully confirms this admission—that she was entitled to a separation, which was only "to take place in case of his ill-usage or gross abuse." This deed of separation, bearing date May 30, 1818, [115] recites, "Whereas Lord Westmeath, at the particular instance, and at the sole desire of Lady Westmeath, agreed to live separate and apart from her, and to allow such separate maintenance and yearly provision for her and her child, or children, as is hereinafter mentioned." Then follow the provision and the usual covenants, that she shall live apart unmolested, and that he shall bring no suit or process to compel her to cohabit.

As a deed of separation upon mutual agreement, on account of unhappy differences, though containing a covenant not to bring a suit for restitution of conjugal rights, these articles would offer no impediment to the husband's present suit, but as evidence against him, necessarily implying a confession of ill-usage subsequent to the condonation, they appear unanswerable, and are a strong acknowledgment that the casus fœderis had occurred. On that confession alone, coupled with the character of his temper and former acts, if the case had even rested here—if the parties had never met after the execution of that deed—I should have entertained considerable doubt whether the husband was entitled to the aid of the Court to compel his wife to return; whether the Court would not, at least, dismiss the wife. It would be a new case, and at present I give no opinion upon it, as it may be unnecessary to solve that doubt; and, if unnecessary to solve it, the full discussion of the point would be inconvenient among the mass of matter which composes the present suit; at all events, it is proper first to examine the remainder of this painful history.

The deed before the Court, dated in May, but executed in August, is not the only evidence of the subsequent ill-usage; there is other proof both [116] of his admissions and of his acts. In May, 1818, Mr. Stephens came to England to furnish an account of Lord Westmeath's property, and to assist in arranging the separate maintenance. He, Mr. Sheldon, and Mr. Wood had several meetings with Lord Westmeath on the subject, and they all speak to Lord Westmeath's admissions.

Mr. Stephens, on the twenty-third article, states, "Lord Westmeath wished to be permitted to cohabit with Lady Westmeath; she would not consent to this. Lord Westmeath admitted that he had given her cause to require and insist on a separation if she were resolved so to do; and that, as she would not yield the point, his lordship consented, though reluctantly, to the measure, and ultimately executed the deed aforesaid." To the twenty-fifth article he deposes: "Lord Westmeath, after the execution of the deed, asked and entreated, and he did certainly urge strongly the request, that he might have a bed-room in Stratford Place, though quite distinct from her ladyship's. Lady Westmeath objected to this; but Mr. Wood, Mr. Sheldon, and the deponent having all recommended it, in order to conceal their separation from the world, Lady Westmeath yielded the point, and consented that his lordship should be permitted to sleep in the house for a short time, till he should remove either to Ireland or to some foreign settlement, his lordship having asked such indulgence only for a short time, and being in expectation of getting some appointment abroad."

Here, then, were full admissions that his conduct had been such as to entitle his wife to a separation; he submits to it most unwillingly, and [117] these were the means used, and the terms granted, in respect to his having a bed-room in the house.

Mr. Sheldon, on the twenty-third article, fully confirms this account. "After the deed of December, 1817, had been executed, and Lord and Lady Westmeath had cohabited for a few months, her complaints of his ill-treatment were renewed, and her determination to be separated from him was again expressed. Various interviews and discussions took place between his lordship, Mr. Wood, the Rev. Mr. Stephens, and deponent. Mr. Stephens was his lordship's agent, Mr. Wood was present as the mutual friend of both; deponent renewed his earnest solicitation that his lordship would employ some professional adviser on his own part; but he would not. Lord Westmeath was very reluctant to sign any deed, but Lady Westmeath was resolute; and Lord Westmeath, admitting, as he did, the justice of her accusation against him, yielded consent, though he appeared to be seeking delay by various contrivances." And on the twenty-fifth article he says, "Lord Westmeath laboured hard for permission to have a room in any house which Lady Westmeath might take, in order, as he said, to save appearances, as he was very desirous the world might not know he was separated from his wife. To this Lady Westmeath strongly objected, and made the most determined resistance to it. Lady Salisbury, who was very anxious to save appearances, and Mr. Wood, who acted the part of a friend to Lord Westmeath, united their influence with Lady Westmeath, and, after a considerable time, she reluctantly yielded her [118] consent to his having a room in the house, provided the house was entirely under her controul, and the servants also, excepting his lordship's valet. The deed was delayed some time in consequence of this struggle. Nothing could be more explicit than Lord Westmeath's declarations that he would be considered merely a lodger, having no right to cohabitation, and no controul or authority in the house, or over the servants, being merely under the roof by sufferance."

After the month of May, then, there was no matrimonial cohabitation. The permission respecting a bed-room, thus obtained and thus accepted, forms no continued condonation; it only shews that Lady Westmeath was at length induced to give way to the wishes and advice of her friends, though highly repugnant to her own feelings, and contrary, in my opinion, to her own better judgment; for, as matters have turned out, it was very imprudent advice.

It was argued that Lady Westmeath, by consenting to this arrangement, has shewn that she had no apprehension of personal injury from the residence of Lord Westmeath in the same house with her, and that, therefore, she may safely return to him now; but surely she was then in a very different state of protection from what she was, or would be, while cohabiting with him as his wife. She was in her own house, surrounded by her own servants, having very little communication with Lord Westmeath, and, what is highly important, sleeping apart from him; for his more frequent acts of intemperate violence broke out in the night, when no person was present. Under such an arrangement she was exposed to much less danger than if they were living on the ordinary [119] terms of husband and wife. If this was a degraded and galling situation on his part, he had reduced himself to it by his own temper and passions, and he had solemnly bound himself, both by verbal promises and by a formal deed, to submit to it.

What, then, was his conduct after the separation in May? Did it shew that reason and reflection had taught him to subdue the turbulence of his temper? Had he acquired more self-command? Had he become convinced that the best mode of preserving his character in society, and of regaining possibly even the forgiveness and affections of his wife, was by patiently disciplining his mind into coolness and self-controul, and by strictly fulfilling the conditions which he had deliberately undertaken to observe? Or did his subsequent conduct rather shew that his passions had become, if possible, more domineering and despotic; that no engagements could bind him so as to controul them; and that, to place his wife again under his marital authority would, in all probability, expose her to a repetition of acts of ungovernable fury, and subject her to the risk of personal injury?

The instrument, originally signed in May, was a short deed of covenant, by which he engaged that, on a future occasion, regular articles should be executed; for there was then no time to prepare the latter, Mr. Sheldon being obliged to go into Yorkshire, and Lord Westmeath intending to visit Ireland. Before his departure Lord Westmeath took a most extraordinary step: he had desired a copy of the deed of covenant to be made for him; he went to Mr. Sheldon's chambers in his absence, and finding the deed had been sent to a stationer's to be copied, he proceeded to the stationer's shop, accompanied by Mr. Sheldon's [120] clerk, who left him there. Learning, on inquiry, that the copy was not completed, he went away, and returned in half an hour. The copy being still unfinished, he again went away, returned a third time, and then, under pretence of assisting the stationer, a woman, in comparing the copy with the original, he got possession of the executed instrument, tore it, put it into his pocket, and left the shop. It would not become the Court to designate and animadvert upon this act in terms which it deserves. Lord Westmeath soon became aware of the impropriety of this outrage; he wrote twice to Mr. Sheldon, on his way to Ireland. When there, he communicated what he had done to his agent, Mr. Stephens, and became anxious to hasten back to England, in order to make the best reparation he could by executing a new instrument. The Court reluctantly notices this act; but it so strongly marks the ungovernable state of his mind that it would be unfit to pass it over without remark, as it forms another trait in what appears to me to be the principal feature in the case. A new deed is prepared; not a mere deed of covenant, but full articles of separation, and is executed in August, but is ante-dated the preceding May.

During his residence in Stratford Place—allowed only in the manner already stated by the witnesses—Lord Westmeath, according to the account given by the two female servants, Johnson and Wetherly, was frequently quarrelling with Lady Westmeath, speaking in the French language, and appearing in violent passions. Such is the manner in which he used the indulgence he had obtained of having a residence in the house, in order to save appearances.

[121] In the month of November of that year Lady Westmeath was delivered of a son, of whom she became pregnant before the separation. Even that situation could not protect her from his temper; for, as Johnson deposes, "Lord Westmeath quarrelled violently with her ladyship and was in a great passion, which she, the witness, on account of her time, thought particularly cruel and brutal." That is just before or just after the confinement, which is an aggravation. Johnson also states that, during her confinement, "Lady Westmeath was greatly in want of money, even for the clothing of her infant;" and Mr. Stephens mentions that about that time he received a letter from Lord Westmeath directing him to pay no more money to Lady Westmeath. It is true that Stephens adds, "Very speedily after, if not the very next post, it was followed by another letter, desiring the deponent to pay no attention to the former letter." But such a step at such a time, in direct breach and contravention of the deed he had entered into, shews the intemperate passion of Lord Westmeath.

In the beginning of 1819 Lady Westmeath removed to Bolton Street; and painful as must have been the treatment she experienced from her husband, she did not violate the agreement she had been prevailed upon to make—of allowing him a bed-room in the house. For some time she admitted him to take his meals with her, and in order to keep up appearances in the world she occasionally went with him into public and to parties; but, in April, she thought it necessary to her peace to decline dining at the same table.

It is manifest from the history that Lord Westmeath had about this time worked himself [122] up into a determination of using all the means in his power to put an end to the deed of separation, and to resume the management and controul of the house and servants. On Good Friday, 1819, as it comes out in an interrogatory addressed to Mr. Wood by Lord Westmeath, he rushed into the house of Mr. Wood, one of the trustees, and, as he states it, "in a violent rage, holding up both his fists at respondent, demanded, in a lofty tone, whether respondent had not received things which had been taken out of his house? Respondent replied that Lady Westmeath had asked respondent's leave, the night before she left town, to send some things to his house, to which respondent had consented, and they were accordingly sent. Upon which Lord Westmeath said, I am answered; and immediately left the room with the same rapidity and violence he had entered it." He afterwards sent a friend and relation to require an explanation respecting some expressions that had passed. Upon this transaction again it is only necessary to observe that though no act of personal ill-treatment to his wife, yet it marks his extreme violence, and how entirely he was under the dominion of passion.

About this time Johnson, Lady Westmeath's maid, speaks of his general conduct. She also relates an occurrence which took place soon after, and was apparently the sequel of this strange interview with Mr. Wood. "Violent disagreements took place in Bolton Steet; that is, violent on the part of Lord Westmeath, sometimes in her ladyship's room, sometimes in the passage. She has heard his lordship storming at her ladyship's door when he could not get in. His [123] lordship usually began in French; but when he had worked himself up into a rage, which he did not unfrequently, he would change to English; and deponent has heard him, on such occasions, use terms which convinced her that the deed of separation was the cause. He used to threaten that he would assume his rights again, and be master, and that he would bring down her little ladyship to her proper level, and shew her to the world in her true character; frequently, when speaking in French, his lordship's hurried, angry, loud tone of speaking, all over trembling with rage, and his whole manner, shewed how violent he was: and his passion was excessive at times. Lady Westmeath was commonly calm; though deponent does not depose that her ladyship never was provoked to anger—for she was sometimes, his conduct being more than could be borne—yet he was the aggressor whenever deponent had the means of witnessing the commencement of the quarrel. On one occasion his lordship found his way into her ladyship's bed-room when she was dressing for an evening party: deponent was dressing her. He began in French. Her ladyship said but little, and in a calm unirritating manner: he became more and more angry; he could not govern himself at all; he was quite in a frightful rage, and stormed and raved like one that was mad: he proceeded after some time in English; it was against Mr. Wood: called him all sorts of names—a scoundrel, villain, blackguard, bogtrotter; said he would challenge him, and make him fight here or in France: that one of them should bite the dust: and, throwing himself on the floor, he swore (for [124] he used quantities of oaths all the time) that if he had not a leg to stand upon, he would shoot at him as he lay. Deponent did not leave the room, as it was a general order to her, from Lady Westmeath, never to leave her when Lord Westmeath came into her bed-room. It ended by Lord Westmeath bouncing out of the bed-room. Lady Westmeath was, as deponent believes, very much terrified; she had all the appearance of being so: and indeed it could not be otherwise, his passion was so violent. This was, as deponent believes, about May, 1819."

Here, again, it is only necessary to observe that this conduct created just ground of terror, though the menaces are not directed against his wife; yet the rage is so extreme as to expose her to danger. An unguarded expression, or misapprehended word, might have changed the direction of his vengeance, and brought it upon herself; more especially if the servant's presence had not restrained him. Looking back to the whole history—for the Court is not at liberty to disconnect the transactions, if it wishes to do justice between the parties—I cannot think that the law imposes on the wife the obligation of continuing, or that she could safely continue, in matrimonial society with a husband who, up to this period, had so conducted himself.

The only remaining transaction necessary to be examined is that which took place in June, and induced Lady Westmeath to withdraw from her house, leaving him in possession of it, and thus finally breaking off all intercourse with him.

In furtherance of his plan for the resumption of the domestic government, he, on this day, demanded of the housekeeper what wages were due to [125] her, and required her to deliver up to him her books and papers. This she refused, on the ground that Lady Westmeath, whose servant she considered herself to be, was absent at Mr. Wood's, in a neighbouring street. On this refusal, Lord Westmeath broke open the housekeeper's presses, and took forcible possession of all her papers, and whatever he found therein. The conduct of each of the parties will be more correctly described in the words of the witnesses; or, at least, by abstracting the most material parts of their evidence. Johnson speaks to the earlier part, and afterwards to the conclusion of the scene. She mentions that while they were at dinner in the housekeeper's room, Lord Westmeath looked in, and desired Wetherly to come to him after dinner: "From his manner she judged something was the matter; she went to her own room, Lord Westmeath came there, and asked where the housekeeper kept her accounts and keys? she said she did not know; he was apparently very angry and disturbed. In a little while deponent heard a great noise below, as of bursting open locks and bolts violently—a crash; she was alarmed and staid where she was, till called down stairs by Lady Westmeath's voice." Wetherly then gives the following statement:—"After she had dined she went to Lord Westmeath, as he had desired; his lordship spoke to her in the dining room; asked her what wages were due to her; she told him how many months; he said he was going to pay and discharge her; desired to have the books, keys, and accounts: deponent told his lordship she was Lady Westmeath's servant, and could not give them up unless she was present and ordered her. His lordship was in a great passion, [126] flew out at the deponent, called a man servant, and sent him for a constable; said he would take them; he turned from her: she was just by the door, and as he had used personal violence to her once before, she did not know but he might do it again, so she made her escape, and got out of the house; she went to Clarges Street, to Mr. Wood's, where Lady Westmeath was, and did not return to Bolton Street for about eleven days, when she went to fetch her own things, when his lordship returned some letters and papers which were her own property, and some money which belonged to her."

The next witness, who speaks to the same affair, is Miss Weldon, who had been governess in Mr. Wood's family, and who returned to Bolton Street with Lady Westmeath on this occasion: "Deponent accompanied Lady Westmeath to Bolton Street; when they got there Lady Westmeath went immediately into the housekeeper's room, followed by the deponent. Immediately afterwards Lord Westmeath entered. It was plain the presses and drawers had been forcibly opened. Lord Westmeath was in a most violent and extraordinary passion, amounting to almost fury, though apparently in a degree exhausted; he was as pale as a sheet of writing paper, his lip quivered, his whole frame shook with rage, his shirt collar unbuttoned, and his whole appearance that of a man greatly agitated and irritated. Lady Westmeath asked him, with greater coolness than she could have expected, what he had been about; Lord Westmeath replied, his voice tremulous with passion, I have been breaking open your presses, and I will do it again. I will shew you that I will be master [127] in this house. Lady Westmeath said that, if she was to be exposed to such horrors, she must send to her trustees for protection. Lord Westmeath said he should like to see the trustees that would dare to interfere with him. Upon this, Lady Westmeath left the room; she was followed by Lord Westmeath: deponent remained in the housekeeper's room. In about ten minutes Lord Westmeath came back, and said as he supposed she was there as a spy, he must desire her to quit the house. She expressed her readiness, if Lady Westmeath consented, but otherwise she could not go. Lord Westmeath left the room. Lady Westmeath came there, entreated deponent not to leave her, saying she would come back to deponent in a few minutes; after being absent about a quarter of an hour she returned." They waited in the drawing room till her solicitor, Mr. Talbot, came; and having consulted with him, they went to Mr. Wood's house in Clarges Street. "Lady Westmeath was certainly under alarm, and terrified, as it appeared to the deponent, but preserved her presence of mind. She was cool, and spoke calmly; but it appeared to the deponent evident that she did not consider herself safe in the house in Bolton Street; or under the same roof with Lord Westmeath; and deponent saith that, as far as she could judge, her alarm was well founded."

A short passage in Johnson's evidence concludes the narrative. "On being called by Lady Westmeath, she went to her in her bed-room. Lord Westmeath was with her ladyship; he said, on deponent's coming in, what do you want your maid for—as a witness against me? Lady [128] Westmeath said whenever she had occasion for her, and wanted her, she should call her; and she added, I desire, Lord Westmeath, you will leave my room. Upon which he said he would not; that he would come into her room when he pleased, and stay as long as he pleased; that he would have no more of these separate doings; that he would be master of his own house; that he would go down stairs and turn Miss Weldon out of the house, and would have no more interference from that family in his concerns, and then left the room, apparently to execute his purpose on Miss Weldon. Deponent then assisted her mistress in moving her boxes, which had papers in them, and other things, to deponent's room, where Lady Westmeath filled her pockets, gave deponent as many as she could dispose of about her person, dispatched deponent to seek the children, who were out walking, and send them to Lady Salisbury's, for whom deponent received a note, and she then left the house. That on the occasion deposed of Lady Westmeath was undoubtedly very much alarmed at his lordship; the whole scene was very alarming. Lady Westmeath is a woman of wonderful self-possession, but she could not conceal that she was alarmed on the occasion."

Here, then, the scene closes; and the Court is to decide whether, under all the circumstances of the whole case, Lady Westmeath was justified in quitting cohabitation. Without recapitulating the facts of this painful history, which the Court has gone through with much detail, in order to mark distinctly the grounds upon which its conclusion must rest; but looking to the ungovernable vio-[129]-lence of this husband's temper on these several occasions—looking to the former acts into which that temper had betrayed him—looking to his conduct at the separation of beds in May, 1818—looking to these final transactions in the face of all his engagements—his resumption of his marital authority by forcible means—his refusal to quit her bed-room—his declaration "that he would come into her room when he pleased, and stay in it as long as he pleased, that he would have no more of these separate doings," I do think that she had a reasonable foundation for an apprehension of renewed personal violence. I so far join in that apprehension as to think, and be morally convinced by the evidence, that if she had submitted to a continuance of domestic society under those terms, and had allowed of further matrimonial cohabitation, there was great risk, and a strong probability, that she would have been exposed to a repetition of acts of personal injury. I am of opinion that the case fully comes up to the requisites of the law, as laid down in the several adjudged cases to which I have referred, and more especially, to use the words of Lord Stowell, "that the passions of the husband are so much out of his own controul that it is inconsistent with the personal safety of the wife to continue in his society."

If such was her danger at that time, has the Court any reason to conclude that she would be in a state of greater security if compelled now to return to his house and home? Has he shewn that he is become sensible of his past misconduct? Is he emendatus? Are his mind and disposition softened down into conjugal kindness? Where are the proofs of it?

[130] After the separation he carries his infant son to Clonyn, where the child dies just before he becomes a year old. Lady Westmeath, on hearing of the illness, with the natural feelings of a mother, sets off, accompanied by Lord Cranborne, her brother, and her maid, but arrives the day after the child died; she stays a few hours, and returns to England.

Till 1821 Lady Rosa, then about six or seven years of age, had been living with her mother, and in charge of a governess. In that year Lord Westmeath was residing at Mrs. Winsor's, in Bolton Street. The child is brought frequently by the governess to visit him; and one day the child is detained by Lord Westmeath, the governess dismissed without her, and in about ten days the child sent out of town, to a friend's house in Hampshire. This seems to have been done without the least notice, or previous preparation of the mother for the infliction of such a stroke. She applied to a Court of Justice to regain the possession; but the rights of a father are too strong to enable that Court to afford her any relief. His lordship not only still persists in the same course, but will not allow Lady Westmeath even to see the child, or at least would not as late as the year 1824; for his own witness, Lady Salisbury, who was examined in March, 1824, and who was most likely to be correctly informed as to the fact, states, on the twenty-first interrogatory, "that respondent believes that the producent, Lord Westmeath, has prohibited the ministrant, Lady Westmeath, from seeing her child, Lady Rosa Nugent, and has prevented her from so doing." Of the reason for this [131] course of conduct respecting the little girl the Court may not be fully apprised; but, judging from what appears in the suit, the smallest speck is not attempted to be pointed out in the moral character of Lady Westmeath. Indeed, the very prayer, made in this suit for restitution of conjugal rights, to compel her to return to cohabitation, implies necessarily that he has no imputation to make against her, either as a wife, or a mother. The Court does not venture to blame Lord Westmeath in this respect, because all the facts are not before it; but as far as does appear, his conduct, in this particular, furnishes no affirmative evidence that he is disposed to shew greater kindness and forbearance towards this lady. The Court carries the inference no further.

Again, the parties have been engaged in litigation with each other from the moment of separation to the present time; not in one court only, but in all courts—in equity, common law, and ecclesiastical courts; and in those several jurisdictions Lord Westmeath has been the party commencing the proceedings. These circumstances are not likely to engender more good-will and cordiality. They do not operate as sweeteners to prepare the parties for the performance of matrimonial duties with affection and consideration.

Looking, therefore, to the present time, as well as to the time of their actual separation, I see no prospect of their practically living together in any degree of conjugal happiness, and in the proper discharge of the obligations of the marriage state; but looking at the case not practically, but strictly in a legal view, I am of opinion that to compel the wife to return to cohabitation would but ex-[132]-pose her to the risk and danger of renewed violence and personal injury.

In arriving at this conclusion, I trust that I have proceeded with due caution, weighing and considering again and again every transaction, with its accompanying circumstances, and every branch of the evidence in proof of them, and endeavouring to draw impartial inferences from the whole. I have formed my opinion, not only with the usual care and attention which the ordinary justice due to the parties would require, but with considerable hesitation and unaffected diffidence, on account of my respect for the learned Judge, who, in this case, has come to a different decision; but after mature deliberation, finding myself compelled to dissent, on this latter part of the case, from the judgment already given, I must not shrink from the duty which is cast upon me of reversing the sentence; for to shrink from the discharge of that official duty would be to defeat the very remedy by appeal which is afforded by the law.

I must, therefore, reverse the sentence; pronounce that Lady Westmeath has sufficiently proved her first allegation, charging her husband with cruelty, and is, on that account, entitled to a sentence of separation.

On a prayer from Lady Westmeath's proctor for costs generally, the Court, after a few observations from counsel on that question, and on the form of the sentence, further pronounced that Lady Westmeath had failed in proof of the adultery; and condemned Lord Westmeath in the costs of both Courts, excepting those occasioned by the charges of adultery in Ireland.

[133] From this sentence Lord Westmeath appealed to

The High Court of Delegates, Trinity Term, 2nd Session, 1827.—Costs in the Courts below not allowed to be taxed in the Court of Appeal, as between husband and wife; or (before sentence) as between party and party.—Costs taxed de die in diem, between husband and wife, though she had a separate income.

After a negative issue had been given to the libel of appeal, and the process transmitted, Lady Westmeath's proctor, on the second session of Trinity Term, 1827, brought in three bills of costs, and prayed to be heard on taxation. It was objected that if the application rested on the principle of costs as between husband and wife, Lady Westmeath having neglected to procure the taxation, de die in diem, in the Courts below, it could not now be enforced in the Court of Appeal; and if as between party and party, the condemnation in costs formed part of the sentence, the subject of appeal from the Court of Arches.

The Con-Delegates rejected the prayer as far as the taxation of the bills in the inferior Courts; but directed an act on petition to be entered into as to the costs in the High Court of Delegates.

On the 23d of June, 1828, this act on petition was debated before the whole commission, consisting of Mr. Justice Bayley, Mr. Justice Park, Mr. Baron Garrow, Dr. Arnold, Dr. Burnaby, Dr. Daubeny, Dr. Dodson, Dr. Pickard.

It was contended for Lord Westmeath that costs ought not to be taxed against him de die in diem, as Lady Westmeath was possessed of a sufficient separate income:

for Lady Westmeath, that there was nothing to take the case out of the ordinary rule, entitling the wife to have her costs [134] taxed de die in diem. A long statement as to the comparative income of the parties was made on both sides, and the Court finally granted the prayer of Lady Westmeath's petition as to the costs in the High Court of Delegates.

After the usual proceedings before the Con-Delegates the principal cause came on before the whole commission at Serjeants' Inn, and the Court,(a) after hearing, on the 13th, 14th, 15th, 16th and 18th of April, Sir Charles Wetherell, Mr. Adam, Drs. Lushington and Addams, as counsel for the Marchioness of Westmeath; and the King's advocate, Mr. Denman, Dr. Phillimore, and Mr. Broderick for the Marquess of Westmeath, affirmed the sentence of separation pronounced by the Court of Arches, and remitted the cause. (See infra, 148.)

MIDDLETON v. MIDDLETON.(b) Consistory, Feb. 21, 1795.—In a suit for separation by reason of the wife's adultery (publication having passed), the Court, on an affidavit that material facts are newly discovered, may, in its discretion, allow the cause to be opened for the purpose of pleading further adultery.—The renouncing all further allegations, unless exceptive, is the virtual conclusion of the principal cause as to the rights of parties: leave for further pleading is in the discretion of the Court.—In suits for adultery the party is not limited to the contents of the libel, but may plead fresh charges and obtain a sentence on facts not existing at the commencement of the suit; but publication is a bar to further pleading as of right.

This was a suit, brought by the husband against the wife, for adultery.

In Trinity Term, 1793, the libel; on the third session of Hilary Term, 1794, an allegation on the part of the wife; and on the 5th of June in that year a responsive allegation on behalf of the husband, were admitted. On the third session of Trinity Term, 9th of July, 1794, publication was decreed; and, on the fourth session, both proctors declared they gave no allegation, unless exceptive, to witnesses; and on the by-day after Michaelmas Term, viz. the 5th of December, an [135] exceptive allegation, given in by the wife, was admitted. On this exceptive plea publication of the depositions had not been prayed, nor had the cause been concluded, when on the second session of Hilary Term, 1795, the proctor for the husband brought in an affidavit of Mr. Middleton and himself, stating, "that since the publication of the depositions, evidence of certain facts of adultery had come to their knowledge," and they prayed the cause to be opened for the purpose of giving an allegation in the principal cause. This was objected to on behalf of the wife; and the Judge assigned to hear, on act on petition, on the next court-day. On the third session this assignation was continued; and the allegation being brought in, the Court further assigned to hear on the admission thereof on the fourth session, if the petition did not obstruct.

On that day, after hearing counsel on both sides, the Court thus delivered its opinion.

Judgment—Sir William Scott (Lord Stowell). I see no foundation for any imputations of delay on either party: the citation was taken out in Easter Term, 1793; a libel, containing a large mass of matter, was given in on the first session of Trinity Term, and it is said that seventy witnesses have been examined: the production of so many, and these too on commissions in the country, did not exceed the usual allowance of time. The wife gave in her allegation early, and proceeded with great dispatch in the examination of her witnesses, and a responsive allegation was brought in on the 5th of June, 1794. The parties subsequently renounced all further allegations, [136] unless exceptive, which, undoubtedly, is the virtual conclusion of the principal cause, as far as the rights of parties extend. They cannot retract without the leave of the Court; and the question is whether the Court, in its discretion, shall, under the circumstances, listen to the application and allow the party to plead.

The allegation I have not seen; but the affidavit, sworn to by Mr. Middleton and by his proctor, states, "That since the responsive plea has been given in, Mrs. Middleton, while residing at Lowestoff, has been observed to carry on a secret intercourse with a stranger of low condition, who had no acquaintance but her servants; that they had reason to suspect that this was the person mentioned in the proceedings as the adulterer, but they could not obtain the proofs till January; that they had since ascertained that the stranger was the alleged adulterer, and they had now collected facts which they believe are relevant and proper to be introduced, and that they are confident they shall be able to prove the same."

(a) Dr. Arnold was not present.

(b) Vid. sup. Hamerton v. Hamerton (Arches, Mich. T.), p. 24.

No doubt these matters are relevant, and that the party had a right to plead them before publication on the strictest principles of law and justice. It is every day's practice to introduce charges of adultery committed since the institution of the suit. It cannot be contended that a party is bound down to the contents of his original libel. In Newton v. Newton,(a)[1] and many other cases, it has been constantly held that fresh acts of adultery may be pleaded supplementarily; and that a sentence may be obtained on facts not existing at the commencement of the suit. The bar, in this case, would be publication, and it [137] operates to prevent the right of further pleading; which would be a dangerous proceeding, if assumed as a matter of absolute right. But the question is whether it be not proper for the Court, in its sound and legal discretion, under the circumstances of the case, to grant the permission prayed for; and, acting not from favour but from justice, to open the cause. It cannot be denied that the facts are material to the investigation of the question. If the wife has carried on a clandestine intercourse since the commencement of the suit, it would be explanatory of much obscurity which appears to hang over the cause on the face of the libel. What danger or injury can there be to the wife?

It is asked, where is the matter to stop? At that period where the proper and sound discretion of the Court will limit it. Does it follow that I am bound in like manner to admit twenty other allegations? I am to look at the circumstances and stage of the cause, and to form my judgment upon all. Two pleas only have hitherto been given by Mr. Middleton; one of them being responsive: and the facts now pleaded are such as, if publication did not withstand, the Court could not hesitate to admit. Now, the grounds on which in point of law publication is a bar are, first, the fear of subornation; secondly, the danger of the prolongation of the suit. Here are fresh facts to be proved; and, I presume, fresh witnesses to be examined: it is not proposed to supply the defect of the proof of the former pleas; but to establish facts having no existence at the time the libel was given in; and, therefore, there is no fear of subornation. The other ground of objection is the prolongation of the suit. I am told, however, these facts might be pleaded in the Court [138] of appeal, or that the husband might proceed on a new citation, dropping this. Where would be the advantage or convenience in driving the husband to an appeal, or to a fresh suit? How would the wife be taken out of peril and discomfort? I think I shall perform an act of justice favorable to the wife in suffering the cause to proceed in its present course to a complete termination. If these facts cannot be proved, her character will be vindicated; if proved, the Court will have the satisfaction of administering justice with full information, which satisfaction it would be difficult to feel under the confusion with which the suit set out. It, besides, is an allegation on the part of the husband, from whom there is less reason to fear protraction, as he is in a great measure to sustain the expences; and I therefore have all the assurance from the situation of the parties that he is sincere in the purpose for which he offers the allegation. As to myself, when I recollect the extreme obscurity which appeared in the original case, and the quantity of evidence produced, the introduction of this new matter will be a great relief. I owe it to my own conscience to give the case every instruction I can; and I think this allegation, and the evidence produced upon it, will contribute to throw great light on the real state of the facts, and I am convinced it will materially serve the interests of truth. I, therefore, am clearly of opinion that I ought to receive the allegation.(a)[2]

(a)[1] Consistory, 1781. See Webb v. Webb, vol. i. 349.

(a)[2] March 3.—The objections in the petition being thus overruled, the assignation "to hear on the admission of the allegation was continued." On the by-day the proctor for the wife alleged the cause to be appealed: and, at the same time, the Court was moved to admit the allegation.

Dr. Nicholl and Dr. Laurence for the husband. The hand of the Judge is tied effectually only by an inhibition: here none has yet been served. There are instances where, notwithstanding an appeal apud acta, the Judge has gone on, admitted an allegation, and decreed a requisition for the examination of witnesses. In Annesley v. Aylmer, Prerogative, 1790 (S. C. Delegates, 1791). The cause stood on act on petition.

[139] Arches, July 6.—From this decree, and from a further decree admitting the allegation, an appeal was prosecuted to the Court of Arches; when, after argument, the Court gave sentence, as follows:—

[140] Arches, July 6th, 1795.—Material facts, newly come to the knowledge of the party, may be pleaded after publication.—Before a party can plead after publication, he must shew (generally by affidavit) that the facts came to his knowledge since his former plea: the Court then ought to admit a plea of such facts.

Judgment—Sir William Wynne. The libel was, in this case, admitted in 1793. Many witnesses were examined: an allegation of the wife and a further allegation of the husband were given; the depositions on all these pleas were published: an exceptive allegation of the wife was also admitted; and another by the husband was asserted. The cause was in this state when an affidavit of the husband and his proctor averred that facts had lately come to their knowledge; and a prayer was made that an allegation might be admitted, it having been before [141] declared that neither party would tender any such plea; the Judge of the Consistory Court was of opinion that they might give such a plea. From this decree the wife appealed; and the question for my decision is whether the Court below exercised a proper discretion.

[142] Most certainly the Court is exceedingly cautious in admitting any plea after

---

Stevens prayed further time to give in an affidavit: this application was rejected, and the Court, Sir William Wynne, directed the cause to proceed. Stevens appealed apud acta. But the Court heard the petition and decreed administration. Oughton, tit. 306.

In Barwell v. Barwell, Prerogative, Hil. T. 1792. Willis propounded a will, exhibited an affidavit of scripts, and brought in an allegation (of which he had offered a copy to Stevens) and prayed it to be admitted. Stevens objected, and appealed apud acta; but the Court, Sir William Wynne, ordered the allegation to be read, admitted it, and decreed a requisition for the examination of witnesses. This is a case in point.

Per Curiam. What was the gravamen there?

Argument resumed. The Court ordering the allegation to be read.

No distinction arises from this being a case in which the Court exercises a discretion in respect to the admission of a plea, it being after publication. If the Court sees that delay is intended by the adverse party, it will now, in its discretion, admit this allegation. The step taken in overruling the petition was only preparatory; the allegation might have been admitted on the last session.

Per Curiam. Why was it not then brought on?

Argument resumed. Merely for the convenience of the counsel on the other side, that they might look over the allegation, and see if it were opposable. It was therefore, in fact, admitted nisi on that day; and we are now entitled to that which was then virtually the decree of the Court: the plea was allowed, if admissible, to be admitted. What can be the injury to Mrs. Middleton? The expence will fall upon the husband, and the wife will have an opportunity, in the Superior Court, of considering whether the allegation be objectionable; while, on the other side, a great injury might arise: the wife might appeal further on the same grievance, and might thus hang up the cause for a very long time.

Per Curiam. As I understand, this allegation was brought in on the Court-day before last; a copy tendered to Mrs. Middleton's proctor, and the assignation stood "upon admission next Court, if the petition did not obstruct," and that petition was overruled; therefore, regularly, the allegation ought then to have been debated. Why that was not done I do not know. If the opposite party would not accept a copy of the allegation, Mr. Middleton's proctor might then have read the plea, subject to the observations of the Court. The wife's proctor alleges that the cause is now appealed.

Dr. Swabey. This is not an appeal apud acta, as in the cases that have been cited. Here the proctor alleges the cause in due time and place to be appealed, which is different. By the canon law every act is appealable. On the last Court-day the petition was rejected, since which an appeal has been entered from what was then done. In other cases the appeals have been apud acta, interrupting the Court in what it was then doing, and in those cases the Judge has gone on, and sent the whole cause publication: there are strong objections which it is absolutely necessary for the party to get over; it would lead to subornation—witnesses might supply defects, might avoid contradictions, might make artificial evidence: these are evils which the Court will strive in every possible way to prevent, and it therefore always requires strict and legal proof that these evils cannot happen; it must be shewn that facts have come to the knowledge of the party since his former plea: this is always demanded, and is usually done by affidavit. The Court has the power, on such affidavit, and always does and ought, for the purposes of justice, to exert its authority in admitting a plea of facts, which, for want of being known, could not be pleaded before. Where such facts and such former want of information are shewn, the Court, I take it, will never shut its ears; for otherwise it might give sentence, when it knows that the party could possibly give a good reason against it. Where this danger is removed, there is only one other reason against admitting such a plea, namely, [143] delay, or want of proper diligence: but here there is an affidavit of the party and his proctor (which is always held sufficient), by which it appears from the date of the facts that they could not be within their knowledge. Only one fact is pleaded in 1793, and without here stating that fact, it is clear that the rest occurred in August, 1794, that is, since publication, which passed in July; therefore it is most evident that they must have come to the knowledge of the party after publication.

---

together to the Court of appeal. Where an appeal from a separate act has been entered out of Court, the Judge has usually deferred. In Raybold v. Raybold, Arches, Mich. Term, 1789, the Court made such a distinction.

Per Curiam. What is the disadvantage to Mrs. Middleton?

Dr. Swabey, as amicus curiæ, I know of none. The petition stated the substance of his allegation: the admission of the latter can therefore scarcely be said to make the charge public.

Per Curiam. This case comes within the principle of the cases cited. The Court is not, I think, legally obliged to defer to an appeal till an inhibition is served, nor, in my opinion, is there any sound distinction whether all the acts be done on the day on which the appeal is asserted, or some on a subsequent day. Generally the Court will be inclined to defer, unless circumstances afford a reason against it. It is, then, for the Court to consider whether, in order to do justice between the parties, it shall, in its discretion, defer to the appeal or not. The husband had a right to have his allegation debated on the last session: this forms a fair equity on which the Court may proceed. The party, offering the allegation, will bear the expences: he tries the experiment suo periculo; and I do not see in what way the interest of the other party is concerned to prevent it.

Another consideration weighs with me—the great and incurable grievance in these Courts that parties may appeal from every step, and that causes, by the occupation of the Court of Delegates, may be hung up long before an interlocutory decree can be pronounced. The Court will, in practice, consolidate the steps as much as it can, and will not drive a party to two appeals. Shall the Court, in this case, send up the party on an appeal against overruling the objections to the petition, and then, a second time, against the admission of the allegation? I hold it to be my duty to facilitate and expedite causes as much as I can, and to go as far as I can without breaking in upon the authority of the Superior Court. I therefore think I am at liberty to hear this allegation read, and to admit it if it appears admissible.

The allegation was then opened and read in pœnam.

Per Curiam. The act on petition stated that facts of an adulterous intercourse had newly come to the knowledge of Mr. Middleton, who prayed leave to give an allegation; and the Court thought itself bound in justice to all parties to grant permission. I should have done Mrs. Middleton a great injury if I had not given her an opportunity to clear her character from every imputation, so that I might proceed to the final hearing, or even to dismiss her without any drawback on her character. The allegation, now read, agrees with the statement of the petition; but, as I understand that Mrs. Middleton has appealed, I admit the allegation only in order to send it up to the Court of appeal: and I therefore make no observations, except that I think a responsive allegation would have been a more advisable step on the part of Mrs. Middleton than an appeal.

Allegation admitted.

The question, then, is whether the Court below did right in admitting this plea of facts undoubtedly material, and strictly applicable to the cause. Shall the Court, then, be barred from receiving such, when the party lays them before it as early as possible? One part of the circumstances is in January, 1795. It is said that the cause should not have been commenced if the husband had not evidence enough, and that he ought to go to sentence on the facts alleged in the former part of the case. I apprehend that is not so. If material circumstances come to the knowledge of the party after the commencement of the suit, or happen pendente lite, it would be very absurd for the Court, in a cause where the issue is, whether adultery has been committed at some time or other, not whether it has been committed at any particular time, to proceed to sentence without hearing facts stated to have occurred during the pendency of the suit. It is an unreasonable conception.

Again it is said, you may take out a new citation: but would the Court decide a cause when it sees there are facts which might induce a different opinion? I do not recollect the name of a similar case during my own practice, though I [144] think there has been such; but I have a note of Dr. Simpson and Dr. Paul, of Kell v. Kell in 1746, to this effect: "In a case of adultery facts allowed to be pleaded, after publication, which not laid in the libel." It is not said whether the facts happened after publication, and therefore this is a stronger case. On that authority, and on general reason, it strikes me that the Court below did perfectly right in suffering the allegation to be given in, and I, therefore, affirm the decree.

The Court pronounced against the appeal, retained the cause, and on the 6th of May, 1796, signed the sentence of separation as prayed by the husband.

DONELLAN v. DONELLAN. Consistory, 12th May, 1795.—In a suit for separation by reason of the wife's adultery the conclusion of the cause may be rescinded generally if the Court is of opinion, after the argument, that adultery is not sufficiently proved.

This was a cause of separation brought by the husband against the wife. The libel, after pleading the marriage, alleged that while the husband was absent in May, and the beginning of June, 1794, a person frequently visited and corresponded with the wife: it exhibited an original letter, alleged to be from the wife to the paramour; and another letter from the paramour to the wife, both fictitiously addressed; it pleaded her elopement, and cohabitation with him.

The evidence of this cohabitation was, that the first witness, a stranger to the wife, saw a woman in bed with the paramour; the second saw the wife in the same lodgings, and heard her called by his name; and the third deposed "that the [145] paramour confessed to him she was living in criminal connexion with him."

It was objected by Dr. Arnold, on the part of the wife, that the chief reliance, for proof of adultery, must be placed on what happened after the elopement; that the rule of the canon law required two witnesses before the Court could pronounce a fact fully proved: that though one witness to a fact, supported by circumstances, was sufficient, the rule had not been further relaxed: that being found in bed was sufficient evidence of adultery, but of that there must be legal proof: that identity was perhaps proved if the fact had been supported by other witnesses, or by other acts; that the confession of the paramour, not in the presence of the wife, was no evidence: that as to the letters, though of the handwriting of the parties, they were not dated; there was no proof of sending; nor in whose possession they were found, nor to whom addressed. The whole cause, therefore, rested on the testimony of one witness, and the law required more.

Per Curiam. I should wish to give the counsel for the husband time to consider the proofs in this case; for I think it would be relaxing the rules of evidence too much to pronounce for the divorce on the present proofs. It is strange that neither the second nor third witness should depose to any conversation. I shall therefore permit the conclusion to be rescinded generally; for I see enough to incline me to think it is a fair case; but there is not sufficient proof to warrant a sentence.

Conclusion rescinded.

[146] CARGILL v. SPENCE. Prerogative, Easter Term, 1st Session, 1796.—In a testamentary cause the Court—after hearing the arguments and delivering its opinion of the insufficiency of the evidence—may rescind the conclusion, in order that the identity of the alleged testator may be pleaded and proved.

The Court (Sir William Wynne), after the argument in this case, which respected the validity of a seaman's will, stated its opinion, that though the execution of the will was sufficiently proved, the identity of the testator was not established; and then proceeded:—

It is impossible on this evidence to pronounce for the will, yet if, by practice, the Court can have an opportunity of establishing the fact, by allowing the party to supply the defect, it is bound to do so. It is not for me to inquire whether the paper be officious or not, but whether it be the will of the asserted testator or not.

In the case of Lady Amelia Butler's will, which was executed in the presence of persons not acquainted with her, there was a defect of proof of identity; and the Court rescinded the conclusion in order to allow the link in the chain of proof to be supplied. I shall, therefore, rescind the conclusion in this case, and give the parties an opportunity of proving the identity.

There is also a paper which is insisted upon as material; but which is not proved on the interrogatories, though annexed to them. I shall also allow the opposers to plead and prove, if they think fit, that that letter is of the handwriting of Thomas Cargill, the executor: though my only object in rescinding the conclusion is to obtain proof of the identity.

[147] The following minute was taken down:—"The Judge having heard the proofs read and counsel on both sides, rescinded the conclusion of the cause for the purpose of permitting John Cargill to plead and prove the identity of the party deceased, and for permitting the adverse party to plead and prove the handwriting of an exhibit annexed to his interrogatories."

On the 4th Session of Easter Term an allegation, pleading identity, was admitted without opposition; three witnesses were examined upon it; and Cargill having admitted the handwriting of the exhibit, the Court, on the third session of Trinity Term, pronounced for the will, the identity being fully established.

HENLEY AND DUDDERIDGE v. MORRISON. Delegates, 3rd Feb., 1829.—In a suit for seaman's wages the Judge may properly rescind the conclusion of the cause for the admission of further evidence.

This was a suit for seaman's wages, wherein Lord Stowell, as Judge of the High Court of Admiralty, had, after the cause had been opened at the hearing, rescinded the conclusion in order to allow a second witness to be produced in support of the mariner's summary petition: and, on two subsequent occasions, the Judge, on affidavits, also rescinded the conclusion for the same purpose.

From this third rescinding of the cause an ap-[148]-peal was prosecuted, on the part of the owners, to the High Court of Delegates, wherein the Judges, viz. Mr. Justice Bayley, Mr. Justice Park, Dr. Daubeny, Dr. Phillimore, Dr. Gostling, Dr. Blake, Dr. Haggard, pronounced against the appeal, and declared "that the Judge of the Court below had proceeded rightly, justly and lawfully, and they condemned the appellants in costs, and remitted the cause."

WESTMEATH v. WESTMEATH.

An application in this cause (vide supra, 134) for a Commission of Review was rejected on the 24th of June, 1829.

Broderick in support of the application.

Lushington contrà.

---

[149] APPENDIX.

[See SKEFFINGTON v. WHITE, p. 631.]

The principles and object of the statutes of administration (31 Edw. 3, c. 11; 21 Hen. 8, c. 5) may be gathered from the construction put upon them by repeated decisions, and by long-established practice recognized by the Judges of different courts—common law, equity, and ecclesiastical—to have been to vest the right to administration in the person who is possessed of the beneficial interest in the personal estate. Thus, in the case of a feme covert, it has been determined that the husband has a right to the administration, not strictly as next of kin, but either under the equity of the statute of 21 Hen. 8, c. 5,(b) or under the earlier statute of 31 Edw. 3, c. 11, "as the next and most lawful friend," (c) or mero jure; (d) which right, as well as the right to the property, the statute of 29 Car. 2, c. 3, s. 25, declares the husband shall have, notwithstanding the statute of distributions (22 & 23 Car. 2, c. 10): yet still, "if the husband has departed with all his interest in his wife's fortune, he shall not have administration."(e) So also, in the case of an administration cum testamento annexo, the residuary legatee and his representatives ad infinitum are held entitled to the grant in preference to the next of kin.(f)

[150] On the same principle of interest, and in affirmance of a practice which had long prevailed, the following adjudged cases have determined that, under the statutes, the ordinary is bound only to grant the administration to such person as is next of kin at the intestate's death, and not to one who is not entitled to the beneficial interest in the effects, though, by the death of intermediate persons, he may have become next of kin at the time the grant is required.

SAVAGE v. BLYTHE. Prerogative, Hilary Term, 4th Session, 1796.—The stat. 21 Hen. 8, c. 5, applies only to such as are next of kin at the time of the death. Therefore the Court made the de bonis non grant to the executor of the administrator (the sole next of kin at the death) in preference to persons entitled in distribution, who had received their shares and signed releases.

Abraham Cocker died intestate, leaving a brother and several nephews and nieces. Administration was granted to the brother; and at the end of the year he distributed, taking the deceased's securities upon himself. The administrator died, leaving the securities due to the original deceased outstanding: he made a will and appointed an executor.

A decree was taken out against the nephews to shew cause why the administration de bonis non should not be granted to the executor of the brother administrator. The nephews appeared and prayed administration.

Sir William Scott and Dr. Nicholl for the executor. The question is whether the executor of the administrator or the next of kin is entitled to the administration de bonis non. It was necessary to cite the next of kin, though they have received their shares, executed releases, and thus discharged their interest. The Court is inclined in such grants to follow the interest, and give the handle to the person who has the interest. It would not, unless compelled by law, give the grant to persons without any interest. The 21 Hen. 8, c. 5, enacting that, on the death of an intestate, the administration is to be decreed to the next of kin, does not apply: it has been complied with: the administration was so granted in the first instance. The Court is not to go on in infinitum. Where a party has parted with all his interest in the effects, he has no right to the administration, Young v. Pierce (Freeman, 496). Great danger and inconvenience would ensue if persons were permitted to come into the management of the estate who have no interest, and who would have only to pay over to those entitled. This is the principle of the ordinary practice of granting administration with will annexed to the residuary legatee, though against the words of the statute, Isted v. Stanley (Dyer, 372).

[151] Dr. Swabey contrà. Though the parties have released their interest they have not renounced their right to the administration. In Young v. Pierce there was an agreement that the other party should take administration. In Isted v. Stanley the point decided was, that an executor of an executor, dying before probate, was not executor to the original testator, though entitled to administration if the residue was bequeathed to his testator; it is true it was stated that though there were next of kin it was the course of office to grant administration to the residuary legatee, which was (the reporter says) allowed to be law. The question is whether the 31 Edw. 3,

---

(b) Per Nichols and Warburton in Stevens v. Gibbons, Moor, 871.

(c) 4 Burn. Ecc. Law (p. 278, s. 5, 8th edit.), citing 1 Roll's Abr. 910. Wilson v. Drake, 2 Mod. 20, notis. Fawtry v. Fawtry, 1 Salk. 36; 1 Show. 327; Holt, 42.

(d) Ognel's case, 4 Co. 51. Johns v. Rowe, Cro. Car. 106, Com. Dig. Administrator, B. 6.

(e) Com. Dig. Administrator, B. 6 (notis), citing Rex v. Dr. Bettesworth, Str. 1111.

(f) Isted v. Stanley, Dyer, 372; Day v. Chapfield, 1 Vern. 200; Thomas v. Butler, 1 Ventris, 217, 2 Lev. 55. Com. Dig. Administrator, B. 6, vol. i. p. 487, 5th edit.

and 21 Hen. 8, are obligatory on the Court. The Court is only ministerial: the statutes leave it no discretionary power. The practice of the Court inclines to the person having the beneficial interest, as in the case of a residuary legatee, and where the option is left to the Court; but it has only such a discretionary power when the parties are in equal degree, or between a widow and next of kin who are equally entitled. It has no further discretion. The statute is as obligatory on the second grant as on the first. In Prior v. Moss (Prerogative, 1772, April 10) "Moss died intestate. The mother of the intestate died without taking administration, and made Prior executor. The uncle of the deceased took out administration. Prior, the executor, called it in as having all the interest under the will. The Court (Dr. Bettesworth) held it well granted to the next of kin to the intestate." In Elliot v. Collier (3 Atk. 526, 1 Ves. sen. 17, 1 Wils. 168) Lord Hardwicke held the husband entitled to the interest without the administration.

Per Curiam (Sir William Wynne). I understand the rule of the office to be to grant administration to those who are next of kin at the time of the death: but where a representation has been taken out and another is wanted, the course of the office is to make the grant to the interest and not to persons who were not next of kin at the time of the death, but who have since become so. Such is laid down by Sir Edward Simpson to be the rule of office (infra, 154). In the case of Young v. Pierce an administration was granted by the prerogative and Delegates to the interest, viz. to the executor of one next of kin, in exclusion even of another who was also next of kin at the intestate's death, but who had released her interest. Here the parties were not next of kin at the death, for they are nephews and nieces, and there was a brother. I conceive that, such being the case, they are not entitled to this administration: for the [152] statute looks to the next of kin at the time of the death, not to the next of kin when a second grant is wanted, and the Court will grant the administration to the representative of the original administrator in preference to a person who, by the death of intermediate persons, becomes the next of kin when the second administration is wanted. Lovegrove v. Lewis, before the Delegates, was a case of this kind.(a) The question is not whether the same rule applies to administrations de bonis non as to original administrations; but whether the statute does not apply only to such as were next of kin at the death. But in order to look more fully into the cases let the matter stand over.

On the by-day the cause came on again.

Dr. Swabey cited Hole v. Dolman (infra, 165), Kinleside v. Cleaver (infra, 169), Walton v. Jacobson (vol. i. 346), and Whitehill v. Phelps (Prerogative, 1711, E. T. 2 Sess.). "Whitehill died intestate, leaving a widow and no children. The widow took administration and made her son executor. He prayed administration de bonis non to the husband. This was opposed by the mother of the husband. Administration de bonis non was granted to her, though, according to the custom of London, the widow had the right of distribution." The case cited from Freeman the reporter thinks contrary to law. Unless Lovegrove v. Lewis (of which case I was not aware on the former day) had occurred, the cases to which I have referred would have been decisive. That case has established a distinct principle; the only distinction from (a) Lovegrove v. Lewis and Lewis (Prerog. 1772, Trin. Term, 2nd Session). John Bidleston died in November, 1761, a widower, intestate, leaving two sons—the only persons entitled in distribution. John Bidleston, one of the sons, took out administration to his father in 1761. Thomas, the other son, died in 1762 intestate, leaving his brother John his only next of kin. John, the administrator, by his will dated 13 September, 1763, appointed Lovegrove his sole executor. The validity of that will being contested, it was pronounced for by the Prerogative Court and by the Delegates. Lovegrove was sworn administrator of Bidleston, the father. John and Richard Lewis opposed the grant on the ground that they were the cousins-german, and then next of kin of John Bidleston, the father, and, as such, asserted their right to the administration de bonis non. It was alleged that they had no interest in the effects. Sir George Hay decreed letters of administration de bonis non of John Bidleston, the father, to be granted to Lovegrove, the executor and residuary legatee of John Bidleston, the son and administrator. And this sentence was, on the 29th of April, 1773, affirmed with costs by the Court of Delegates. The Judges present were: Aston, J., Blackstone, J., Macham, and Loveday, LL.D.

the present case is that here the parties were originally in distribution, but they have released their interest.

[153] Sir William Scott and Dr. Nicholl contrà. The question is whether the other party has a statutable right, and whether the Court is consequently bound. It turns on the construction of the statute—on the words "next of kin." We apprehend they mean the next of kin at the time of the death. Great inconvenience would result if the Court did not attend to this limitation, but extended the term to all the branches to whom it may be derived. To say that any one can acquire the relation of "next of kin" to a person, after that person is actually dead, would be absurd. The term must only mean those who are so at the time of the death. No person, therefore, having a statutable right, the Court will grant it, in its discretion, to the interest.

Per Curiam. Abraham Cocker, the deceased, died intestate, a bachelor without parent, leaving a brother and seven nephews and nieces; the brother took administration; he died, leaving goods unadministered, and having appointed Savage his executor; the representative of the brother and administrator applies for administration de bonis non; this is opposed by the nephews and nieces, who claim it under the statute. The brother, at the death of the intestate, was the sole next of kin and solely entitled to the administration. The nephews and nieces were then entitled in distribution, but not to the administration. The only question is whether the nephew, who had no right to the administration at the death, is now entitled by devolution on the death of the brother.

It is argued that it has been held that it ought to be granted to the next of kin at the time of the grant. This is founded on several cases, deciding that the administration to the wife is not grantable to the representative of the husband but to the next of kin of the wife. By the ancient practice, on the death of the husband administrator, the Court granted the administration prius petenti—to the kin of the husband or of the wife. Hole v. Dolman (infra, 165) determined that it was grantable in preference to the wife's kin and not to the representative of the husband: after which two other cases were decided, viz. Kinleside v. Cleaver (infra, 169), and Walton v. Jacobson (vol. i. 346). But this case does not fall within the principle there decided; for in those cases the kin were next at the death, the husband not being considered as kin but having a claim in a distinct character; and therefore the Court held that the wife's next of kin in those cases had an absolute statutable right, [154] on which they granted it. Such also is the case where the administration is granted to the widow; she does not take it as next of kin.

The question then is, whether the grant is to be made to the representative of the person who took as next of kin, or to those who have become next of kin at the time of asking for the grant. By the practice of the office the statutable right is confined only to the kin at the time of the death; afterwards to grant it to their representatives. So in a note of Sir Edward Simpson, in which, adverting to the case of Hole v. Dolman, that learned Judge says: "The rule there seems to mean only to the next of kin at the death of the deceased, not to whom may happen afterwards to be next of kin at the time a question arises upon the grant of administration; for a dead man can have no next of kin; he is not in a capacity to have next of kin at the time he becomes so. Therefore, by the course of office, it is granted to the interest when the next of kin at the time of the death is not living at the grant of administration de bonis non; except in the case of next of kin of wife and representative of the husband—then granted to the next of kin. Undoubtedly by the statute the grant of administration to next of kin is good; but when the next of kin, who were so at death of deceased, are dead, then it is in the heart of the Court to grant it to the next of kin or the interest, and the grant does not depend on the statute but the rules of the Court—may grant it to next of kin, may grant it to interest, without regard to greater or less interest, according to the circumstances." In exact affirmance of that principle was the judgment of Sir George Hay in Lovegrove v. Lewis (supra, 152, notis), which was affirmed by the Delegates with costs. There it could not be denied that the cousins were the next of kin at the time of the grant, yet Sir George Hay and the Delegates decreed it to the interest. In this case the nephews were not next of kin at the death, though in distribution; but the greater interest at the death was in the brother, and therefore his representatives have the greater interest. Not only so; it is stated that payment was made to the nephews and nieces in full satisfaction of their distributive shares, and that they gave releases; so that they have now no interest as appears on the face of the releases. But it is said that they protest against the effect of their releases, and against any use to be made of them; and it is argued that they may apply to some Court to determine on their validity: it is not, however, suggested that they were improperly [155] obtained, nor that any proceedings are going on to invalidate them. Though the Court has no right to try the validity of these releases, yet it must take notice of them, as it does of marriage-articles allowing a wife to make a will, which, being upon the face valid and their validity not appearing to be contested, the Court grants probate. By the same plea that the effect of these releases is sought to be avoided, a husband might always avoid his wife's will. I am of opinion that the nephews have no statutable right, as they were not next of kin at the time of the death. The course of office in that case is to grant the administration to the superior interest, viz. in this case to the representative of the administrator, who would take half; and the interest of the others is released. Under the circumstances the interest is so clearly in the executor of the deceased administrator that I shall grant the administration de bonis non to him.

ALMES v. ALMES. Prerogative, Mich. Term, 4th Session, 1796.—Where the Court is not bound by the statute of 21 Hen. 8, c. 5, it always grants the administration to those who have the interest. Administration de bonis non granted to a person entitled under a deed of gift from the first administratrix to the whole beneficial interest, in preference to one who was not next of kin at the time of the death, and who consequently had no statutable right.

Sir William Scott and Dr. Nicholl for Elizabeth Almes relied on the recent decision in Savage v. Blythe.(a) It was contended contrà, that by taking out a decree calling on the son to accept or refuse the administration, the other party had waived their own right; at least that the son should be indemnified for his costs.

Per Curiam (Sir William Wynne). Administration is prayed of the goods of William Davis left unadministered by his sister, who in her lifetime conveyed all her interest in the effects of William Davis by a deed of gift to her daughter-in-law, Elizabeth Almes, one of the parties. And the question is whether Elizabeth Almes or William Almes, the son of the administratrix and the nephew and next of kin of William Davis (but who was not so at the time of the death), is entitled to administration de bonis non.

It is not denied that the entire interest is in her; nor that the other party is fully aware of that fact; for he was a party to the deed. Has, then, William Almes a statutable right by which the Court is bound?

Where there is a statutable right the Court always grants it, except in a few instances —that of a residuary legatee for example. William Almes was not next of kin at the time of the death, and had no right nor interest then, nor has he any interest in the [156] effects now. He has, then, no statutable right. I so decided in Savage v. Blythe, where the question was between the executor of the brother (administrator of the deceased) and nephews and nieces, who, though they were not entitled to the administration, would have been entitled in distribution if they had not signed releases. That case I determined on the authority of Sir George Hay's decision in Lovegrove v. Lewis, affirmed by the Delegates. There those who were not next of kin at the time of the death were held not to be entitled under the statute to the administration de bonis non, which was granted to the executors of the administrator. The present case is rather stronger than Savage v. Blythe. Where the Court is not bound by the statute, it will always grant the administration to those who have the interest. Then there is no doubt that Elizabeth Almes is entitled.

There must have been some mistake in taking out the decree calling upon the other parties to accept or refuse administration, instead of to shew cause why it should not be granted to Elizabeth Almes. There is a kind of inconsistency in this decree with the application for the grant of administration to her. It cannot be the course of office that such should issue: but, as that might have been explained without entering into this petition, it was not necessary to bring the question before the Court; and on this ground I shall not decree the costs to be paid by the person taking out the decree. Let administration pass to Elizabeth Almes.

(a) See preceding case.

The preceding are cases of de bonis non grants; but different Ecclesiastical Judges have on several occasions declared that, in all that regards the obligation of the statutes of 31 Edw. 3, c. 11, and 21 Hen. 8, c. 5, on the Court, in the grant of administration, no distinction exists between an original and a de bonis non administration; (a)[1] or, in other words, that where a party would have had a statutable right to an original administration, he would have the same right to the de bonis non administration; and the converse of that proposition must also necessarily be true that where he would have had no statutable right to a de bonis non grant, he can have no such right to an original grant. Nor does it seem possible either in principle or in reason to distinguish in this respect between the first and any subsequent grant. The ground of making the de bonis non grant to the represent-[157]-atives of the next of kin at the time of the death, in preference to the next of kin at the time of the grant, is, that the former are possessed of the beneficial interest in the intestate's effects: but that interest under the 22 & 23 Car. 2, c. 10, vests in the distributees immediately on the intestate's death, and is consequently transmitted to their representatives, although no administration had been taken out in the lifetime of such distributees. Accordingly, while on the one hand it is always held in practice that a person who was next of kin at the time of the death is, under the statute of Hen. 8, entitled to the de bonis non grant in preference to the representative of the original administrator, or to the representative of any other next of kin at the time of the death, it is, on the other hand, the established practice and course of office that if all who were next of kin at the death are dead, then the representative of such next of kin being entitled to the beneficial interest, is also entitled to the administration, whether original or de bonis non; with this limitation however in both cases, that a person originally in distribution is preferred to the representative of the next of kin.

The foregoing cases, the established practice, and the inferences deducible from both, sufficiently shew that the Ecclesiastical Courts strongly hold that the right to the administration is transmissible, and almost universally accompanies the right to the property: but, since the cases of Hole v. Dolman and Kinleside v. Cleaver, a different rule has prevailed with respect to the administration of feme covert's estates after the death of the husband—the sole person entitled to the administration at the time of the wife's death, viz. that, whether the husband has taken administration to his wife or not, the representation to her must be granted after his death to those who, at the time of the wife's death, were her next of kin, even though they have no interest in her effects, in preference to the husband's representative in whom the whole interest is vested.(a)[2]

Since the publication of the former volume, more extended notes of the cases of Hole v. Dolman, and Kinleside v. Cleaver (vol. i. 344-5), together with some notes of the earlier cases relating to this point, have come into the editor's possession, and are now published in the hope that the materials and information thus col-[158]-lected may be useful, if this important point of practice should hereafter be re-considered.

KINASTON v. MILLS. Prerogative, February 25th, 1700-1.—Chose in action to wife. Husband, administrator, dies without altering property, and makes a will: his administrator with will annexed takes administration de bonis to the wife; that administration called in by her next of kin and revoked, the property not being altered by the husband.

Margaret Burnett (otherwise Kinaston), the wife of Major William Burnett, died entitled to the sum of 1400l., the property whereof the said William had not altered. He took administration to her and made his will; and died, being killed in a duel. Francis Mills takes out administration to him with the will annexed (no executor being named in the will), and afterwards takes administration de bonis non of Margaret Burnett. John Kinaston, brother of Margaret and next of kin, cites him to shew cause why the administration de bonis should not be revoked and granted to him. Sir Richard Raines, the Judge of the Prerogative Court, revoked the administration accordingly. What belonged to Margaret, being a chose in action, and the property

(a)[1] Dr. Bettesworth and the Court of Delegates in Kinleside v. Cleaver (vol. i. 345, and infra, 169). Dr. Hay in Walton v. Jacobson (vol. i. 346).

(a)[2] Is it not a strange anomaly to grant the administration to the representative of the residuary legatee ad infinitum, and to refuse it to the representative of the husband—the universal legatee by operation of law?

not altered goes to her next of kin, and not to the executor or administrator of the husband.(a)[1]

AMHURST v. AMHURST AND BAWDES. Prerogative, Hilary Term, 1713.—Estate not vested by law or equity, administration de bonis non to the next of kin.

Charles Amhurst makes his will, and Dorothy Amhurst and Lady Selby, his executors, who prove it. 1000l. legacy is charged on the estate for them. Dorothy dies intestate, and her husband takes administration to her and makes his son executor, who prays administration de bonis non of Dorothy. Charles Selby, a sister's son of Dorothy, prays administration as her next of kin.

Ex parte Selby. Applying for administration shews the estate not vested; it must be granted to the next of kin, 21 Hen. 8, c. 5. If the estate had been vested in the husband, his executor would have had it without administration. If the husband had been her executor, if the husband and wife had assigned the legacy, or if [159] the husband in his life had taken security, he might have released the legacy; but, not having done it, it no ways vests in him. Though a sentence be given for a legacy, yet if not paid it will go to the administrator de bonis non.(a)[2] The husband is not to have execution for a debt of the wife's recovered by them. Orphanage money in London, if not recovered, shall be considered as a chose in action, and the husband cannot dispose of it (Pheasant's case, 2 Vent. 341). Administration is to follow the interest where there is a residuary legatee. Distributees have an interest vested in them. Before the 31 Edw. 3, c. 11, the ordinary had nothing to do with choses in action.(c) It is held in B. R. that an estate pour auter vie is not distributable.

[Contrà. In Chancery the opinion is that an estate pour auter vie is distributable. Though the estate be not vested in the husband, yet the interest is which he transfers to his representatives, and the administrator will be trustee for them.(d)]

In continuation. The same law is in an administration de bonis non as in a common administration. It is not discretionary with the ordinary to grant it where the interest is. Whitehill v. Phelps (cited ante, p. 152). In Harcourt v. Lady Smith, Delegates, 1709, "Sir Samuel Astrey made his wife executrix: she married Mr. Harcourt, and died leaving goods unadministered; she not being residuary legatee, the administration de bonis non cum testamento annexo was granted to the sister and next of kin." And in this case the interest was not considered, but only the statute 21 Hen. 8, c. 5. The interest is not considered by the 21 Hen. 8, c. 5, but a proper person to represent the deceased. If the executor does not prove the will, the next of kin shall represent him. If Amhurst were administrator he would only be trustee for the next of kin.

E contrà. The question in the principal case is whether the interest is vested in the husband: for this case does not depend upon the 21 Hen. 8, c. 5, but rather on the Statute of Distributions, where administration is to follow the interest; as in Astrey's case the residue not being disposed of belonged to the next of kin. This was the opinion of the Prerogative Court and of the Delegates. The ordinary was administrator before the 31 Edw. 3, c. 5. That statute [160] directed administration to be granted to the next of kin. A dispute arose thereupon whether the wife was not next of kin, and administration to be granted to her, which occasioned the statute 21 Hen. 8, c. 5. Upon that, inquiry was made whether the husband was next of kin to the wife, and determined in Ognel's case, 4 Co. 51. Johns v. Rowe, Cro. Car. 106, that administration did belong to the husband mero jure. Hughes' case was the cause

---

(a)[1] In the case of Burnett v. Kinaston (Prec. in Ch. 118, S. C. 2 Freeman, 239; Trin. Term, 1700, which related to the effects of the same party deceased) Sir Nathaniel Wright, Lord Keeper, held that the money there in question, a chose in action, belonged to the administrator de bonis non, and was not distributable among the surviving husband's next of kin; but "the point is now settled that if the husband survive his wife, then he, as her administrator, will be entitled to all her personal estate which continued in action or unrecovered at her death; and although he die before all such property be recovered, yet his next of kin will be entitled to it in equity." 1 Roper, Husband and Wife, 205, and cases there cited.

(a)[2] See, however, Heygate v. Annesley, 3 Bro. Chan. Rep. 362.

(c) See Hensloe's case, 9 Co. 39.

(d) By 14 Geo. 2, c. 20, estates pur auter vie, in case there be no special occupant thereof, are made distributable.

of the Statute of Distributions,(a)[1] and the law therein makes the intestate's will; and if the party having a right to distribution die before all is collected, his next of kin shall have administration, and not the next of kin of the first intestate (Brown v. Shore, Carth. 52; 1 Show. 25. Palmer v. Allicock, 3 Mod. 58). The husband is the next of kin, and has a right to the whole, for the law has made the wife's will, and vested all her right in him. The universal legatee and not the next of kin shall have the administration where there is no executor. Even a residuary legatee is preferred to the next of kin. Isted v. Stanley, Dyer, 372. Thomas v. Butler, 1 Ventris, 217. In the case of Culpepper v. Porter, 1681, "Porter married Culpepper, who had a legacy of 1000l. left her by her father. After her death the husband takes administration to her, and dying makes his son executor, who takes administration de bonis non to Mrs. Porter, formerly Culpepper, and is called upon by the next of kin of Porter to shew cause why it should not be revoked. The administration is confirmed to the executor against the next of kin." Every legatee has an immediate interest. The husband had a right to the legacy left to his wife, which he transmitted to his executors. In Early v. Cole, "Early made his will and gave a legacy of 50l. to his daughter: she married: 20l. of the legacy was left unpaid at the death of her and her husband, who survived. The husband's brother and wife's mother apply for administration; it was granted to the husband's brother." Arrears of rent due to the wife shall go to the executors of the husband, 32 Hen. 8, c. 37.

Per Curiam (Sir Charles Hedges). This estate not being vested either by law or statute,(c) by [161] the 21 Hen. 8, c. 5, the administration must be granted to the next of kin. Administration of part of the estate must go as the administration of the whole would do. As it is an intestate's estate of a chose in action not recovered, it must go to the next of kin.

REES v. CART.(a)[2] Prerogative, Hilary Term, 3rd Session, 1718-9.—Administration of the wife's goods to the executor of the husband, who died without taking administration to her.

Ann Church made her will dated 2d February, 1709, and made John Church Metcalfe, sen., one of her executors and her residuary legatee. Elizabeth Metcalfe made her will and likewise Metcalfe, sen., her executor and residuary legatee. He took probate of both wills; made his own will, and his wife, Jane, his executrix and residuary legatee—leaving goods of Ann Church and Elizabeth Metcalfe unadministered. Jane Metcalfe proved his will and afterwards married John Rees. She died on 10th June, 1717. No administration was taken to her. John Rees died in August, 1717, having made his will, and his brother, Richard Rees, executor. Richard proved the will in the Archdeacon's Court of Middlesex. In October, 1717, Jane Cart (mother of Jane Rees, alias Metcalfe) applies for administration to her. A caveat is entered by Barbara Jordan and John Church Metcalfe, a minor. Jordan—as surviving daughter of Ann Church—prays administration de bonis non to her. John, as grandson to Elizabeth Metcalfe, and great grandson of Ann Church, and nephew to John Church Metcalfe sen., prays administration de bonis non to them to be granted for his use, before the grant of Jane Cart's (alias Metcalfe's, alias Rees') administration to her mother. (Richard Rees was not cited, and no ways a party to the caveat.) No interest appearing to bar Jane Cart from having the administration to her daughter, the Court granted it to her; and by virtue thereof she obtained letters of administration de bonis non to John Church Metcalfe, sen., Elizabeth Metcalfe and Ann Church. Afterwards Richard Rees calls her by process to shew cause why the administration should not be revoked and granted to him, being executor of his brother who was husband to Jane Rees, alias Metcalfe.

(a)[1] Hughes v. Hughes, 1 Lev. 233. On prohibition the Court of King's Bench resolved "that the Ecclesiastical Court could not oblige an administrator to a distribution, and that their bonds taken to that intent were void." The arguments are reported in Carter, 125, and at the conclusion is the passage that follows:—"Et puis per act del Parliament pur melieux settlement des intestates estates fuit contrived."

(c) Lord Chancellor Cowper and Lord Chancellor Parker, however, held that the wife's choses in action did vest in the husband by the statute of distributions. See Squib v. Wyn, 1 P. Wms. 381. So did Lord Hardwicke in Humphrey v. Bullen, 1 Atk. 458, and in Elliot v. Collier, 1 Ves. 15; 3 Atk. 527; 1 Wilson, 169.

(a)[2] Cited in Squib v. Wyn, 1 P. Wms. 381. Viner, Executors (K.), 22.

Ex parte Rees.(b) [162] It is still res integra as to Richard Rees, he never having been cited or any way precluded. Where the whole interest is vested, administration must go with the interest, and not according to the statute. Isted v. Stanley, Dyer, 372. Thomas v. Butler, 1 Ventris, 217. Ognel's case, 4 Co. 51. Johns v. Rowe, Cro. Car. 106. Wilson v. Drake, 2 Mod. 20. The husband is not obliged to distribute. It makes no alteration that the husband did not take administration; for the administration continues no privity: but the interest being once vested is transmissible, the right not depending on the 21 Hen. 8, c. 5, but on the Statute of Distributions; and the executor has the same right as the husband had. Hæres succedit in universum jus quod defunctus habuit. Earl of Winchelsea v. Norcloff, 2 Reports in Chancery, 165. Brown v. Shore, 1 Show. 25. Palmer v. Allicock, 3 Mod. 58. That the administration must go with the interest and not with the blood was determined in this very case, when the administration de bonis non was granted to Jane Cart, and Jordan and John Church Metcalfe were refused by the Court. The same has been determined in other cases, Culpepper v. Porter (cited in Amhurst v. Amhurst, ante, 160). Early v. Cole (ibid.).

E contrà. The mother is in possession of a simple administration to Jane Rees alias Metcalfe. The administrations with the will annexed depend upon that. Simple administrations are always governed by the statute. The interest is not considered. A man dies intestate leaving two children; one dies leaving a child; that child cannot have the administration, though equal in interest. John Metcalfe, the minor, was not the next of kin to Jane Rees, and therefore was refused. Upon her death the privity was discontinued. The husband, not being administrator to her, could have no right after her death. Astrey's case. Amhurst's case (supra, 158-9).

In reply. In the cases of Astrey and Amhurst there was no residuary legatee.

Per Curiam (Dr. Bettesworth). The only question is whether administration ought to follow the interest or the blood. If the husband had taken administration, there is no doubt that the whole property had vested in him. Whether, then, his not having done it shall bar his executor. The interest being in him, the executor may at any time take the administration the husband was entitled to. The administration [163] to Jane Rees and the de bonis non administrations to Church and Metcalfe ought to be revoked and granted to the executor.

Note.—The case of Powell v. Trigges, 1727, 2d October, was inserted among the list of cases, in support of the husband's representatives, by Dr. Simpson in his report of Rees v. Cart. It appears from the assignation-book that Powell, the sister of the deceased, called in the administration granted to Trigges; but the Court directed it to be re-delivered to Trigges. No other particulars can be discovered.

ST. AUBYN v. PAGE. Prerogative, Mich. Term, 1st Session, 1719.—Administration of a feme covert, granted to the daughter of the third husband, revoked and granted to the grand-children by her first husband; it being shewn that an estate would come to them.

Lady St. Aubyn, relict of Sir John, married afterwards to Spencer, and had a third husband, Page: she dying intestate, Page takes administration and dies intestate. Elizabeth Fursden, a creditor by mortgage, calls Sir John St. Aubyn, the grandson and next of kin, to shew cause why administration de bonis non should not be granted to some third person to substantiate proceedings in Chancery, and upon his not appearing it was granted to Ann Page, daughter of Richard Page by another wife, as next of kin to him. Sir Richard Vyvyan (testamentary guardian of Sir John, Peter James, Mary and Martha St. Aubyn, minors and grandchildren) calls upon Ann Page to shew cause why the said administration de bonis non should not be revoked and granted to him for their use.

Ex parte St. Aubyn. The estate of the wife does not vest in the husband by marriage otherwise than as in possession. Hale's Analysis of the Law, ss. 14, 27, pp. 47, 78. 1 Inst. p. 351 b. If the husband does not recover the wife's choses in action as administrator, and die intestate, no property can be transmitted to him. The husband is not included in the Statute of Distributions, but by the last section of the Statute of Frauds and Perjuries his case is provided for. By the former statute

(b) In the arguments in this case, and in St. Aubyn v. Page, and in Plaidel v. Howe (infra, pp. 163, 4), the passages that seemed to be a mere repetition of the arguments in Amhurst v. Amhurst, supra, 158, have been omitted.

the distributable share vests immediately, but until that statute it was not so. The husband, therefore, not being entitled to the whole by virtue of that statute must remain in the same case as other common administrators were, and what is left unadministered must go to the next of kin.(a)

[164] E contrà. We admit it to be law that choses in action do not vest in the husband by marriage, but the estate which is in the wife's possession does. Fact is wanting in order to found the law. Page, being in possession of an administration, ought to be continued therein, unless it shall be made appear that there are choses in action still remaining which were not collected by the husband.

Per Curiam (Dr. Bettesworth). The administration not to be revoked without shewing that there is some estate remaining which will come to the grandchildren. To give an allegation on the next court-day.

Note.—It was afterwards alleged that several debts owing by Spencer (the second husband) were discharged out of her separate estate. He having mortgaged the most part of his estate for his debts, the mortgage was transferred over in trust for her to the Marquis Worcester and Mr. Justice Fortescue. The allegation was confessed; and the Court revoked the administration de bonis non, and granted it to the guardian for the use of the minors.

PLAIDEL v. HOWE. Prerogative, 26th July, 1723.—A legacy to a wife not received by her or her husband, nor administration taken to the wife by the husband: his executor, and not the next of kin, to have administration to the wife.

James Howe, by a codicil to his will, 13th November, 1714, makes Ann Gilman, wife of George Gilman, executrix and residuary legatee. She proved the will and died. Her husband survived, but died without taking administration. He made his will on 25th April, 1722, and Christopher Plaidel, his executor, who is called, at the instance of a creditor, to accept or refuse administration de bonis non of James Howe. He is opposed by Sarah Howe, daughter of Howe and sister of Ann Gilman.

Ex parte Plaidel. Every legatee has an immediate interest. Ann Gilman, being residuary legatee, the whole personal estate, after debts and legacies paid, vested in her, and consequently in her husband. Early v. Cole (cited in Amhurst v. Amhurst, ante, 160). Thomas v. Butler, 1 Ventris, 217. Earl of Winchelsea v. Norcloff, 2 Reports in Ch. 165. Cary v. Taylor, 2 Vern. 302. Rees v. Cart (ante, 161).

E contrà. The residue did not vest in him as husband. It was a chose in action, and the husband never had the administration. It remains the property of the first deceased, Howe, not altered.

[165] Per Curiam (Dr. Bettesworth). Administration granted to the executor of the husband.

DARLEY v. WHADDON. Prerogative, July 3rd, 1734.—Administration de bonis non to a feme covert granted to the representative of the husband, administrator, in exclusion of the wife's kin.

Elizabeth Hoile, alias Auckland, died in 1715; her husband took administration to her, and died in 1728. Administration was granted to Mrs. Whaddon, his sister, in 1729; and in 1732 she took administration de bonis non to Elizabeth Hoile. This was held to be according to the course of the office. If the estate of Elizabeth had only been an estate not in possession, Mrs. Whaddon would not have been entitled. St. Aubyn v. Page (ante, 163), Kinaston v. Mills (ante, 158). But the property consisted of South-Sea stock, in the names of Elizabeth Auckland, the mother, Elizabeth, the daughter, and Mr. Hoile. The Court dismissed the next of kin without costs.

HOLE, OTHERWISE WELLINGTON v. DOLMAN. Arches, July 21st, 1736.—An original administration to a feme covert decreed to her next of kin in preference to the representative of the husband who survived her.

Peter Wellington made his will, and appointed Margaret, his sister, executrix and residuary legatee, and died. The executrix took probate and married Jeffery Follett, and died. Follett, the husband, made Dolman his executor, and died before he took administration to his wife. Dolman proved his will, and then took administration to Follett's wife in common form in the Court of the Archdeacon of Barnstaple. Rebecca Hole, alias Wellington, the sister of Peter Wellington and of Margaret Follett, called Dolman, in the Archdeacon's Court, to shew cause why the said administration should not be revoked; and it was then revoked. Then Dolman appealed to the Consistory of Exeter, where the decree in the Archdeacon's Court was reversed, and then the sister appealed from that reversal to the Arches.

(a) In Cart v. Rees (cited in Squib v. Wyn, 1 P. Wms. 382) Lord Chancellor Parker said, "That the husband was within the statute of distributions so as to take the wife's choses in action; and that this was not a new point."

The Court (Dr. Bettesworth) inclined that the administration should be granted to the sister Rebecca Hole, but, upon motion to hear common lawyers, the Court assigned an information in law by common lawyers upon this question—Whether administration to a feme covert, which had not been taken by the husband in his lifetime, should be granted to the representative of the husband or to the wife's next of kin?

Mr. Serjeant Wynne for Dolman. [166] Whatever belongs to the wife is the husband's. Co. Litt. 354. Whatever chattel interest or otherwise the wife has belongs to the husband; and for a chattel right, which reverts to the wife after the husband's death, she is not obliged to take administration. The wife's estate is vested in the husband, and consequently in his representative; the husband's right arises from the act of law and not from the letters of administration. The stat. 21 H. 8, c. 5, directs administration to go to certain persons, but leaves a discretion in the ordinary whether he will grant it to the widow or next of kin. Sand's case, Ray. 93. An administration in this case is not necessary for the husband unless in order to sue: 29 Car. 2, c. 3, s. 25, declares that nothing in the Statute of Distributions should extend to the estate of femes coverts. The wife's estate in this case being fully vested in the husband, his representative only is entitled to administration.

Mr. Crewe on the same side. The husband by law and equity has a right to the wife's estate, and the administration is only to recover what is not in his possession. The ordinary shall depute the next and most lawful friend of the intestate to take administration. Fotherby's case, Cro. Car. 62, 63. Before the statute of 31 Edw. 3, c. 11, the ordinary might grant the administration to whom he pleased. Since the stat. 21 Hen. 8, c. 5, no doubt but the ordinary has discretion to grant administration to "the widow or next of kin." By mere right the husband has a title to the administration, and has the interest and is "the next and most lawful friend." Mich. 2 G. 2, Butler v. Story, before Lord Chancellor King. "Samuel Story, deceased, a freeman of London—his daughter married Wolley, who became bankrupt. The assignees prayed an account of Story's estate, as the third part belonged to Wolley's wife, though she was dead, and no administration taken to her." Bacon v. Bryant (Viner, Executors, K. 24), before the Master of the Rolls, held that the representative of the husband had the interest, and therefore ought to have the administration. Isted v. Stanley, Dyer, 372. Denn's case, Cro. Car. 115. Sparke v. Denne, 1 Sir W. Jones, 225. Administration shall be granted to the interest. Davies v. Cutts, 1 Mod. 231. 3 Salk. tit. Administration, p. 23. An administration granted to a sister when there was a husband: he sued to have it revoked: prohibition moved for but denied. Johns v. Rowe, Cro. Car. 106. Administration of mere right is to be granted to the husband. It can be of no use in this case to grant it to the deceased's next of kin; for they will be only trustees for the husband's representative.

[167] Mr. Serjeant Hussey contrà. This Court will not consider what will be the effect in another Court; but who has a right, and whether the ordinary must not grant the administration to the next of kin. By 31 Edw. 3, c. 11, the ordinary shall grant the administration to the next friend. The word shall in a statute must be taken to be compulsive. 9 Coke, 39, Henloe's case. Upon the statute Edw. 3, held in case of an absolute intestacy that the ordinary must give administration to the next of kin: 1 Levinz, 187. The King's Bench constantly grant mandamus to give administration to next of kin. Amhurst's case, 1 Vent. 188. The first instance of a mandamus to this purpose; and mandamus are only to be granted where the ordinary ought by law to do the thing. The King v. Dr. Bettesworth (Smith's case), 1 Str. 891, held in the King's Bench that a mandamus should not go upon grant of administration durante minore ætate, because that was not directed by any statute. The King v. Sir R. Raines, 1 Salk. 299; Carthew, 457, S. C. Mandamus to prove a will, though the executor was insolvent; because the Court must grant a probate to the person appointed; and it is stronger where the law has appointed, as in a case of administration. The husband cannot come under the name of next of kin; for he is the same person as his wife; and 29 Car. 2, c. 3, s. 25, shews it by the proviso in favour of the husband. There may be a separate estate in the wife, and then the husband has nothing to do with it: and administrations must be uniform, and cannot depend merely upon a supposed interest. The granting a mandamus is a full proof of the opinion of the common law that an administration under an intestacy, as in this case, is of right to be granted to the next of kin. In Cullum's case (Rex v. Dr. Bettesworth, 1 Str. 891) the mandamus to the Prerogative Court was to grant administration to the husband, not to his representative.

Mr. Murry (a) on the same side. The single question is, to whom by law the administration is in this case to be granted; and we apprehend it is to be granted to the wife's next of kin. 31 Edw. 3, c. 11, gives the administration to the husband, but that is merely personal: the husband is merely entitled as the next and most lawful friend, Cro. Car. 108. Resolved by three judges that by stat. 31 Edw. 3 the administration must be granted to the husband, 1 Salk. 36. That the husband's right depends merely on 31 Edw. 3, Wilson v. Drake, 2 Mod. 22. If the husband had been alive he must have [168] had the administration, but that right is merely personal and not transmissible. It is like a case of guardian in socage. If administrator died it does not go to his executors. Brudnell's case, 5 Coke. Thorn's case, Golds. 2 b. 182. The husband had a right, but he did not exercise it; that right was as the most lawful friend, but that cannot be said of his executor. The case of a residuary legatee is out of the statute, but if there is any part of the residue undevised, administration of that must be granted to the next of kin; and this appears from Sparke v. Denne, 1 W. Jones, 225; Co. Litt. 351. Palmer v. Allicock, 3 Mod. 58, shews that before the Statute of Distributions (which does not relate to this case) the administration was always to go to the next friend of the intestate. This right of a husband is not transmissible within the words of the statute 31 Edw. 3.

Wynne in reply. Different statutes are to be considered to explain each other. It is said that the right of the husband is only a personal trust; but no authority is cited to prove it. Guardian in socage is merely a trustee. In the case of a presentation to a void living, be the infant never so young, he may present: so held by Lord King in Hitch's case, when the patron was but six years old. The administration in this case follows the property; that vested in the husband, and therefore the interest is transmitted to his representative.

Mr. Crewe in reply. An administration is not merely a personal trust, but is an interest, and is so considered by all the statutes. Fawtry v. Fawtry, 1 Salk. 36, where wife dies, administration must be granted to the husband.

Dr. Bettesworth took time to consider of this case; and on 18th of December gave judgment on it:

He said the only question is whether administration to a wife shall be granted to her next of kin, or to the representative of her husband when he had died without taking it himself; so that it was an original simple administration. On behalf of the husband's representative, the interest was the point solely relied on. It may happen that the interest is in one, and the right to the administration in another. If a man dies intestate, leaving only a mother and brother, they are equal in interest; but the mother is preferable in administration. In this case it is to be presumed there is a separate estate of the wife's that never came to the husband. In the case of Culpepper v. Porter, E. T. 1681 (cited supra, p. 160), [169] before Sir Richard Lloyd (surrogate of Sir Leoline Jenkins), an administration de bonis was granted to the husband's representative; but then the husband had taken administration first. In Kinaston v. Mills, 1701 (supra, p. 158), the husband took administration and died, and the administration de bonis was granted to the husband's representatives; but it was afterwards revoked, and granted to the next of kin of the wife. In Amhurst v. Bawdes, Hil. 1713 (supra, p. 158), Sir Charles Hedges decreed administration de bonis to the wife's next of kin preferable to the representative of the husband. The course of the office has been to grant it primo petenti, indifferently, to the one or the other. But it is a matter of weight, and it is fit the practice should be settled, and become a standing rule for the office to proceed by; and therefore the Court desired the opinions of the advocates unconcerned, and they all unanimously agreed, viz. Doctors Paul, Henchman, Audley,

(a) Afterwards Lord Mansfield, C. J., of the King's Bench.

Kinaston, Isham, Cottrell, Lee, that this being an original administration, ought to be granted to the next of kin of the wife. And the Court entirely agreed with them, and decreed the administration in this case to be granted to Rebecca Hole, alias Wellington, the sister and next of kin to Margaret Follett, deceased; and reversed the sentence of the Chancellor of Exeter; but, it having been an unsettled point before, gave no costs.

KINLESIDE v. CLEAVER. Prerogative, November 22nd, 1745.—After the death of the husband, administrator of his wife, administration de bonis non granted to her next of kin in preference to the husband's representative.

Per Curiam (Dr. Bettesworth). In this case the husband took administration and left some effects of his wife unadministered. Before the case of Hole v. Dolman (ante, p. 165) the administration of a wife was granted primo petenti, either to the wife's next of kin or to the representative of the husband. In that case an original administration was in question, but here it is an administration de bonis non. Ever since that case, notwithstanding the diversity, it has been always the rule of the office to grant the administration as well de bonis non, as of a simple administration, to the wife's next of kin. Peere Williams says (Squib v. Wyn, 1 P. Wms. 382) interest and administration go together; but I do not know where that rule has been established. If I grant it to the next of kin, the husband's representative may have relief in Chancery. I see no difference in reason between an administration de bonis non and a simple administration; for what the husband, as administrator, did not alter the property of, remains [170] still the wife's estate. I think it safest to follow the direction of the statute, and therefore decree the administration de bonis non to Mary Cleaver, next of kin of the wife.

[After stating that the Delegates unanimously affirmed the decree, and gave 5l. nomine expensarum] the report continued. The Common Law Judges were clearly of opinion that this case was within the stat. 31 Edw. 3, c. 11, and that the administration de bonis non must be granted to the next of kin of the wife; and that there was no difference between a simple administration and an administration de bonis non.(a)

The above, together with Walton v. Jacobson and Reece v. Strafford (vol. i. 346-7), are the only cases within the editor's knowledge wherein the right of administration to the wife's estate after the husband's decease has been contested: and it would seem from the decisions that, prior to the case of Hole v. Dolman (ante, 165), the Judges selected, as administrator, that party (whether the representative of the husband or the wife's next of kin) in whom they conceived the beneficial interest to be. Whether in all the three cases in which the grant was made to the wife's kin the beneficial interest really did vest in them from the property being her separate estate and settled on her next of kin in case of intestacy, or whether there prevailed in any of those cases the same misconception of law that produced the decision in Burnett v. Kinaston,(d) is immaterial: the fact appears to be that the Judges [171] believed the

---

(a) The opinion of the Common Law Judges may be presumed to be correctly stated, because the above note is in the handwriting of Dr. (afterwards Sir Edward) Simpson, who sat under the commission.

(d) Vide supra, p. 158, 9, and note (a). It will be observed that the decision in Burnett v. Kinaston (Trinity Term, 1700) preceded by a few weeks the decision of the Prerogative Court in Kinaston v Mills (Hilary Term, 1700-1), and therefore it may fairly be supposed to have been the ground-work of the latter sentence. It must also be remembered that the judgment in Kinaston v. Mills (1700-1) and in Amhurst v. Amhurst (1713) were both anterior to the case of Squib v. Wyn (1717), the first decision (it is believed) in which the choses in action of a feme covert, not recovered by the surviving husband, were held to belong to the representatives of the husband. And in St. Aubyn v. Page, supra, 163, it will be observed that the Judge refused to revoke the administration to the husband's daughter till it was shewn that the interest was in the wife's kin. Of the three cases then adjudged in favour of the wife's kin, one was expressly decided on the ground of interest and of interest alone: the other two were almost entirely determined under a misconception of the law as to the person in whom the beneficial interest vested; and from the language of the Judges in both these cases it may be inferred that their decision would have been different if such misconception had not prevailed. That this misconception did exist is confirmed by interest to be in the wife's kin, and on that principle granted them the administration. Thus, then, in every case they decided that the administration ought to follow the interest, and were clearly of opinion that grants of this nature were not within the statute of 21 Hen. 8, c. 5, but that the Court had a discretion to decree administration either to the next of kin of the wife or to the representative of the husband, which discretion it exercised in contested cases by making the grant to that party in whom it supposed the beneficial interest to vest; while, as to uncontested cases, Dr. Bettesworth, in Hole v. Dolman, declared that up to that time the course of office had been to grant the administration "primo petenti indifferently to the one or the other." This course of office clearly establishes that the previous decisions in favour of the wife's kin were at the time considered to have been the result of the Court's discretion, exercised on the facts of each particular case, and not a mere ministerial compliance with the exigencies of the statute. At length came the case of Hole v. Dolman, deciding that if the husband had not taken administration, the next of kin of the wife was entitled. This case was followed by Kinleside v. Cleaver, in which it was held that the fact—that the husband had or had not taken administration—made no difference in the question; that, in short, there was no distinction between an original administration and a de bonis non administration: but in both these cases the next of kin of the wife, at the time of the grant, were next of kin at the time of the death, the husband not being next of kin, but eadem persona. [172] Though, however, in this respect, they are not, in literal strictness, inconsistent with the judgment in Lovegrove v. Lewis, Savage v. Blythe, and Almes v. Almes (supra, 150-2-5), it may be much doubted whether they are reconcileable with the principles and spirit of the decisions in the three last-mentioned cases.

It will be seen moreover that, in the case of Mary Alicia Gill (vol. i. 336), the present learned Judge, who has presided in the Prerogative Court above twenty years, expressed very strong doubts of the propriety of the rule now followed, by which the next of kin of the wife at the time of her death exclude the representative of the husband; a rule which is certainly at variance with former practice in this class of cases, and with the present invariable practice in every other class of cases, of making the administration accompany the interest in the effects; and which is undoubtedly a departure from the spirit of the statutes, only to be justified on the ground that the words of the statute 21 Hen. 8, c. 5, so clearly apply to this class of cases, and are so imperative on the Court, as to render its functions purely ministerial. Under these circumstances, an inquiry into the authority for, and foundation of, the present practice may be attended with advantage.

That practice dates its origin, as has been already stated, from the judgment in Hole v. Dolman, a case certainly decided upon mature deliberation by a very learned Judge, after arguments by very able men, and in conformity with the unanimous opinion of the advocates who were present in Court, but unconcerned in the cause; and its authority has been very much strengthened by the subsequent decision in Kinleside v. Cleaver: but it may be a little doubted whether more weight than is due has not been accorded to the latter decision. The distinction as to an original and de bonis grant was the principal point under discussion: the previous question—the argument of Selby's counsel, that if Amhurst, the representative of the husband, were administrator, he would only be trustee for the next of kin.

---

It may be presumed that there were no earlier decisions in favour of the wife's kin, because none are referred to in any of the arguments; and both the cases cited, Whitehill v. Phelps, supra, 152, and Harcourt v. Lady Smith, supra, 159, and 2 P. Wms. 161, as affording countenance to the doctrine, were on questions between persons entitled in their own right as next of kin at the time of the death and in distribution, and persons claiming as the representatives of the widow.

It is also worthy of notice that the reporter of Squib v. Wyn (1 P. Wms. 381) had stated that, on the 27th November, 1718, Lord Chancellor Parker held in the case of Cart v. Rees that the administrator to the wife was but a trustee for the executor of the husband. May it not then be fairly inferred that it was in consequence of this decree of the Court of Chancery ascertaining the interest to be in the husband's representative that in the following Hilary Term, 1718-19, the Prerogative Court repealed that administration to the wife's kin, and granted it to the executor of the husband?

whether the next of kin of the wife were, in either case, entitled as a matter of right, under the statute 21 Hen. 8, c. 5—seems, in the Prerogative Court, to have passed nearly sub silentio on the authority of the case of Hole v. Dolman; and Dr. Bettesworth, holding that there was no distinction between the one grant and the other, possibly made his decree without fully and deliberately considering the propriety of his former decision. The note at the end of the report of Kinleside v. Cleaver seems, however, to imply that in the Court of Delegates the Common Law Judges did not, without investigation, assume the correctness of the sentence in Hole v. Dolman as to the original grant; but that, having themselves [173] examined and considered the statute, they expressed their opinion that the wife's next of kin had a statutable right, and thus sanctioned by their deliberate judgment the propriety of the earlier decision. But the note may also be construed to mean that, assuming that earlier decision to be correct, and an original grant to be within the statute, they were clearly of opinion that a de bonis grant was also within the statute, for "that there was no difference between a simple administration and an administration de bonis non." Thus, in this latter construction, the last sentence must be considered rather as the reason assigned for the opinion they expressed than as an independent and separate proposition; but it may be much doubted whether the words of the note will fairly bear this interpretation.

The rule then rests for authority nearly, if not entirely, on the judgment in Hole v. Dolman, supported by the opinion of the Common Law Judges in Kinleside v. Cleaver: for, in subsequent cases, the judges, without any minute inquiry, have followed in the same track.

The sanction, however, of Lord Hardwicke's great name has been frequently invoked in support of the correctness of the rule now acted upon: and it would seem from the report of Elliot v. Collier, contained in 3 Atkins, 526, that his Lordship had expressed his opinion to that effect. At all events, however, even supposing that report to be perfectly accurate, and that the exact words attributed to the Court really proceeded from it, it was a mere dictum—it was not the point which Lord Hardwicke decided. But, on reference to the report of the same case in 1 Vesey, sen. 15, the expression, there attributed to Lord Hardwicke, would imply a doubt of the propriety rather than an approval and sanction of the practice now followed.

The judgment, as given in 1 Wilson, 168, has not a passage exactly parallel to either of those contained in the two other reports.

A comparison of the three reports rather shews that the substance instead of the exact words of Lord Hardwicke's judgment has been given: and, from that comparison, the fair deduction seems to be that Lord Hardwicke admitted (on the authority of Hole v. Dolman, cited by the Solicitor General) that such was the practice at Doctors' Commons, but did not proceed to express any deliberate opinion on that practice. The authority, then, of Lord Hardwicke's opinion can hardly be vouched in support of the existing rule.

In the opposite scale, to balance the judgment of Hole v. Dolman, and the cases dependent on it, there are a long course of [174] precedents and of practice (no bad expounder of statutes), asserting the discretion of the Judge, and numerous decisions to the same effect by very learned Judges of the Ecclesiastical Courts, recognized in several instances by great authorities in other Courts; (a) and also the uniform interpretation and construction put upon the statutes in cases similar in principle and in spirit; as in the case of a residuary legatee; (b) and the limitation of the grant to the next of kin at the time of the death.(c)

Such, then, being the state of the question, as far as regards the authority of decided cases of practice and of analogy, it may not be improper to say a few words respecting the statutes of the 31 Edw. 3, c. 11, and 21 Hen. 8, c. 5. The husband has been held to be clearly entitled under the expression "the next and most lawful

(a) Hargrave's Law Tracts, p. 475, and cases there cited (see vol. i. p. 342, notis). The editor takes this opportunity of correcting a misstatement in page 342 of his former volume: it was a decision of Lord Chancellor Bathurst, and not Northington, in the case of Bouchier v. Taylor, that was reversed in the House of Lords. See Bouchier v. Taylor, 4 Brown's Cases in Parliament, 715.

(b) Isted v. Stanley, Dyer, 372. Thomas v. Butler, 1 Ventris, 217.

(c) Lovegrove v. Lewis, 152, n. Savage v. Blythe, supra, 150. Almes v. Almes, 155.

friend" in the 31 Edw. 3, c. 11 (see p. 149, note (c)). And judging from analogous decisions, there seems to be but little doubt that, if the statute of 21 Hen. 8, c. 5, had not been passed, the Ecclesiastical Court would, after the husband's death, grant the administration of a feme covert's estate to that person in whom the beneficial interest in the property vested, that is, under ordinary circumstances, the representative of the husband. For the principles of the decision in Lewis v. Lovegrove—that the 21 Hen. 8, c. 5, applies only to the next of kin at the time of the death—would necessarily lead the Courts to limit the expression in the statute of 31 Edw. 3, c. 11, to mean "the next and most lawful friend" at the time of the death; and then, as the husband alone would be included under that designation, the grant on his decease would be in the discretion of the Court.

However, in the 21 Hen. 8, c. 5, the expression "to the widow or his next of kin" was substituted for the words "most lawful friend" in the earlier statute: but it was still held that the husband was entitled to the representation mero jure—that his case was out of the latter statute. It would then seem that none of his rights were intended, or can be interpreted, to be curtailed by that statute. The right to administration is itself a bene-[175]-ficial right; if so, the power of transmitting it must be a beneficial right. Why is it to be held that the statute of 21 Hen. 8, c. 5, is to operate as a deprivation of a part of the husband's rights, and not of the whole? Mr. Murray, indeed, in his argument as counsel in Hole v. Dolman, contended that the husband's right was a merely personal right; but this position, as was noticed at the time by the opposing counsel, seems to have rested on his assertion alone: no case nor authority was quoted in support of it. What is there in the words or spirit of the statute, or in the cases decided upon it, to warrant the distinction between his personal rights and those rights which he would otherwise have the power to transmit? It must be remembered, likewise, that there are no repealing words in the latter statute; that the two statutes run together; and it has been subsequently held that the husband still takes the administration under the earlier statute.(a)[1] Surely, then, his representatives, or whoever have the beneficial interest, may fairly be considered as not excluded from the benefits they would have enjoyed under the provisions of that statute by the enactments of the latter statute. It seems, indeed, that it is taking up too narrow a ground to say that the reservation of the husband's rights merely was forgotten in the statute of 21 Hen. 8, c. 5; and that it would be more correct to say that the case of a feme covert dying intestate, and possessed of choses in action or separate property, was not contemplated at the passing of that statute. It appears most probable that the circumstance of the wife having any property independent of the husband, or any chattels in action, being of comparatively rare occurrence, the Legislature never provided for any such contingency: that, not distinguishing on this occasion between chattels in possession and in action, the Legislature treated all the wife's property as vested in the husband by the marriage, and therefore deemed it unnecessary to declare who should have administration to a feme covert; that, in short, the representation to a feme covert, whether during the lifetime of the husband or after his decease, is a casus omissus.

There is no doubt, however, that, previous to the Statute of Distributions, the husband was held entitled personally to the administration to his wife. That statute directs the proportions in which intestate's effects shall be distributed, but it says nothing of the person to whom the grant of the administration shall be made; nor did it specially reserve the husband's right to the wife's [176] estate in exclusion of the parties who would be entitled in distribution if she had not died a feme covert.(a)[2] To supply that omission, the Statute of Frauds (29 Car. 2, c. 3, s. 25) provides: "That neither the said act (22 and 23 Car. 2, c. 10) nor any thing therein contained shall be construed to extend to the estates of femes coverts that shall die intestate, but that their husbands may demand and have administration of their rights, credits, and other personal estates, and recover and enjoy the same, as they might have done before the making of the said act." From this it may be inferred that the Legislature conceived that were the beneficial interest in the wife's estate taken away from the husband, the right to administration would also be by implication taken away; and consequently this statute not only declares that he may recover and enjoy the personal estate (which, if the Statute of Distributions were held to extend to the estates of femes coverts, would have been directed by the positive words of that statute to go in a different course of distribution), but that he may demand and have the administration as he might have done before the making of the 22 and 23 Car. 2, c. 10, of which administration he could only have been held to be deprived on the principle that the party entitled to the beneficial interest was entitled to the administration; and that the husband being deprived of the beneficial interest in the property, he was, ipso facto and as a necessary consequence, deprived of the right to the administration. This, therefore, is an implied declaration of the Legislature itself that the law was, that the administration should, in all cases, follow the interest; and, consequently, that the statute of 21 H. 8, c. 5, did not apply when the next of kin were not the persons beneficially entitled to the estate: and, further, it is an implied declaration that that interpretation of the law and that limitation of the statute were generally received and acknowledged.

(a)[1] Fawtry v. Fawtry, 1 Salk. 36. S. C. 1 Show. 351. Wilson v. Drake, 2 Mod. 22.
(a)[2] See Wilson v. Drake, 2 Mod. 22.

In Hole v. Dolman it was urged by counsel as an objection to considering this class of cases as not included in the 21 H. 8, c. 5, and, consequently, as within the discretion of the Court, that inconvenience would be produced by the uncertainty of practice thus introduced: for it was said the wife may have separate property, and then if the rule of interest were to be followed, the Court, contrary to what would be its usual practice, but in the exercise of its discretion, must grant the administration to the wife's next of kin in exclusion of the husband's repre-[177]-sentatives. But, in the first place, separate property in the wife is an anomaly, and being of comparatively rare occurrence, the difficulty would but seldom occur; and, secondly, this objection would equally apply to the discretion left, by the stat. 21 H. 8, c. 5, in the ordinary to choose between the widow and next of kin; which discretion the Court is always by practice bound to exercise in favour of the widow, unless cause be shewn for her exclusion, such as misconduct, or that she is barred by settlement from any interest in the effects, or the like; and, in the same manner, if the representation to a feme covert, after the husband's decease, were held to be in the Court's discretion, the general rule would be to grant it to the representatives of the husband: but, on its being shewn that they had no interest, they would properly be excluded in favour of the next of kin of the wife, in whom the beneficial interest would vest. The uncertainty, indeed, appears rather to be the result of the practice for which the counsel were then contending, and which is now followed in this class of cases. In all other cases there is a clear and well-defined rule universally applicable, viz. that the interest shall direct the Court to the person entitled to the grant; and, as has been before said, the practice of preferring the next of kin of the wife, at the time of the death, to the representatives of the husband is the solitary exception which makes the practice uncertain; and which, whatever may be the law on the subject, is undoubtedly found by daily experience to be attended with far greater inconveniences than any that have hitherto been pointed out, from leaving such grants to what is called the discretion of the Court, thereby meaning not an arbitrary but a judicial discretion—a discretion regulated by sound principle, and controuled and restricted by precedents and practice, to the single object of carefully providing that the interest and the representation shall not be separated.

Note.—The abstracts in Kinaston v. Mills, Amhurst v. Bawdes, Rees v. Cart, and Plaidel v. Howe, are copied verbatim from the MS. reports.

REPORTS of CASES ARGUED and DETERMINED in the ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS at DOCTORS' COMMONS and in the HIGH COURT of DELEGATES. By JOHN HAGGARD, LL.D., Vol. III. Containing Cases from Michaelmas Term, 1829, to Hilary Term, 1832, inclusive; and some Cases of an earlier Date. London, 1832.

[1] REPORTS OF CASES ARGUED AND DETERMINED IN THE ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS AT DOCTORS' COMMONS; AND IN THE HIGH COURT OF DELEGATES.

HAMERTON v. HAMERTON.(a) Arches Court, Michaelmas Term, 3rd Session, 1829.—Where the evidence did not amount to judicial proof of the wife's adultery, but her conduct had been so culpable as to raise strong suspicions of criminality and induce the Court to rescind the conclusion to admit fresh evidence, proof that during the progress of the suit the alleged particeps criminis had frequently visited her alone and remained late at night will, coupled with the former evidence, found a sentence of separation.

The decree of the Arches Court, rescinding the conclusion of the cause for the admission of further evidence, having been affirmed by the High Court of Delegates, and the cause remitted; an additional allegation on the part of Major Hamerton was, on the by-day after Trinity Term, admitted to proof; pleading in substance that "in the spring, and up to the month of June, 1828, Mrs. Hamerton was residing in lodgings at Paris, attended only [2] by one female servant; that Bushe was in the constant habit of visiting her, frequently dining and remaining alone with her till a late hour of the evening; that there was a sofa in the room, and that Mrs. Hamerton's bedroom adjoined; that in the latter end of May Mrs. Romer came to Paris and resided with her daughter, during which time Bushe did not visit her; that in June Mrs. Hamerton went to Switzerland, where she was joined by Bushe, and that they returned to Paris in October; that she and Bushe still reside there, but that their place of residence has not been discovered; that both before Mrs. Hamerton went to Switzerland and since her return she has frequently walked out arm in arm with Bushe, and visited the theatres and other public places in his company, and that they still continue to carry on their adulterous intercourse together."

Upon the effect of the evidence the Court, after argument, now pronounced its final decision.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The question for my present consideration is whether the facts pleaded in this allegation are proved; for, if proved, they would, coupled with the former history at Cheltenham, leave no doubt on my mind that the adultery is established. Two witnesses have been examined; one—Gyde, the clerk of Major Hamerton's attorney—who merely assists in proving the identity, but who had before deposed to seeing Mrs. Hamerton and Mr. Bushe in company [3] together at Paris; the other, Madame Rouquiet, the portress at No. 51 Rue Neuve, St. Augustins, the house where Mrs. Hamerton lodged. This witness fully proves the allegation, if she is credited; and there is nothing to affect her credit. She proves that Mrs. Hamerton lodged there; that she was constantly visited by Bushe, who frequently dined there, and was alone with her till eleven at night. She proves also that for two or three weeks in the latter part of the time, not only was Mrs. Romer, the mother, there, but also an aunt, Mrs. Robinson; and that during such time Bushe visited Mrs. Hamerton less frequently, and staid not so late; and that Mrs. Hamerton and her maid left Paris in June for Switzerland.

(a) See Hamerton v. Hamerton, 2 Hagg. Ecc. 8, 618.

In the following winter this witness and Gyde had an opportunity of identifying Bushe; she is also corroborated by the former evidence of Gyde, who saw Mrs. Hamerton and a female come out of No. 51 Rue Neuve, St. Augustins, and get into a coach in which Bushe was waiting for her, some bundles and a bandbox having been previously put into the carriage. This was on the 10th of April, 1828, at the same time that Rouquiet deposes that Mrs. Hamerton lodged at this house and was visited by Bushe. True it is that the Court has not before it the evidence of Julie, Mrs. Hamerton's maid; she was, however, long detained for the purpose of being made a witness on this plea, and that object was partly defeated by the time taken up in the appeal of the wife; but under the requisition for the examination of witnesses at Paris, every attempt was made to compel her attendance, as is stated in the return, and in an [4] affidavit annexed. Nor is Madame Mallard, the mistress of the house, produced; but she might not be able to speak at all to the fact of Bushe's visits to Mrs. Hamerton, her lodger on the ground floor. On the other hand, here is not only Mrs. Romer, the mother, but Mrs. Robinson, the aunt, who, if Mrs. Hamerton was not at Paris, nor there visited by Bushe in the manner deposed of, might have been examined on behalf of the wife to contradict that part of the case; yet no contradiction has been attempted.

Without, then, imputing either perjury to the witnesses produced, and subornation on the part of the husband and his agents, or collusion between the parties, or rather both perjury and collusion—neither of which can be presumed—the case is now, taking the whole together, sufficiently proved. The Court, therefore, pronounces for the separation.

JAY v. WEBBER. Arches Court, Hilary Term, 3rd Session, 1830.—A clause providing against any future expence falling on the parish need not be inserted in a faculty confirming the erection of an organ by voluntary contributions, and with the consent of the vestry, in a parish church. The sentence of court below affirmed with costs.—A faculty directing the performance upon and repairs of an organ in a parish church to be paid out of the parish rates would be legally objectionable; for the ordinary can only bind the parish to expence for articles absolutely necessary.—Even if the vestry is unanimous, a clause binding the parish to defray, out of the rates, future expences for an article not necessary, ought not to be inserted.—In collegiate churches organs may be necessary, but not in a parish church.—The ordinary is to judge whether the circumstances of the parish offer an objection to the erection of an organ: the parish alone is to decide on any expences to be incurred.—A faculty confirming the erection of an organ binds the parish to nothing prospectively.

[Referred to, London County Council v. Dundas, [1904] P. 30.]

On appeal.

This was, in the first instance, a business of shewing cause in the Episcopal Consistorial Court of Sarum why a faculty should not be granted for confirming the erection of an organ, seventeen feet six inches in height, and, in width, nine feet, in the parish church of Tisbury, in the county of Wilts, and was promoted by the Rev. Simon Webber, the vicar, and by [5] one of the churchwardens, and others, parishioners and inhabitants of Tisbury, against James Jay, one of the churchwardens, and others, parishioners and inhabitants of the said parish. The organ had been erected, in pursuance of a resolution of vestry on the 16th of August, 1826, at an expence of 244l., which sum had been defrayed by voluntary contributions. The organ was erected in May, 1827, and upon a petition to the bishop of the diocese for a faculty confirming the erection of this organ the grant was opposed on the ground "that it was inexpedient that a faculty should be decreed, at least without the usual clause in such faculties inserted that the said organs should not be burthensome to the parishioners for keeping the same in order, or for an organist."

The cause was heard upon act on petition and affidavits, and on the 29th of July, 1829, the chancellor of the diocese decreed the faculty; but reserved the consideration of the question of costs. From this decree an appeal was prosecuted to this Court.

Phillimore and Addams for the appellants.

The King's advocate and Dodson for the respondents.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is an appeal from the Consistory Court of Salisbury, where it was originally a proceeding to obtain a faculty confirming the erection of an organ in the parish church of Tisbury, Wiltshire, the application being made by the [6] minister and one of the churchwardens, and opposed by the other, and by several parishioners.

The usual proceedings were had: affidavits were exhibited on both sides, and the faculty was finally decreed; and from that decree the parishioners have appealed. The præsertim of the appeal is, that the Judge of the court below "did order or decree that, an organ having been erected by voluntary contributions, and being now standing in the parish church of Tisbury (which organ was erected without any expence to the parish in consequence of a vote of a vestry regularly called and assembled), a licence and faculty should be granted under the seal of his office, confirming the erection of the said organ, and, by so ordering or decreeing, did virtually reject the prayer of James Jay (one of the churchwardens), John Bennett and others, parishioners and inhabitants of the parish aforesaid, that is to say, that the said faculty might not issue without the insertion of a clause therein that the expence of playing and keeping in repair the said organ should not be defrayed at any time by any rate, tax, or assessment to be levied on the inhabitants of the parish." So that no objection is offered to what has been already done—the erection of the organ by voluntary subscriptions, nor to the playing upon it—provided the expence also is defrayed by voluntary subscriptions. But the appellants complain that a clause has not been inserted in the faculty protecting the parish against any future expence by rate, either for playing on or repairing this organ.

The only question then is whether the fa-[7]-culty is invalid in law, or whether at least the discretion of the ordinary has been improperly exercised in granting a faculty without such a clause. Cases of this sort do not often come before the Court in a contested form; they generally pass sub silentio and without opposition. This may account for a clause being often inserted exonerating the parish from all expences. Here the expences of erection formed no burthen on the parish, and the faculty decreed does nothing more than confirm that erection. I have heard no authority cited to the effect that such an approbation of the erection of an organ by voluntary contributions will have the effect of necessarily burthening the parish with the costs of repairs, or the expence of an organist. I have heard no authority quoted shewing that the faculty is not legal, because there is no clause prospectively binding the parish against paying an organist by rate, if the parish, acting by its vestry, should think fit hereafter so to do.

If the faculty had directed that the performance upon, and repairs of, this organ should in future be paid for out of the parish rates, that might be a legal objection; for the ordinary has no power to bind the parish to an expence for an article which is not absolutely necessary. A notion, indeed, formerly existed, that by an unanimous vote of the parish a clause might be inserted that the expence should be paid out of the rates; and, accordingly, there are instances where such clauses have been inserted: but that is wrong in principle, for such unanimity may exist only at the actual time: the opinion and wishes of the parish may be wholly different [8] after the lapse of a few years; and neither the ordinary nor the existing inhabitants have a right to bind their successors to an expence not legally necessary. In a collegiate church organs may be necessary on account of the manner in which the service is there performed; but in a parish church it is not an article of legal necessity. It may be very edifying and beneficial, as it tends to excite attendance and to aid and elevate devotion. The assistance of church music is beautifully described by Hooker in a passage which it is unnecessary to quote; (a) and the propriety of the introduction of organs as a part of religious worship has been so generally acknowledged that they have been admitted into all reformed churches, with the exception of the Scotch church and of some few others. The erection of organs, therefore, in parish churches, is not to be discouraged if the circumstances of the parish, regard being had to its opulence and population, and to the size of its church, offer no objections. Of these circumstances the ordinary is to judge: on any expence to be incurred the parish alone is to decide.

(a) Hooker's Eccl. Polity, b. 5, s. 38.

In the present case no objection has been offered arising out of the circumstances of the parish. It contains a population of between four and five thousand souls. The rateable property is 10,000l. a year;(b) and a rate for the salary of an organist would be, perhaps, one penny in the pound. The erection of the organ is not sug-[9]-gested to have produced inconvenience to the parishioners in attending divine worship: it was erected by voluntary contributions, without any expence to the parish; and the erection was founded upon a previous order in vestry. The faculty, then, merely confirming the erection, appears perfectly proper, unless it could be shewn that, in point of law, by so doing it binds the parish out of the rates to find an organist, and to keep the organ in repair. No authority has been quoted to shew that such would be the effect. The parish is left quite at liberty. It may apply even to have the organ removed altogether, if such a measure could be shewn to be necessary, or even strongly beneficial for the more important object of enabling the parishioners to attend public worship in the parish church. This faculty binds the parish to nothing. The ordinary merely approves and confirms the erection of this organ by voluntary contributions. This is the doctrine I find laid down in these Courts.

Two cases have occurred within my own recollection—first, the Margate case (1 Hagg. Con. 204). There a person offered to present the parish with an organ. The parish, by a resolution of vestry, applied for a faculty to erect it. This was objected to by a few individuals upon the ground that the expence of erecting it would fall upon the parish, and that there was no provision for an organist. But the Court overruled the objection. In that case the question was whether the ordinary should allow an organ to be erected; here the question is whether the faculty [10] confirming the erection is erroneous, because a clause of exoneration from future expences is not inserted. The other was the Clapham case. In that case the Commissary of Surrey had refused to allow a decree with intimation to issue, because there was no permanent provision for an organist. The Court of Arches, on appeal, reversed the decision, and decreed the faculty without such a clause.(a)

I must, then, pronounce against the appeal, because the faculty does nothing to bind the parish. It leaves the matter quite open. It neither lays the burthen on the parish, nor prevents the parish undertaking it hereafter, if the vestry should chuse to support such a burthen in case of the failure of voluntary contributions. I therefore remit the cause with the costs of appeal.

PEARCE AND HUGHES, Churchwardens of Clapham v. THE RECTOR, PARISHIONERS, AND INHABITANTS THEREOF. Arches Court, Hilary Term, February 26th, 1830.—It is no sufficient objection to the issuing of a decree with intimation to lead a faculty for erecting an organ in a parish church, that there is no provision for the future repairs, nor for the permanent salary of an organist.—In a parish church an organ cannot legally be erected without a faculty, nor will a faculty be granted without a decree with intimation in order that any of the parishioners may object; on which objection the court, considering all the circumstances of the case, is to decide.

[Referred to, Burial Board of St. Margaret, Rochester v. Thompson, 1871, L. R. 6 C. P. 456. Followed, Keet v. Smith, 1875, L. R. 4 Adm. & Ec. 404.]

This was an appeal from the Commissary Court of Surrey, upon the rejection of a motion, made on the 15th of December, 1794, for a decree with intimation to lead a faculty for erecting an organ in the west gallery of the parish church of Clapham.

The application had been made by counsel, stating, first, the act of Parliament (14 Geo. 3, c. 12) under which certain trustees were empowered to make a rate for building a church at [11] Clapham, for providing proper ornaments, and, by letting the pews, to pay off whatever debt might be incurred. The act further directed that the surplus fund should be at the discretion of the parish, in vestry assembled, for any parochial purposes. The parish bought an organ and applied for this decree, considering that the further expences of erecting and maintaining the organ might properly be defrayed out of this fund; and the trustees consented to such an appropriation; but the Judge of the Commissary Court thought that the act did not empower the trustees to dispose of the fund raised under its provisions in such a manner; and therefore that a decree with such intimation could not go. The application was afterwards renewed and put on a different ground; it was prayed that the parish might be permitted to erect an organ; the salary of the organist and the contingent expences to be provided for by voluntary contributions; but the Judge of the Commissary Court rejected this application, "by reason that no provision had been made or proposed to be made by voluntary subscription for the future repairs of the organ and a permanent salary for the organist, so as to prevent the organ or the organist from becoming a burden to the parish."

(b) The rental of the parishioners and inhabitants who voted for the erection of the organ amounted to 3145l.

(a) See the next case.

Judgment—Sir William Wynne. This was originally an application to the Commissary of Surrey, on behalf of the churchwardens of Clapham, for a decree with intimation against the vicar and inhabitants to shew cause why a faculty should not be granted for [12] erecting an organ in the west gallery of Clapham church. The ordinary practice is said to be for a decree of this nature to issue, as other citations and decrees, without motion of counsel; and on the return of the decree the Court has formed its opinion, considering the issuing of the decree as not binding on the Court, even if no one appeared to oppose, but that the Court might look at all the circumstances, and if it thought the application improper, would refuse it. In the present case a different method has been pursued, and I think one that is more regular; because in these decrees an intimation is inserted that if no one appear to shew cause the faculty shall go, which looks like an engagement to grant it, unless an objection be taken. I therefore think it is more proper for the Court to take the objection in the first instance.

Most certainly an organ is not necessary in a parish church for the decent performance of divine worship; therefore the parishioners are not bound to provide an organ: but though it is not necessary, it is extremely decent, proper, and even customary in a parish, such as this, of extent and opulence. Music has always been used in divine worship; therefore the ordinary never would think of discouraging, and never did discourage, an organ, where a parish offered to provide all expences, unless there appeared to the contrary some reason of more consideration than the benefit thence to be derived to their devotion. As, however, such a reason may exist, an organ cannot by the law of this country be erected in a parish church without a faculty; and a faculty is not granted by the or-[13]-dinary without a decree and intimation to the parishioners in order that any one may object. But the consent or desire of the parishioners does not bind the ordinary: for the consent may be imprudently given and contrary to the interests of religion. Where a church is too small, as in the case of St. Luke's, Chelsea, which I shall presently notice, there the ordinary never would grant, for the inconvenience is greater than the advantage. These circumstances the ordinary is to take into his consideration when a case is before the Court, either on objection on the part of parishioners, or on application for a decree.

The question is whether there is any ground for refusing a decree in this case. It was at first alleged that a subscription had been made in the parish with which an organ had been bought, and a vestry had been held where it was resolved that the trustees, under the act of parliament for building the church at Clapham, should be applied to for their concurrence to an arrangement by which the further expences, if any, and the salary of an organist, should be defrayed out of the surplus funds raised under that act. An addition to the decree was made stating the matter differently; that at a subsequent vestry it was resolved that the salary of the organist should be paid by voluntary subscription, and that the offer of Mr. Hague, to play the organ for what could be raised, should be accepted.(a)

[14] Supposing the question had been raised whether, under the circumstances of

(a) The minute of vestry was as follows:—"Mr. Hague having offered to play the organ for whatever sum he should be able to raise by voluntary subscriptions, and also out of the said sum to pay the bellows blower, keep the organ in tune, and defray all the other expences relating to the organ; it was resolved that Mr. Hague's offer be accepted, and that the salary of an organist and the contingent expences relating to the organ be defrayed, not out of the church-rate, but by voluntary subscriptions."

this parish, the expences could be defrayed out of the parochial rates, I think there would be ground for objection. The church-rates in Clapham are, under the act of Parliament, made by trustees in aid of the rent of pews, and other minor funds. They are, therefore, different from a church-rate made by the parishioners, which is for general parish purposes; while this fund is not thus generally applicable. The parishioners seem to have been aware of this; for on the second vestry meeting they agreed to defray the expences of the organ by voluntary contributions, and a person offered to undertake the playing and the keeping of the organ in repair.

Then it appears that such a provision was made that no expence could arise to the parish at present. But the Judge of the Commissary Court refused the decree by reason that no provision was made, or proposed to be made, for the future repairs of the organ, or the permanent salary of an organist, so that no expences might ever come upon the parish. And it is said that he rested on the case of Randall and Hodson v. Collins and Ludlow, before Sir George Lee in the Arches; known as the St. Luke's Chelsea case (Arches, 30th June, 1755). I have ordered the process to be looked up. The case was much litigated. The parties opposing the faculty appeared on behalf of themselves and others, parishioners of [15] Chelsea. There was a great opposition in the parish: there were three allegations; a petition, signed by thirty or forty parishioners, alleged that the church was too small for an organ, and that the expence would fall on the parishioners. It appeared that the houses had increased fourfold; that there was not room in the church for one-tenth of the parishioners; and that the church-room would be diminished, not very considerably, but at least nine sittings: they then proceeded to the other ground—that there was no permanent provision; and that, of the subscribers, some were dead and others had left the parish. The Chancellor of London, Dr. Simpson, granted the faculty; but the Dean of the Arches, Sir George Lee, reversed his decree. I have a note in Dr. Simpson's own handwriting:

"The Court thought an organ unnecessary in all churches; and in this it would be inconvenient; for it clearly appeared that the church was too small for the number of inhabitants, and would be made less by taking away several seats to make way for an organ. As to the annual subscriptions, the Court thought them merely nominal; that several of the subscribers were already dead, or removed; and perhaps their successors would not subscribe; but after the organ was set up, by virtue of a faculty, it must be supported, and consequently would become a burthen to the parish: and it appeared to the Court that Dr. Andrew, in 1747, thought an organ prejudicial; for otherwise, though it was set up illegally, he might have granted a faculty to confirm it. Randall and Hodson are parishioners; [16] they have a right to oppose; and the Judge thought a faculty ought not to be granted, and therefore reversed the Chancellor of London's decree; but without costs."

There is one part of this decree to which I cannot accede; viz. that after an organ has been set up by faculty that organ must be supported, and consequently would be a burthen. For I do not think that if a faculty has been obtained for an organ, and if, there being no permanent provision for its support, succeeding parishioners should not chuse to take upon themselves the expence, there is any authority to oblige them to have it played upon, especially if a clause be added to the faculty, as is often done, that the expences shall be defrayed by voluntary contributions. What consequence would ensue? that the organ would not be played upon. It might remain in its place unperformed on, and, not being essential to divine service, I think there is no duty or authority in the ordinary to compel the parishioners to contribute. A ring of bells cannot be provided for without expence—as for ropes, tuning, &c. Suppose at one time the parishioners are willing to take upon themselves such expences, and at another time refuse, the ordinary could not compel the parishioners to keep the bells in order, because they are in the steeple. There must be a bell to ring to church, and to toll at funerals: but that is all.

Then the ground that a provision for a permanent salary for an organist is necessary is not founded. Inconvenience would not follow necessarily. But what probability is there, when I consider the circumstances of this case, that the subscriptions should fail? The parishioners [17] have subscribed for the purchase of an organ: they have unanimously petitioned for the faculty, meaning at first to put the burthen on themselves by rate, then by voluntary subscription; and a person has offered to take upon himself the playing and the repairs. The probability of a deficiency is extremely slight: but there is a strong probability or certainty that there will be a sum actually provided by which the expences may be paid. By act of Parliament a certain sum has been borrowed; and the surplus may be applied for the benefit of the parish, as in vestry resolved.

Under these circumstances, with the greatest deference and respect for the Judge of the Commissary Court, and with due attention to the usual practice, I think there is not sufficient ground to refuse the decree.

THE OFFICE OF THE JUDGE PROMOTED BY BENNETT v. BONAKER, A.M. Arches Court, Trinity Term, 1st Session, 1829.—In a criminal suit a defensive plea tending to shew the promoter's motives to be malicious or vindictive is admissible, as bearing on the credit of his witnesses and on costs; but it must be specific, and confined to his conduct with reference to the defendant.—A defensive plea in a criminal suit having imputed to the promoter malicious motives, the Court is bound to admit a plea repelling such imputations: and presentments, by the churchwarden and vestry, of the clergyman's misconduct are admissible for such purpose, though not as matters of charge or proof in the original articles.—In a criminal suit against a clergyman of unimpeached moral character—remote charges of omission or irregularity in performing divine service, being shewn generally not to be "without just cause:" more recent charges, being completely rebutted: no neglect of duty being imputed for the two years next before the institution of the suit: the clergyman, as to one charge of misconduct, having erred from mistake; and as to two of the remaining charges (one of which totally misrepresented the fact) having acted properly—the Court pronounced the articles not proved: and, as no fair ground for a suit existed at the time of its institution, dismissed the defendant with his costs.—Length of time, though it may not amount to a bar to a criminal suit, will induce the Court to admit general explanation, instead of requiring a direct contradiction or explanation of each specific fact.—If, in a criminal suit, the charges are clearly proved, unaccompanied by circumstances of reasonable excuse or explanation, the Court, presuming the promoter acts from a sense of duty, will not inquire into his motives: aliter, if the misconduct be not proved; or, even if proved, be sufficiently accounted for.—To constitute in a clergyman criminal neglect of duty requiring censure and correction, there must be neglect without just cause: but unless such cause be shewn, the law will infer its absence.

[Referred to, Sheppard v. Bennett, 1870, 39 L. J. Ecc. 9.]

The articles in this case being admitted on the 4th Session of Michaelmas Term, 1828 (vol. ii. p. 25), an allegation on the part of the defendant was, on the 1st Session of Trinity Term, 1829, debated. The allegation, in the first instance, consisted of seventeen articles, besides the exhibit of a licence for non-residence; and the purport of the first article was to shew that the population of the parish did not exceed one [18] hundred and forty souls, and that the churchwarden, promoting the suit, had proceeded vexatiously and maliciously. It then went on to allege that the defendant had, "at all times from and after his incumbency, comported himself soberly and religiously, and had attentively and correctly discharged his clerical duties as vicar of the parish, save in the instances objected in the articles" (of which the allegation set forth a justification and explanation, as detailed in the judgment), and "that by such his conduct and demeanour he had given general satisfaction to the greater and more respectable part of his parishioners, and procured their esteem and respect, as well as of others, his neighbours." The concluding part of the third and the whole of the fourth article were objected to by the counsel for the promoter. The third article concluded in these terms: "And that the said William Bennett [the promoter] and others of the said persons [farmers and parishioners of Churchhoneybourne] have taken all opportunities to thwart and insult the said Reverend W. B. Bonaker, and to misrepresent his conduct and his motives."

The fourth, after alleging "that the said W. Bennett, the voluntary promoter of the office of the Judge in this cause, was and is in his general character a person of a litigious, quarrelsome, and revengeful disposition and temper, and is so accounted and reported to be by and amongst his neighbours, acquaintance, and others," went on, in substance, to plead "that in January, 1826, having quarrelled with a neighbouring clergyman [19] and his curate, he raised and circulated a false and malicious report in respect to them, and caused the same to be inserted in the Worcester Journal; that the statement was utterly unfounded, and that Bennett having made and subscribed an acknowledgment to that effect, the same was published, with his consent, in the newspaper aforesaid."

The Court sustained these objections; and, in respect to the fourth article, observed, that though where a clergyman was proceeded against criminally the Court was bound to give him every latitude of defence, and must allow him to shew that the charges proceeded from vindictive or malicious motives (for this may have a double effect, it may shake the credit otherwise due to the promoter's witnesses and bear materially on the question of costs), yet it was desirable to keep the true issue in view, and that the Court could not enter into the conduct of the promoter in regard to another transaction, and to a different party. The allegation thus reformed was admitted to proof.

Michaelmas Term, 4th Session.—On the 4th Session of Michaelmas Term a responsive allegation, of seven articles, with three exhibits annexed, was offered on the part of the promoter. It counterpleaded the first article of the defendant's allegation, and set forth "that ever since his induction, the misconduct of Mr Bonaker having become the subject of great complaint, several vestry meetings were held for the purpose of taking such misconduct into consideration, and of adopting measures necessary for remedying the same; that on the 30th of May, 1825, a presentment drawn up by Henry Grove, the [20] then churchwarden, was signed by ten of the principal parishioners, stating the irregularity in, and neglect of, the performance of divine service, and other misconduct of Mr. Bonaker; that this presentment was given in at the episcopal visitation; that a second presentment (signed by the said Henry Grove), re-stating the misconduct contained in the first presentment and some additional charges, was given in at the visitation held on the 5th of June, 1826; and that further presentments, of the same tenor, were exhibited at visitations on the 30th of October, 1826, 17th of May, 1827, and 9th of June, 1828: that in consequence of an intimation from, and recommendation of, the Bishop of Worcester, it was resolved, at a vestry held in April, 1827, that William Bennett, the then churchwarden, should be authorized to commence the present suit."

The 2d article pleaded the exhibits A and B to be "the presentments of the 5th of June and 30th of October, 1826; and that they had been delivered up by the direction of the bishop, to be produced in this cause; and further, that the other presentments had been lost, or so mislaid that the same could not be produced."

The 3d concluded by pleading "that Mr. Bonaker had not, by reason of any proceedings in respect to tithes, or by reason of having caused a rate to be made for the repairs of the church, become obnoxious to W. Bennett, or to others of the parishioners."

4th. "That the inhabitants of Cowhoneybourne, a village within the parish of Church-[21]-honeybourne, were not at any time, during the incumbency of Mr. Bonaker, prevented by floods from attending divine service, as by him falsely pleaded; for that there then was and is a bridle road from the village to the church, which path was and is constantly used, and not at any time rendered impassable."

5th. "That notwithstanding Mr. Bonaker well knew that he had not published the banns of matrimony between William Stanley and Martha Sammons on the 31st of October, 1824, nor performed any divine service in the parish church of Churchhoneybourne on that day, yet he did, with his own hand, make entries in the banns book, kept in and for the said parish, of such banns having been published three times, and therein by mistake inserted the 16th, 23d, and 30th of October as the days on which such banns were published: that, in making such entries, he represented that the banns had been so published on three successive Sundays by himself, notwithstanding in the 15th article of the allegation on his behalf it is pleaded 'that he had engaged Mr. Bloxham to officiate for him on the 31st of October, and that he was prevented from getting to Churchhoneybourne on that day in consequence of the road thereto being rendered impassable by a flood:' that the three entries are in Mr. Bonaker's handwriting; and that the banns book was seen by Joseph Price and others with such entries appearing therein: and that some time afterwards, and whilst the banns book was in Mr. Bonaker's possession, the [22] aforesaid days of October were altered by erasure, and the 17th, 24th and 31st substituted, as by a reference to the book, now in Mr. Bonaker's possession, will appear."

6th. Exhibited a (corrected) copy of such entries, certified, by Mr. Bonaker, to be a true copy.

Phillimore and Addams in objection to the allegation. Nearly thirty witnesses have been examined. Several presentments are now pleaded; they should have been the foundation of the charge. In a criminal suit the whole charge ought always to be adduced in the first instance; but here is an attempt, on the part of the promoter, not only to plead the same matter in a different form, but also to introduce new matter. The 22d of the original articles alleged that Mr. Bonaker had given a false certificate in respect to the publication of certain banns; in reply to that charge we pleaded that at the time the certificate was given the defendant had reason to believe that the banns had been duly published. Now a false entry of the banns is set up. We admit that the insertion in the banns book was irregular, but it was done to save time and trouble, and Mr. Bonaker fully expected to be at church on the Sunday after; he was, however, unfortunately prevented by illness.

Per Curiam. There is no reason to suppose that the insertion was made with any fraudulent intent.

The King's advocate and Lushington in support of the allegation.

[23] Per Curiam. The Court, after noticing that this was a criminal suit, and adverting to the general character and dates of the charges, the nature of the defence, and the number of witnesses examined, said it should have been glad to have concluded the cause; but as there had been a species of recrimination against the churchwarden, charging him with proceeding vexatiously and maliciously, and averring that the duties had been performed, it could not with propriety refuse to receive this allegation, nor suspend it, which was only done under extraordinary circumstances. That the Court was bound to allow the promoter to repel the charges of malice, and if the defendant had taken up a more extensive line of defence than necessary, he must abide the consequences that follow. That the first article shewed that the suit was not brought in contravention of the general wishes of the parish, the first presentment being signed by ten principal rate payers, a considerable proportion out of a population of one hundred and forty inhabitants.

It was objected that these presentments should have formed part of the original articles: but the Court was of opinion that, not being admissible as a matter of charge or proof, they were properly not introduced as a part of the original articles: that the Court, in that stage of the proceedings, would, under ordinary circumstances, have presumed that the churchwarden was acting in discharge of his public duties. The defence had alleged that the promoter was acting vexatiously and maliciously; and these [24] presentments the Court was now bound, in justice to the churchwarden, to admit, as repelling the imputations against him, and as possibly bearing materially upon the question of costs. The first and second articles were therefore admissible. The third and fourth articles were also admissible, as directly contradictory and explanatory. To the fifth article, and the exhibit explaining the entry of the banns, the Court had already adverted; the fact charged was undoubtedly an irregularity, and the rejoining plea gave to it a character different from that ascribed to it in the defensive allegation; and was admissible as tending to rebut the imputation of malicious motives in the original charge. On the whole, the Court could not anticipate whether the charges generally were malicious; and though reluctant to allow the case to extend itself, it was bound to admit the allegation.

In Easter Term the cause was argued upon the effect of the evidence and proofs in support of the several pleas.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This suit is brought, under letters of request from the Chancellor of Worcester, by William Bennett, described as a parishioner and churchwarden of Churchhoneybourne, against the [25] Reverend William Baldwin Bonaker, the vicar of that parish, for neglect of duty and other irregularities, and was commenced in 1828, the articles being brought in on the second session of Michaelmas Term in that year.

The heading of the articles sets forth the nature of the offences imputed, and the præsertim is in these terms:—"For neglect of, and irregularity in, the performance of divine offices as vicar of the said parish, and for indecently and irreverently digging the soil or ground of the churchyard and the said parish, and thereby disturbing the bodies of the dead buried therein, and for other irregularities and excesses." The præsertim is always construed as setting forth the nature of the principal charges; the general words as only including subordinate charges ejusdem generis.

This, then, being a criminal suit, must be proceeded in strictly: the charges must be laid in such a detailed and specific form that the party accused shall have an opportunity of contradicting or explaining them. Innocence is presumed till criminality be proved.

In this case the articles, in their whole number, consisted of twenty-seven; but six or seven of them may be considered rather as articles of form than of charge. The charges may be classed under four heads:—1st. Neglect of performing divine service, either by omission or by irregularity in time; 2d. Refusing to administer private baptism; 3d. Giving a false certificate of the publication of banns; 4th. Digging up graves and disturbing the bodies of the dead.

[26] The four first articles plead the institution of Mr. Bonaker in May, 1817, and the duties which attach to the incumbent. Sixteen articles, from the fifth to the twentieth inclusive, apply to the charges of omission or irregularity in the performance of divine service—the fifth article stating the time at which service was performed before Mr. Bonaker became the vicar; the other fifteen, which immediately succeed, specifying the instances of neglect; and twelve of those fifteen articles contain instances occurring in the winter of 1824-5, that is to say, between the middle of September, 1824, and the middle of April, 1825. The eighteenth article pleads one instance on Good Friday, 1826; the nineteenth, that in one instance, happening in January, 1827, there was no service; the twentieth, that in February, 1827, on two occasions, there was evening instead of morning service: so that the great bulk of the offences of neglect of duty charged are stated to have occurred in the winter of 1824-5. The refusal of private baptism is charged to have been made in February, 1826; the offence respecting the certificate of banns in November, 1824, and the digging up the churchyard in December, 1826, and January, 1827.

When the articles were brought in, it was strongly complained on the part of the defendant, by his counsel, that he was called to answer these charges four years after most of them were alleged to have happened. The Court felt in a considerable degree the justice of that complaint, but was of opinion that it formed no legal bar to the prosecution. All the Court could do was, first, to expect clear proof of the [27] charges, it being a criminal suit; and secondly, on the part of the defendant, to allow of general explanation; for, after such a lapse of time, it was hardly possible to produce direct contradiction or distinct explanation of each specific charge of neglect of duty.

The promoter having, in support of these charges, examined thirteen witnesses, the defendant, in the regular course, brought in a defensive allegation. It is not necessary to detail its averments minutely, but it stated generally that Churchhoneybourne was a parish of small population; that the vicarage-house had been dilapidated, and that, till the year 1825, Mr. Bonaker resided at Evesham, with the permission of the bishop, and that he performed the duty faithfully; that he raised his tithes from 30l. or 40l. to 120l., and had suits for their recovery with the farmers; that he caused the church to be repaired, and rates to be made for the purpose; that in consequence of these circumstances the present suit was vindictively instituted. It then went on to account for some irregularities—partly from the difference of clocks, partly from the roads being occasionally inundated, and partly from his own ill health, he being subject to sudden attacks of sore throat and disorders of the trachea. It alleged that, when unable to attend, he always endeavoured to procure the assistance of some other clergyman; and, when time allowed, sent notice to the parishioners. It also, in some instances, offered contradictions or explanations of specific offences charged; not only of these omissions or alterations of the service, but of the other matters alleged against him re-[28]-specting the baptism, the certificate of banns, and the digging up of the churchyard.

In support of this defence, fifteen witnesses were examined.

From the nature of this defence it was evident that the character and motives of the prosecution would be involved; namely, whether the promoter was proceeding in discharge of his official duty, or whether the suit was brought vindictively on account of these disputes about tithes and the repairs of the church. This consideration might bear in two ways upon the cause: first, it might assist the Court in forming a more correct estimate of the credit of the witnesses; and, in the next, it might be important in deciding the question of costs—which question, in cases of this sort, forms no immaterial part of the justice of the case. If the misconduct be clearly proved, unaccompanied with circumstances which might afford any probable excuse or reasonable explanation of the facts, the Court will not inquire into the motives of the promoter, but will give him credit for acting from a sense of official duty. It might, however, turn out otherwise: either that the misconduct was not proved; or, being proved, was sufficiently accounted for; and therefore a responsive allegation was given in by the promoter alleging that the parish had made several presentments at the visitations, setting forth the neglect of duty and other charges, and that these presentments were founded upon resolutions of vestry; that, in consequence of such presentments, the bishop had signified that it was the duty of the parish to proceed against the minister if the charges were true; that no [29] floods had occurred to prevent Mr. Bonaker's attendance, that the certificate of banns was not given through error, and that the banns book had been altered.

On this allegation seven more witnesses were examined, making in the whole thirty-five witnesses. Numerous interrogatories were administered on both sides: the evidence is become very voluminous, and consequently the suit very expensive.

In this state of the subject it is proper to examine, first, whether the criminal charges are proved; and, secondly, how the question of costs is to be disposed of.

On the part of the defendant it has been contended, not only that the charges are not proved to any criminal extent, but that, upon the whole, the defendant has been a meritorious incumbent. It may therefore be necessary to look shortly at the state of the parish before and at the commencement of Mr. Bonaker's incumbency.

Churchhoneybourne is a very small parish on the extreme verge of Worcestershire, about six miles east of Evesham. Cowhoneybourne is a chapelry and a separate parish adjoining, but in a different county and diocese—viz. Gloucester. The constitution of these two parishes is not very clear. Cowhoneybourne pays no tithes to the incumbent of Churchhoneybourne, raises its own separate rates, and seems formerly to have belonged to the monastery of Evesham. The chapel is now in ruins; or, as described in Bacon's Liber Regis, "it is as desecrated and converted into a private dwelling, and now the inhabitants contribute to the re-[30]-pairs of the church at Churchhoneybourne." Whether this is done under some composition, as cheaper than supporting its own chapel, is not in evidence; but the institution does not mention that the chapelry is annexed to Churchhoneybourne; and whether, as it pays no tithes, the cure of souls is strictly and legally in the vicar does not clearly appear: by usage, however, the inhabitants of the chapelry attend public worship at Churchhoneybourne.

The former incumbent, the Reverend Thomas Williams, was also the patron, and is described of Bere Regis, Dorsetshire. His curates in succession were two gentlemen of the name of Mould, father and son, who held the curacy about forty years. Mr. Mould, the son, now sixty-three years of age, has been examined, and states "that during the forty years he and his father served the church he never saw nor heard of the vicar, Mr. Williams, being within the parish." A resident incumbent was therefore an advantage the parish had not possessed for at least forty years before Mr. Bonaker's time. Mr. Mould was offered the living, but he declined to accept it, and Mr. Bonaker, who succeeded Mr. Mould as curate for two or three years, at length, in 1817, accepted the living and became incumbent.

What was the state of the living at that time? First, the church itself was so much out of repair that it required a rate of 11s. in the pound in Churchhoneybourne, and 9s. in the pound in Cowhoneybourne, to repair it, to build a new buttress for the support of the tower, and to make other repairs to the fabric and different parts of the church. Secondly, the vicarage-[31]-house had never, as far as appears, been inhabited even by a curate, and is described as reduced to a dilapidated cottage, let at a rent of about 3l. a year: and the witnesses state, and among others, Mr. Mould, that it was at one time used as a Methodist meeting-house; and, as I understand the evidence, at the time when he was curate: so that there were Methodist meetings even before Mr. Bonaker's incumbency. Mr. Mould, on the first article, thus deposes: "When Mr. Bonaker became vicar, the vicarage-house was a mere dilapidated cottage, and wholly unfit for any clergyman to dwell in: deponent, who was curate to Mr. Williams, the late incumbent and patron, remembers when the vicarage-house was used as a dissenting meeting-house by a very low order of people, and itinerant preachers used to preach at it."

It is laid in the fifth article "that for many years before Mr. Bonaker was instituted the service was performed every Sunday during the winter months at eleven in the morning, and during the summer months alternately at eleven in the morning and three in the afternoon." No arrangement could be more proper. Eleven was as early an hour perhaps as in this dairy district the families and servants of the farmers could get ready for church; and in the long days of summer alternate evening service was proper as giving a better opportunity to some to attend. But is the article true or false? Was this proper arrangement existing previously as laid in the article, or was it made by Mr. Bonaker? Mr. Mould thus deposes on the fifth article: "He was curate at Churchhoney-[32]-bourne twice: the latter time was for about four or five years previous to Mr. Bonaker undertaking the curacy. When deponent undertook the curacy on the latter occasion he was curate of Aston Subedge and Childswickham, and was therefore compelled to make the best arrangement he could for the regular performances of the church service at each of the three churches. With this view deponent on one Sunday began the service at ten at Childswickham, then went to Aston, and afterwards to Churchhoneybourne, and performed the duty there at about half-past two: on the following Sunday he commenced the service at Churchhoneybourne at ten; then went to Aston, and then to Childswickham. Thus he went on through the year. Deponent did not reside in either of the three parishes."

And on the thirty-third interrogatory: "When first he became curate of Churchhoneybourne he continued his father's habit by doing duty constantly in the afternoon, a little after twelve on one Sunday, and at one on the following, and so alternately the year round. He has found the waters out at Churchhoneybourne, so that he could not get over; but he several times persevered, not being a timid rider, and sometimes got through: at other times he got to the church by a circuitous route; but he was then on the Churchhoneybourne side, and could do so, while those at Cowhoneybourne could not get over."

Fletcher, a witness in support of the articles, confirms, in answer to the fifth interrogatory, this part of Mr. Mould's evidence; and says "that Mr. Bonaker fixed the hours and times of [33] performing divine service now in use at Churchhoneybourne."

So that up to Mr. Bonaker's incumbency the duty was performed either at ten or at half-past two by a curate serving two other churches and not residing in either of the three parishes: and for many years the evening service, "because it was shorter," was, according to the evidence of Fletcher, alone used by the elder Mr. Mould, and was performed by him about twelve or one o'clock: so that neither the Litany nor the Communion service, nor the Commandments, nor the epistle and gospel of the day were ever read to these parishioners.

Here, then, was a church extremely out of repair requiring the tower to be buttressed up: here was a vicarage-house dilapidated, used as a meeting-house or a cottage: and here was the duty performed in the manner just referred to: and yet there were no complaints: how is that to be accounted for considering the present proceedings?

The parish is in an agricultural district, and consists principally of dairy farms. It seems at one time to have been occupied by four farmers and there may now be five or six. None of them were very rigid religionists—none of them, except one, ever went to the Sacrament—none of them prevented their servants from following their ordinary occupations throughout Good Friday. The fabric of their church or the residence of their minister did not occupy their attention; but there was another circumstance which accompanied this acquiescence. The incumbent resident in Dorsetshire not only did not trouble them with his presence, but he did not trouble [34] them about his tithes—he was content to accept about one-third of what was legally his due.

When Mr. Bonaker becomes incumbent, he it is that arranges the time of duty in the proper manner stated in the fifth article: he did not at first reside, but he did the duty himself; nor does it appear that he served any other church; his vicarage-house was dilapidated; his father, an old gentleman who had been in the medical profession, and was in very advanced age, lived at Evesham five or six miles off: Mr. Bonaker, his only child, resided there with him and did the duty from thence. The Bishop of Worcester, in 1818, granted him his licence for non-residence for three years, which was for as long a period in one licence as the statute allows. It does not appear that the bishop made it a condition that Mr. Bonaker should in the meantime repair the vicarage-house, and then reside. That licence expired on the 31st of December, 1821; and it should seem, from the bishop's letter in 1822, that Mr. Bonaker applied for a renewal of this licence. The bishop's letter, dated on the 27th of January, 1822, requires the state of the glebe house to be particularized: "The Bishop of Worcester wishes to have the circumstances of the unfitness of the glebe house at Churchhoneybourne specified."

Though no new licence appears to have been granted, the bishop's sufferance is necessarily to be inferred. The bishop, and the bishop alone, had a right to issue a monition, and to call him into residence. Whether he was now required to repair the vicarage, or when the [35] vicarage was repaired, does not exactly appear: but it was repaired and made "quite a different place:" and in 1825 the bishop requires him to reside, and he does reside. On the 1st of June, 1825, the bishop writes to Mr. Bonaker: "If you are not resident by the end of this month, I shall proceed for the purpose of enforcing your residence." And again on the 9th of July in the same year: "In answer to two letters from you, I have to state that, in case you are not resident in your house at Churchhoneybourne before the expiration of the week after next, I shall immediately send to you a monition which I have directed to be made out if requisite."

Here, then, the bishop will no longer extend his indulgence. Before this time, however, it is pretty evident John Grove's complaint, sent to Mr. Clifton, the secretary, to be laid before the bishop, had reached his lordship: but I must infer that until that time Mr. Bonaker was residing at Evesham at his father's house, and was doing the duty from thence, by the bishop's sufferance.

It is necessary to see what had happened in the meantime. Mr. Bonaker had not only got the church repaired, but he had raised his tithes, and had been in a state of law and warfare with his parishioners on that subject. The tithes, which before did not produce 40*l.* a year, were now raised to 120*l.* This the vicar had a perfect right to do: the tenth part, or its equivalent, was as much his property as the other nine parts were the property of these farmers, and if they had been allowed to pocket above one half of what legally belonged to the former incum-[36]-bent, they had no just grounds nor honest right to resist the future payment of what was legally due to Mr. Bonaker. The Court does not mean to applaud the exacting the utmost penny—far from it: reasonable compromise and fair composition may be much more expedient and proper, but these tithes were not obtained by mutual accommodation. In order to enforce payment, recourse to the law was repeatedly necessary, and great animosity was unfortunately produced. Besides this, it happened one Sunday that Mr. Henry Grove being at church (it should seem that he was churchwarden at the time), and laughing during the sermon, Mr. Bonaker stopped and said "that those who could not conduct themselves properly had better leave the church," upon this Mr. Grove took up his hat and walked out. The circumstance is admitted on the cross-examination of more than one of the promoter's witnesses. Sollis, for instance, on the fifteenth interrogatory, says: "He was present at Churchhoneybourne church about four or five years ago, as he best recollects the time, and Henry Grove was also present. Respondent remembers that Mr. Bonaker, during sermon, as he believes, said 'that those who could not behave themselves decently might leave the church:' he did not name any one, but respondent well recollects that Henry Grove took his hat and immediately walked out of church."

Without entering into further particulars, it is quite manifest from the evidence that the farmers in this parish felt a strong animosity against Mr. Bonaker. They began by making verbal [37] complaints at the visitation against Mr. Bonaker for neglect of duty. A cousin of Henry Grove (John Grove), who had been a farmer, who had failed in 1816, left the parish, and returned to keep a school at Cowhoney-bourne in 1823, began a journal in September, 1824, and noting down whenever no service was performed, or whenever it was too early or too late, or whenever there was evening instead of morning service: and he sent an account of this to Mr. Clifton, a proctor at Worcester, who is also, as I have observed, the bishop's secretary, and desired him to lay it before the bishop. In 1825 there were meetings of the farmers; and a presentment was agreed upon, sent round, and signed. This course does not seem to me such as would have been pursued if the real object had been to get the service more regularly performed. No remonstrance appears to have been made to Mr. Bonaker: no notice given him, if he did not attend regularly, or assign some satisfactory reason in explanation, that John Grove, who as schoolmaster regularly with his boys attended church, would lay the journal, which he kept, before the bishop. The farmers did not call a regular vestry and give Mr. Bonaker notice to attend in order to afford him an opportunity of explaining the cause of his absence or delay: but they held these meetings among themselves, and Mr. Bonaker having once come in, they adjourned the place of meeting to a neighbouring meadow. These parishioners, having been compelled to pay their full tithes, had an undoubted right to expect in return a careful and punctual performance of the service of the church, unless the minister [38] was prevented by reasonable cause: but the course of proceeding seems more calculated to entrap and to punish than really to enforce the performance of clerical duties—more to avenge the past than to correct the future.

At length, in June, 1826, Henry Grove, being then churchwarden, gave in a presentment containing an enumeration of all the charges recorded in John Grove's journal from the 19th of September, 1824, and whatever else could be collected in the way of accusation. That presentment was laid before the bishop of the diocese; and the bishop very properly directed his secretary to inquire into the truth of these charges.

In July, 1826, the secretary went to Churchhoneybourne, and had he been satisfied of the truth of these charges, and that they could be proved, that was the time to have instituted the suit, if that were deemed necessary to enforce more punctuality—more especially as almost all the instances of neglect of duty were suggested to have taken place nearly two years before this investigation. Mr. Bonaker was then, in June, 1826, become a resident incumbent; and if proceedings were not immediately commenced they could only be justly delayed in order to see whether this interference of the diocesan would correct the conduct complained of, or whether the neglect would be persisted in. It will become necessary then for the Court to consider what are the proofs and explanations of those transactions before July, 1826, and what there was subsequently to justify the commencement of the suit two years afterwards. As to the specific facts charged from September, 1824, to [39] March or April, 1825, detailed in articles six to seventeen inclusive, the only witness who pretends to be able to prove them as laid is John Grove, with the assistance of his journal.

Now John Grove, the cousin of Henry Grove, has been so active in collecting this evidence—in applying to the witnesses for a year or two—in attending the commission and being joint agent with Mr. Clifton—that it is hardly possible to designate a more hostile and prejudiced witness; and upon again carefully perusing his evidence I find several circumstances in that evidence which induce me to listen to it with great doubt and caution.

The sixth and eighth articles lay the charges to have been neglect of duty "without just cause:" and to be criminal neglect requiring censure and correction, it must be "without just cause:" but, on the other hand, it is true that if the fact of omission or irregularity be proved, the law will from the fact infer the absence of "just cause" until such a cause be shewn. All that is correct: but then it comes to the question whether the promoter's own witnesses do not upon cross-examination furnish evidence of probable cause. It is difficult to say that, upon reading their evidence alone, there are grounds to pronounce the articles proved, or to pronounce that they do not sufficiently negative that the omissions and irregularities were not "without just cause." If there be a doubt, the defendant in a criminal suit is entitled to the benefit of it, and the Court is never to lose sight of the circumstance that the defendant is called to answer these charges four years after the facts are alleged to have taken place. The witnesses of [40] the promoter admit that Mr. Bonaker is liable to attacks of cold and hoarseness, that the clerk has sometimes been obliged to read the lessons for him, that he could sometimes hardly be heard, that whenever he was wholly prevented, or some other person attended for him, he sent over notice to the clerk or to the churchwarden in order that the fact might be communicated to the parishioners. Even on Good Friday, 1825 (when it is charged in the articles that there was no divine service at Churchhoneybourne), though the farmers made their men work, and only a very few persons probably would, according to the evidence of John Yeamans, have attended the church, Mr. Bonaker was anxious to get the duty done. Thomas Yeamans upon the sixteenth article, on the part of the promoter, says: "He well recollects that on the morning of Good Friday, 1825 (for in that year deponent looked after Mr. Bonaker's nag), he assisted in ringing the bells for morning service at Churchhoneybourne; bells were rung at eight and at nine; and it was expected that service would begin at eleven. After ringing the bells deponent went to work in the vicarage garden, and while there Mr. Bonaker's servant, in the hearing of deponent, told the parish clerk that there was not to be any service on that day, for that his master could not come from Evesham. The servant also said 'that he had been to the Rev. Mr. Bloxham; but that he (Mr. Bloxham) was not able to come.' Deponent does not recollect that any congregation assembled in church on that day: he believes that the clerk gave notice, by calling at houses, that service would not be perform-[41]-ed." And Mrs. Roper, a witness for the defendant, deposes on the 13th article of his plea "that Mr. Bonaker, the father of the Rev. Mr. Bonaker, was so ill on the Good Friday of 1825 that the Rev. Mr. Bonaker could not and did not leave him; that the old gentleman was 75 years of age, and the Reverend Mr. Bonaker, his only child, remained with his father at his particular desire; but deponent is certain that some one was spoken to to do duty for him, though it might have happened no one could attend. On Good Friday, 1826, he was prevented by his own illness; but, from his regularity and punctuality in all his clerical duties, deponent is quite positive that he had engaged some friend to do his duty for him if any person could be found to do it; and if Mr. Bonaker knew that no person could attend for him, she is certain that he sent word to the clerk or churchwarden to let the parishioners know."

That other clergymen often attended and did the duty for Mr. Bonaker, and that the brooks were liable to be flooded is, I think, clearly proved. Sollis, for example, one of the promoter's own witnesses, in his deposition upon the ninth article, "remembers two Sundays on which there was no service in the morning. One was a very rainy day, and on the other there was a flood," and this evidence he confirms by his answer to the eighth interrogatory.

Robins also, the parish clerk, another of the promoter's witnesses, says, upon the same interrogatory, "that the road is baddish in winter, and sometimes flooded in parts as high as the saddle flaps: the people from Cowhoney-[42]-bourne are sometimes prevented by the floods in the winter from coming to church, but not very often." Yet it is pleaded that the road to the church was never rendered impassable by floods; and John Grove says he was never prevented by floods from taking his boys to church. They also admit that the clocks at Churchhoneybourne were irregularly kept; that there was no parish clock; and that the farmers generally kept their own clocks in advance in order to get their men earlier to work.

Under such circumstances where a clergyman is in ill health, where there are so few clergy that it is necessary to allow the same clergyman to serve two or three churches, is it possible to prevent occasional alterations of the time of service, or occasionally even total omission of duty? All that a minister so circumstanced can do is to send notice, as soon as he can, to his parishioners to obviate disappointment and waiting; and, if possible, to get another clerical friend to do the duty, though it may often happen that he can only obtain that assistance at a different time of the day. Any omission or irregularity should, if possible, be avoided: the service ought to be performed constantly and punctually: but irregularities, arising from reasonable causes and accidents, however to be regretted, are widely different from those which require to be criminally prosecuted, and to be visited with ecclesiastical censures and an expensive suit.

Upon the explanations therefore afforded by the promoter's own witnesses, the wilful negligence seems in a great degree to be negatived: but, upon the evidence of the defendant's wit-[43]-nesses, the charges are still more satisfactorily repelled; not indeed in all instances by direct disproof of each charge—for the charges are too remote to expect a specific contradiction—but by shewing that this clergyman, instead of wilfully, or capriciously, or carelessly omitting his duty, was most anxious for the due performance of it. When he was prevented by illness from going to do his own duty he was most desirous and spared no pains to provide a substitute, and, as I have remarked, to send previously to the clerk to give the parishioners notice of the change of time.

It is no immaterial fact that no imputation is attempted to be made against Mr. Bonaker's moral and religious character. On the contrary his character in those respects is spoken to in high terms by witnesses in no degree mixed up with the feuds of this parish; by Mr. Rudge, the sheriff of the county; Mr. Murrel, a banker at Evesham; by the Reverend Mr. Mould and by others; and by the very fact that so many of his reverend brethren assist him in doing his duty. Upon this part of the case, without entering into a statement of each particular charge, the promovent appears to me to have failed in establishing omission or irregularity in performing the service "without just cause."

But how stand the charges after July, 1826, when Mr. Clifton had been there by the bishop's desire, and after Mr. Bonaker had become a resident incumbent? Since that time only three circumstances are specified. One is that no service was performed on the 28th January, 1827; the others, that there was service in the evening, instead of morning, on the 4th and 11th of [44] February—three successive Sundays in the very severest season of the whole year, and Mr. Bonaker was then resident: this alone renders it probable that Mr. Bonaker was prevented by illness. What, then, is John Grove's own entry? And there is no reason for thinking he would make it more favourable than was the fact: on the 19th article that entry is thus stated: "No service, Mr. Bonaker is ill"—not entering in his journal the illness as a report—as a doubtful fact—but as the fact. He goes on upon the 20th article, "Referring to his journal: '4th February, 1827. Service at two. Reverend Mr. Keysall. On the 11th of the same month. At one o'clock. Reverend Mr. Fowle. Notice from the clerk for one.' Deponent knows that on Saturday evening, the 3d of February, the clerk gave him notice that service would not begin on the following day until two." The performance then of the two services in the afternoon instead of the morning, on the 4th and 11th of February, by two different clergymen, and with due notice given—evidence of itself that there was no wilful neglect nor omission—is a complete acquittal of these later charges. And all the promoter's witnesses admit that for the last two years or more there is no ground of complaint; and the congregations are improved.

Robins, on the 24th article, deposes "that for the last two or three years Mr. Bonaker has been very regular in the performance of service on Sunday at the church: that is to say, after Mr. Clifton enquired about it."

Several others speak to the same effect. Even John Grove admits that Mr. Bonaker [45] was more regular: and the absence of entries in his journal, except those already noticed, is conclusive.

That during the former period the congregation was diminished is true: but the farmers had quarrelled and were at war with the incumbent, and they staid away: and their example and influence induced the cottagers to do so. It unfortunately happens that in this little remote parish no person of liberal education is resident—five or six farmers are the heads of the parish; they are unable to avoid mixing up these paltry disputes, about their pecuniary and temporal concerns, with their religious duties; because the clergyman enforces his just dues they absent themselves from church, and the cottagers (and all the cottages in Churchhoneybourne belong to the promoter William Bennett) are employed by the farmers, and they unite. Mr. Hale, one of farmers, did in the earlier stages join in the complaints of neglect of duty: but, upon further enquiry and explanation, and upon Mr. Bonaker having become resident and performing his duty thus regularly, he withdrew from the prosecution, and has given notice that he will oppose the making of any rate for paying the expences. The notice which is produced is dated before the articles were given in.

There does not appear any great inconsistency or want of candour in this course: it is only to be regretted that in 1828, after Mr. Bonaker had, as resident incumbent, been doing his duty properly, these other persons did not give up all thoughts of the present prosecution. [46] But, before proceeding to that consideration, it may be proper just to notice the other charges.

In regard to the next subject of charge, the refusal to baptize an infant brought to his house, it seems to me that the conduct of Mr. Bonaker was quite proper. The rubric expressly enjoins "that without great cause and necessity they procure not their children to be baptized at home in their houses." Such is the rubric, which is sanctioned by Act of Parliament; and the canon is to the same effect (see canons 68, 69).

It seems a little extraordinary that this solemn rite which has been retained in the Reformed Church of England, and pronounced to be one of "two only" sacraments, "generally necessary to salvation," should by many serious and well-disposed persons be so lightly treated, that it has become with them a sort of fashion to have their children christened in their houses instead of at church, and that too many of the clergy comply with the practice in the face of the canon and of the rubric. In one or two populous parishes of this metropolis the ministers have resisted and do resist it. In this parish of Churchhoneybourne a practice had prevailed of having their children half-baptized, and of then bringing three or four together to church to be christened. Robins, on the 12th interrogatory, "recollects that William Grove (not either of the Groves already mentioned, but the brother of John Grove) brought four children of different ages to be baptized at the church: he believes it happened about two years ago."

Mr. Bonaker very properly thought this was a practice to which a stop ought to be put, and [47] he gave public notice that it must be discontinued. In February, 1826, Mrs. Caldicott, a farmer's wife, was confined on the 13th; and, on Sunday the 26th (so that there was an intermediate Sunday), thinking the child ill, she sent the nurse with the child to Mr. Bonaker about half an hour before church time requesting he would baptize the child, and desiring the nurse to say that "if Mr. Bonaker wished it, the child should be brought to him at the church." Mr. and Mrs. Caldicott might therefore have provided sponsors, though Mrs. Caldicott might not be sufficiently recovered to have their "merry-making," of which Mr. Mould speaks. The nurse carried the child and delivered the former part of the message. Mr. Bonaker answered "that he could make no distinction of persons, and that unless he could be assured the child was dangerously ill he could not do it: but if they would bring the child to church to be christened he would wait there and do it." This seems to have been quite the correct course. From two circumstances this appears not to have been a case of "great necessity," such as the rubric contemplates: in the first place, it is hardly to be credited that the mother would have sent the child, in the month of February, from Cowhoneybourne to Churchhoneybourne, and have offered that the child should be carried into the cold church if it were dangerously ill: in the next place, here is the fact that the child does live, and is regularly christened some time after by Mr. Mould. Mr. Bonaker appears therefore to have been justified in the refusal, and it ought not to have been made a matter of charge.

[48] The next charge regards the circumstance of banns. The banns between one Stanley of Churchhoneybourne and a female of Long Compton were published on the 17th and 24th of October, 1824. On the 31st of October Mr. Bloxham was to have performed the duty for Mr. Bonaker, who was ill, but he was prevented by a flood: on the 7th of November, however, the banns were published the third time by Mr. Roberts, Mr. Bonaker continuing ill. The 22nd article, after stating that the banns were published on the 17th and 24th of October, goes on thus: "That such banns were not published in the church of Churchhoneybourne on Sunday the 31st of October by you or by any other person, no divine service having been performed in the said church on that day, but that notwithstanding such omission you did write or give and sign a certificate that such banns of matrimony had been duly published in the parish church of Churchhoneybourne as well on the 31st of October as on the two preceding Sundays, and that in consequence of such certificate the said William Stanley and Martha Sammons were married in the parish church of Long Compton on the sixth of November, 1824. And we further article and object that on the next day, being Sunday, the seventh of November, you published the banns of such marriage in the parish church of Churchhoneybourne."

The fact charged, then, is giving this certificate notwithstanding the omission on the 31st of October, and before the third publication of the banns; and himself afterwards publishing the banns a third time. The latter part of the [49] charge is directly proved to be false by the promoter's own witness, John Grove. On the 22nd article "deponent perfectly recollects that the Rev. Mr. Roberts, in the course of divine service, which he performed in the church of Churchhoneybourne, in the afternoon of Sunday the seventh of November, 1824, published the banns of marriage for the third time of asking between William Stanley and Martha Sammons."

At all events, then, Mr. Bonaker himself did not publish the banns the third time after giving the certificate. But what are the facts in evidence? On the 4th or 5th of November Stanley called upon a woman of the name of Wells, who frequented Evesham, and begged she would call on Mr. Bonaker and ask for a certificate. This woman could not read nor write. She called on Mr. Bonaker and asked for Stanley's certificate. Mr. Bonaker, who was then ill, supposing the banns had been published a third time on the 31st of October, gave a certificate that the banns had been thrice published. Mr. Clarke, who solemnized the marriage, says, on the 22nd article, that the document did not purport to be a regular extract from the banns book, but was only a certificate that the banns had been published on three successive Sundays. "The certificate set forth that banns of matrimony between William Stanley and Martha Sammons had, on three successive Sundays, been duly published in the parish church of Churchhoneybourne: he well recollects that such certificate was not, as in strictness it ought to have been, an extract from the banns book, but the same contained a full certificate [50] of the publication of the banns, and purported to have been signed by the officiating minister of the parish."

The fact seems plain enough. Mr. Bonaker, not having the banns book at Evesham, but concluding of course that these persons wished to be married in that week (which among this class of persons is the usual time after banns), and being unwilling to delay the marriage, gave the certificate in this general form, really supposing the banns had been published a third time on the preceding Sunday. I can discover no possible reason or inducement on the part of Mr. Bonaker to have given this certificate, knowing or suspecting it to be false. As to the manner in which the publication of the banns is entered or was corrected in the banns book, that is not the offence charged; and, in a criminal suit, the Court cannot go beyond the offence charged; and, in this case, the party has had no opportunity of answering or explaining that circumstance.

The remaining charge, as expressed in the articles, appears of a more serious cast: it is included in the præsertim of the citation and is thus laid in the 23rd article: "That you, W. B. Bonaker, in or about October, November, and December, 1826, and in January, 1827, or in some or one of the said months, did indecently and irreverently, and without any legal licence or faculty for so doing, dig up or cause to be dug up a part of the ground or soil of the churchyard of Churchhoneybourne, and did dig up and level or cause to be dug up and levelled the graves of several persons who had been interred, and in particular the graves [51] of [certain specified names], and did take and carry away or cause to be taken and carried away a great quantity of the earth or soil of the churchyard, together with the bones of human bodies buried there, and carried or caused such earth or soil and bones to be taken into your own garden."

If all this were true—not only disturbing the ashes of the dead, but applying them for the use of his own garden—it is a most indecent act. How does the fact turn out? There was a heap of earth lying near one of the gates of the churchyard; and from the circumstance that there were bones among it, this earth was probably dug up and wheeled there when the foundation for the new buttress against the tower was made. There was also in the churchyard a heap of rubbish of lime and stone left after the same operation. The churchwarden, who conducted the repairs, did not so far regard the decent appearance of the churchyard as to remove even the rubbish. A part of the lime and stone was removed by Hale and spread upon the road near the gate. The heap of earth near the gate was close to the path, and, besides being very unsightly, rendered it very inconvenient to bring a hearse or a cart into the churchyard. Now for both these reasons Mr. Bonaker had the whole removed. Then, as to the charge of digging up graves: instead of digging up the graves and disturbing the bodies, he merely levelled the little mounds on the top of the graves, which, though they were almost level with the surface in consequence of the coffins having mouldered, were still inconvenient for [52] hearses, and after levelling these he laid down again the same turf. This operation could not possibly disturb any of the bodies buried in these graves.

Again, as to the charge of having removed any bones, even with the heap of earth near the gate: Mr. Bonaker, it seems, was not privy to any such removal: the bones —part at least of them—were collected, as stated by Charles Ashevin, one of the promoter's own witnesses, and were deposited in the churchyard.

Finally, as to the earth being carried into his garden, as it would be inferred, for his own use and benefit. It happens that the public church-path passes through his garden; and the earth was carried there to fill up some holes and pools, and to improve the access to the church for the convenience of the parishioners and inhabitants of Cowhoneybourne who came that way. All the promoter's own witnesses again admit that the churchyard is very much improved in its appearance; and yet out of these facts it is that this serious accusation of "irreverence and indecency" has been framed, charging Mr. Bonaker with digging up graves and carrying away the bones and earth into his own garden: and to support this very charge, Bennett, and John Grove, and

Mr. Clifton, have been hunting up evidence for two years past, as stated by Sollis in his answer to the third interrogatory.

This finishes the examination of the proofs respecting the several criminal charges made against the defendant. It remains to be considered how the important question of costs is to be disposed of.

[53] The Court does not rely upon the opinion of the defendant's witnesses, that the suit is brought vindictively on account of the disputes about tithes. The Court looks to the facts. In July, 1826, when the bishop sent Mr. Clifton to enquire into the truth of the complaints, either the suit should have been brought then, or it should not have been brought at all. Subsequent to that time no circumstances occurred which could justify the institution of a suit in 1828. On the 9th of June in that year the charge is kept up by a new presentment to the bishop of the diocese, suggesting a fresh instance of neglect in January, 1828. This presentment is annexed to the interrogatories addressed to the Bishop of Worcester, and is signed "William Bennett, churchwarden." The presentment begins in the following terms:—"The Rev. Wm. Bonaker has discontinued to reside at Honeybourne for the last seven or eight months, except a day by chance: he neglected to perform divine service at the church on Sunday the 13th of January last, and the congregation were under the mortification of retiring from the church without seeing a minister." Now either this charge was not true, or it could have been satisfactorily answered; for it is not included in the articles of charge, though it is suggested to be a recent act, and the presentment to the bishop himself is just before the commencement of the suit. Mr. Bonaker, accompanied by the churchwarden, waits upon the bishop, offering to explain his conduct and exculpate himself; but the bishop, under the advice of Mr. Clifton, who was then [54] with him, declines hearing Mr. Bonaker's exculpation, as a suit was begun.

However, upon such representations, or rather misrepresentations, to the bishop, they endeavour to bring in his lordship's authority to sanction these proceedings. That right reverend and highly respectable prelate gave no sanction, except what was quite correct—if the facts are true and can be established it will be proper to proceed: "provided," says his lordship, "the complaints can be proved." It is also attempted to call in the sanction of vestry: but there was no vestry, or any thing to bind the parish or justify a rate: there was a combination and subscription, as stated by one of the promoter's own witnesses. Fletcher, on the 22nd interrogatory, thus deposes: "He believes that Mr. Corbett, Thomas and William Bennett, three Caldicotts, Mr. Hall, Henry Grove, and respondent's son have all signed a paper which, he believes, was a petition to the bishop against Mr. Bonaker: and among them (every one paying a part) he believes that 30l. was collected to be sent to Mr. Clifton to begin the suit: he supposes as they have begun, they must go on to meet the expence."

Thus it is that the preparation for the suit commences.

What then was the state of the parish in 1828, when the proceedings were begun, if compared with its condition, as already mentioned, in 1817, when the incumbency of Mr. Bonaker takes place? The fabric of the church had been repaired: the churchyard had been rendered [55] decent in appearance and convenient for use: the church-path had been restored and the holes filled up: the vicarage-house, from a dilapidated cottage, had been made a fit residence for the incumbent: for the preceding two years the parish had had the advantage of a resident minister, who, at least during that period, had performed the duty at the most convenient hours and without affording any just grounds of complaint: in these respects the state of the parish formed an advantageous contrast to its condition for the preceding forty years. One of the leading parishioners, Mr. Hale, who had joined at first with the other farmers (whose tithes had been raised) in thinking Mr. Bonaker had neglected his duty, had now become so far satisfied, either of his own misapprehension, or of the propriety of forgetting past disputes, as to return to his attendance at the public service, and to accept the office of vicar's churchwarden, and had given a notice protesting against the suit and against a rate to support it: the congregation at church was also improving by a better attendance among the lower classes. If in 1828 the other farmers had followed the example of Mr. Hale, had laid aside animosities, had been content to pay the minister his just dues, they having succeeded on their part in getting a resident incumbent, and the duty regularly performed; if they, and those who could be influenced by their example, had returned to their attendance at the public service, the moral and religious character of the parish, and the harmony and mutual charities and kindly feelings of the inhabitants and their pastor might [56] have been all that could rationally be expected. Instead of that the present mischievous suit was undertaken, and has been conducted with considerable acrimony and at a heavy, and in some respects unnecessary, expence. The Court is compelled to take all these matters into its consideration. The question of costs forms an important branch of the case. Even if any omissions and irregularities had taken place in 1824 and 1825, and previous to July, 1826, which required explanation (but which explanation, I think, candid enquiry might have obtained without any suit), yet in 1828 it is difficult to discover any fair ground for instituting the present proceedings. Mr. Bennett is the promoter, and he is the party responsible to the defendant: it is to be feared that even the taxed costs may not indemnify the latter for the expences in which he has been involved; still less can any compensation be afforded him for the harassment and anxiety to which he has been exposed by this proceeding.

It really, therefore, does appear to me, upon the most careful and dispassionate consideration I have been able to give the whole evidence, that it would be far short of justice if, in pronouncing the articles not proved and dismissing the defendant, the Court did not accompany that sentence by condemning the promoter in costs.

[57] ROGERS v. ROGERS. Arches Court, Trinity Term, 1st Session, 1830.—An allegation, pleading facts to infer connivance as a bar to the husband's prayer for a sentence of separation, by reason of his wife's adultery, rejected, because, as no single fact pleaded necessarily inferred a knowledge of the wife's guilt, nor a suspicion that an adulterous intercourse had been, or was about to be formed; and as the whole, taken together, did not warrant an imputation on the husband of consenting to, or intending, his wife's adultery, his conduct laid in the allegation, even if proved, would not amount to connivance; to constitute which there must be intentional concurrence.—A plea of connivance does not necessarily admit adultery.—Connivance is a bar to a suit for separation, by reason of adultery, on the principle that "volenti non fit injuria."—To constitute connivance, active corruption is not necessary; passive acquiescence, with the intention, and in the expectation that guilt will follow, is sufficient: but, on the other hand, there must be consent, not mere negligence, inattention, confidence, or dullness of apprehension.

This was a suit instituted in the Consistory Court of London, and brought by John Rogers against Mary Ann Rogers, his wife, by reason of her adultery. The libel was admitted without opposition; but an allegation on behalf of the wife, pleading the connivance of the husband, having been rejected, an appeal was prosecuted to this Court. On a former session the admissibility of the allegation was debated by the King's advocate and Phillimore on the part of the husband, and by Addams and Haggard for the wife, and the Court, on this day, proceeded to give its judgment.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is an appeal from the rejection of an allegation given on behalf of the wife in the Consistory Court of London. The suit was originally brought by the husband for separation on account of the wife's alleged adultery, and the outline of the case, as stated in the libel, is that the parties, being both of age, were married in 1810, cohabited at Ranby in Nottinghamshire till June, 1829, and had several children, but none of whom are living. The adultery is charged to have been committed with Joseph Whitaker, a young man living at Morton Grange in the same neighbourhood. It is stated that the separation took place in consequence of a quarrel, but no adultery nor any indecent familiarities are charged before the separation. On the separation the wife went to [58] Leamington, then to Scarthing Moor in Nottinghamshire, where she met Whitaker; and it is alleged that they afterwards arrived together in London, and, at the service of the citation, were cohabiting together in a state of adultery. That is the sort of case set up by the husband.

On the part of the wife an allegation is offered, not defensive in respect to the adultery after separation, but charging the husband with previous connivance—a defence which does not necessarily admit the charge of any adultery. Without doubt, connivance on the part of the husband will, in point of law, bar him from obtaining relief on account of the adultery which he has allowed to take place. Volenti non fit injuria (a)[1] is the principle on which the rule has been founded. Several cases have occurred within my recollection when the wife has been dismissed on that ground, though the adultery has been fully proved against her. Timmings v. Timmings (infra, p. 76); Lovering v. Lovering (infra, p. 85). In both these cases the Court held the adultery fully proved, but it held the corrupt connivance of the husband to be likewise clearly established. Allegations pleading connivance have also been admitted in other cases. In Moorsom v. Moorsom (infra, p. 87) such an allegation was admitted, though the proof of it failed. In Gilpin v. Gilpin (infra) a similar allegation was also ad-[59]-mitted, as well probably also as in several other cases. In these cases it was held not to be necessary that any active steps should be taken on the part of the husband to corrupt the wife; to induce and encourage her to commit the criminal act. Passive acquiescence would be sufficient to bar the husband, provided it appeared to be done with the intention and in the expectation that she would be guilty of the crime; but on the other hand it has always been held that there must be a consent. The injury must be volenti, it must be something more than mere negligence; than mere inattention; than over-confidence; than dullness of apprehension; than mere indifference: it must be intentional concurrence in order to amount to a bar. Thus in Walker v. Walker, Lord Stowell, after stating that the adultery was fully proved; that the intercourse was for a long time carried on with considerable secrecy, proceeded: "The defence is not a denial of the fact, but that which, if established, is said to be equivalent in law. It is said that the husband connived; but they do not impute active means, but a passive consent. I take the position laid down by Dr. Arnold to be the true doctrine, that passive consent is sufficient; but there must be a consent, an acquiescence of his will; not mere negligence; not too high a confidence, or a misplaced confidence: there must be evidence that he was passively concurrent; that he saw the train laid for the corruption of his wife; that he saw it with pleasure, and gave a degree of passive concurrence to it." (a)[2]

[60] So in Moorsom v. Moorsom, to which I shall presently have occasion to refer more fully, the same learned Judge laid it down: "The first general and simple rule is, if a man sees what a reasonable man could not see without alarm; if he sees what a reasonable man could not permit, he must be supposed to see and mean the consequences; but this is not to be too rigorously applied, without making allowance for defective capacity. Dullness of perception, or the like, which exclude intention, is not connivance."

Again, "Though, to bar the husband, there must be intention on his part, I have no difficulty in saying that mere passive connivance is as much a bar as active conspiracy."

The evidence to establish connivance can hardly in any case be other than circumstantial: it can seldom happen that the connivance can be proved by one or two broad facts; that two cases of circumstances can exactly coincide in all their features. In the case of Gilpin v. Gilpin, which was so much pressed in argument, several strong circumstances occurred which are not to be found in the present case, as there are circumstances in the present case which did not occur in that case. There, the husband himself introduced the asserted paramour to his young wife, did every thing in his [61] power to promote the intimacy, invited him to visit his wife when he, Gilpin, was from home, requested him to attend her to the rooms at Bath, and, among other circumstances, the fact (strongly relied upon by the Judge in admitting the allegation) of the husband, his wife, and this man walking, one evening, out of Bath

---

(a)[1] In Forster v. Forster, 1 Hagg. Con. 146, Sir William Scott says: "A fourth defence is, that he has connived at, encouraged, and promoted his own dishonor; for in that case the general rule of law comes in—'Volenti non fit injuria'—no injury has been done, and therefore there is nothing to redress."

(a)[2] Consistory, M. T. 1796.—The Court finally pronounced for the separation, concluding its judgment as follows:—"Walker had no intimation or suspicion of criminality till the discovery in October, though he might suspect that she was not sufficiently guarded: he receives the news with the affliction and distress of an affectionate husband: his conduct was inconsistent with that of a consentient husband; though from humanity he did not discharge her till after her delivery. There is nothing in the evidence which in the least tends to shew that he is not entitled to relief."

to the lodgings of the husband, who remained and slept there, allowing the wife and her gallant to return together to Bath for the night. Even that might have been explained away, but that, and the other circumstances coupled together, amounted, on the whole, to such a case of consent and intention as required the Court to admit the allegation to proof.

It will be proper, then, to examine this allegation in order to see whether, if all the facts detailed in it were proved, the Court must impute to the husband this base conduct of consenting to the wife's criminality. If the facts are equivocal, the presumption is in favour of the absence of intention: it cannot readily be presumed that any husband would act so contrary to the general feelings of mankind as to be a consentient party to his own dishonor: the effect of which would be to leave him legally bound for life to a corrupt and adulterous wife. It is necessary, therefore, to see what are the facts laid, and also to compare them with some cases which have turned upon the same point.

The allegation pleads, in the 1st article, "that the husband treated his wife with great neglect and severity—was morose and penurious and debarred her of suitable society, though she brought him a fortune of 30,000l." These traits of character and conduct do not tend to conni-[62]-vance, and indulging her in criminality; they rather point to cruelty. The Court will, however, for the present, take this to be the true character of the husband.

The 2d article pleads "that, in August, 1818, he carried his wife and her sister to Scarborough, left them there with a female servant only, without taking them lodgings." This may shew either that, eight years after marriage, he reposed confidence in or was indulgent to her, or it may shew indifference and neglect: but it could not be with a view to Whitaker, for their acquaintance had not then commenced; "that she there became acquainted with Whitaker, then of the age of eighteen, that she remained there several months, and that the husband only came to visit her once, and then only for two days." This acquaintance then was of her own making. Whitaker was not introduced by her husband—he was a mere youth, while Mrs. Rogers was nearly forty. Whitaker also was a neighbour, and came from the same parish. This latter part of the article develops only traits in the husband of the same character as those in the earlier part, viz. indifference, indulgence, or confidence, but no marks of guilty connivance.

The 3rd article pleads "that after Mrs. Rogers' return home Whitaker visited her; that she was often at her aunt's (till her death in 1827) at Retford, four miles from Ranby, and that Whitaker frequently drove her there in a chaise drawn by his own pony; that Rogers never accompanied her, and refused to buy her a pony."

The 4th article states "that in 1820 she at-[63]-tended for three days a sale at Garnston: that Whitaker drove her there in the chaise and remained with her during each day's sale; that they afterwards called at his father's, and drove home late in the evening." In these I can see nothing more than the ordinary civilities which pass between country neighbours. Here was an idle young man, living with his parents, glad to employ his time in escorting a lady about; here was a morose, penurious, indifferent husband glad to save himself trouble and expence, but there was nothing from which to infer bad intentions on the part of Whitaker, nor any ground to suspect, on the part of the husband, that he was consentient to his wife's falling the victim to the attentions of this young man.

The fifth article pleads "that Mrs. Rogers frequently went to the house of Whitaker's father, a mile distant from Ranby: that once, in 1822, Rogers went with his wife when Whitaker's father and mother were from home: that this was his only visit, and that on this occasion Whitaker kissed Mrs. Rogers: that Rogers either was, or pretended to be, out of humour with his wife; but shortly afterwards he became in good spirits, and remained till late in the evening."

Rogers might have many good reasons for not forming an intimacy with Mr. and Mrs. Whitaker, the parents of this young man, especially as Rogers was not willing to allow his wife suitable society, being himself morose and penurious; nor does it appear that the father or mother warned Rogers of the danger of permitting the intercourse between their son and his wife, nor were themselves alarmed at it. As to the kiss, there is no explanation given of what led to it, [64] nor the manner of it it might be from some innocent cause and be innocently given, and from the bare manner in which this familiarity is pleaded, it may not perhaps be too much to infer that such was the case. But, at all events, what did the husband do? This happened in 1821, seven years before the separation; he thought it an unbecoming freedom; he appeared out of humour at it; and the fact is that no other kiss nor any other undue familiarity is alleged to have taken place before the separation.

The 6th and 7th articles plead "that Rogers and his wife took to separate beds in 1822; and, about a year after, to separate apartments, and so continued to live till Mrs. Rogers left the house." "That her first pregnancy occurred in 1823; that the child was currently reported in the neighbourhood of Ranby to be Whitaker's; that after her confinement Whitaker shewed her great attention; adjusted her person and clothes on the sofa, administered her medicines to her in the presence of her husband, and that these attentions were noticed by the servants."

There might be good reasons for this separation: it does not infer crime, nor is it suggested that Whitaker ever slept in the house. If however it is intended to aver that all matrimonial intercourse ceased, and that the child subsequently born was not, and was known by Rogers not to be—what the law presumes it—the child of the husband, the averment should have been direct and pointed, not thus obscure and equivocal; if indeed any such averment could effectually be made, considering the circum-[65]-stances under which the parties were living at, previous and subsequent to the birth of the child, and the apparent treatment of it as legitimate. As to the reports in the neighbourhood, servants are apt enough to set such stories on foot, but it is not alleged that the reports reached the husband so as to require him to put an end to the intimacy; there is nothing to shew that he was aware that her character was suffering. Again, as to adjusting her clothes on the sofa, servants in a family of this kind are pretty much alive to suspicions of this description. These too are attentions which a dull man, a man of obtuse understanding, a morose, indolent, and inattentive man might allow without thinking any harm would ensue: he would only consider them as officious attentions and civilities from this young man—attentions which undoubtedly would not be allowed by a man of refinement, who would not suffer any one to render what he would be so desirous to pay himself: but, from Mr. Rogers' character, he would not be alive to these feelings.

The 8th article alleges "that during the succeeding years Whitaker was much at Ranby; remained there whole days; Rogers encouraged his visits, went out, leaving Whitaker with his wife; that she frequently visited the theatre at Retford accompanied by Whitaker, and returned late at night; of summer evenings walked out together arm in arm; that on some occasions Rogers would accompany them a short distance and then leave them, and that on others, when he saw them approach-[66]-ing, he would turn another way." Now all this might go on without a dull morose husband even suspecting it would lead to mischief: considering their disparity of years, he might not surmise that this lad had any such views—he might regard it as mere innocent society, or might have that confidence in his wife that he could not fancy it would lead to mischief.

The 9th article pleads "that at Worksop market ordinary Whitaker and Rogers dined every week at the same table; that Whitaker went away before Rogers, and was at Rogers' house when the latter returned home." The same observations here apply. Rogers might well suppose that Whitaker had no taste for the enjoyments of Worksop market ordinary, and might prefer going to Mrs. Rogers' house and having his tea there.

The 10th article pleads "that once in 1827, at Rogers' house, Mrs. Rogers and Whitaker had words; that Whitaker left the house in anger—that Rogers urged his wife to follow him to his father's and apologize." If Rogers thought that his wife was rude, what impropriety was there in his urging her to make up the quarrel? This young man was convenient in attending and escorting her; but it does not follow that the husband had suspicions of improper conduct. All this then might be done with perfect propriety; it might, it is true, be part of a plan to seduce his wife; but the facts do not necessarily lead to that conclusion nor amount to what the law calls "intentional consent."

The eleventh article pleads "that several times in the last six years of their cohabitation Mrs. Rogers visited Mr. and Mrs. Volans [67] at York, for months together; that Rogers did not accompany her nor go to see her while there; that Whitaker on one or more occasions visited Mrs. Rogers with the knowledge of Rogers, and accompanied her to the coach: that Whitaker did not visit at Rogers' house during Mrs. Rogers' absence, but immediately on her return resumed his visits." This shews inattention to his wife on Rogers' part, but it is not surprising that Whitaker did not visit him, for there were no terms of great cordiality between Rogers and Whitaker: and the latter was the friend and acquaintance of Mrs. Rogers, and did not pretend to cultivate Rogers' intimacy on his own account. Besides, it must be remembered that this article details facts spread over six years: she was visiting her friends, and this Rogers might allow without any intention to forward her guilt. Once or oftener in six years Whitaker called upon her there; this is no more than mere common civility. Mr. and Mrs. Volans were not suspicious of any impropriety, otherwise they would have given some hint to the husband. The facts pleaded shew indeed that he was not a very affectionate husband; they may also shew that he had great confidence in his wife; but this is very different from establishing that he intended by such neglect to lead on his wife to a guilty attachment, or that he was corruptly conniving at actual criminality.

The 12th pleads "that upwards of a year before the separation the attentions of Whitaker were the talk of the neighbours and servants." And so they might be, and they might be censorious without any just cause; [68] but it is not stated that the husband was informed of their suspicions.

The 13th and 14th articles merely give a different version from that stated in the libel of the immediate cause of the separation. The 13th article recites the fourth article of this libel,(a) and in contradiction pleads "that the separation did not take place on account of Rogers' remonstrating because Whitaker had driven Mrs. Rogers from Retford; that Rogers expressed no displeasure thereat; that on the evening of that day Whitaker drank tea and supped with Rogers and his wife, and continued to visit them until Mrs. Rogers left the house."

The 14th pleads "that Mrs. Rogers, before the 30th May, proposed going to Cheltenham with Whitaker's mother: that Rogers had thereupon fixed that his two sisters should visit him during his wife's absence: that after her return from Retford, on the 30th of May, Mrs. Rogers said she was not then going to Cheltenham; that a quarrel ensued, and he [69] said 'she might go to Hell if she chose:' that on this she proposed a deed of separation, to which he agreed; that instructions were given to his solicitors at Retford, and were communicated to Rogers; that they came to no final arrangement of terms, but settled that Mrs. Rogers should go to Leamington; that on the sixth of June, 1829, Rogers himself ordered the chaise, and that whilst it was waiting he wrote a letter by her to his seedsman to be left on the road." The arrangement to go with Whitaker's mother, and the visiting at his father's and mother's are pretty strong evidence that no suspicion existed in either quarter that there was anything wrong in the connexion. The grounds of the quarrel are not material. The husband and wife disagree: he uses a very coarse expression: a separation is to take place: and Mrs. Rogers to go to Leamington; but, so far from suspecting her guilt, the husband sends for a chaise and gives her a letter to convey for him.

In the whole of this allegation I do not see any one fact from which the Court can necessarily infer a knowledge of the wife's misconduct, nor even a suspicion that an adulterous intercourse was formed or was about to be formed; nor is the whole taken together sufficient to warrant the Court in imputing to the husband a consent to the wife's dishonour, nor an intention that she should form an illicit connexion, nor even in concluding that adultery had been committed before separation; for none is charged nor admitted, though something of an insinuation of that sort may be intended in [70] the articles respecting the separate beds and rooms, and the subsequent birth of a child.

(a) The 4th article of the libel pleaded: "That on the 30th of May, 1829, Rogers remonstrated with his wife for suffering herself to be driven home by Whitaker from Retford, and intimated that he (Whitaker) should not come to his house again; whereupon Mrs. Rogers became very angry, and, flying into a passion with her husband, declared that she would no longer live or cohabit with him, and insisted upon a separation. That various differences and altercations having previously taken place between Rogers and his wife, he at length agreed thereto; and instructions were given to a solicitor to prepare a deed of separation; but whilst the same was in preparation, to wit, on the 6th of June last, Mrs. Rogers quitted the house and society of her husband."

Rogers is described as morose, penurious, and unkind; not as an affectionate, attentive husband—warmly attached to his wife. A husband of the former description is not likely to perceive little attentions which would excite the alarm and rouse the jealousy of the latter. The warmer the affection, the more jealous and vigilant and the more likely to take alarm is the person who entertains such affection. Rogers had also been married nearly ten years before the acquaintance began; and he might feel, and must naturally be presumed to feel, full confidence in his wife's chastity, though she might take advantage of the attentions and civilities of this young man, and find it convenient that he should accompany her to different places and give her the amusement of his society, as the husband and wife were not very fond of each other's company. The acquaintance continues for nearly ten years more: yet, as far as appears, no indecent familiarity ever passed either in the presence of the husband or at all. On one occasion there was a kiss: what accidental circumstance might lead to it is not explained; but the husband resented it; he shewed that he thought it too great a freedom; he appeared displeased; and no such freedom, nor any other, is ever again repeated. It is said that their intimacy was the talk among the neighbours and servants; and such scandal often exists without any just foundation—often, at all events, without the husband hearing or suspecting his own dishonour; but it is not suggested that any servant or friend hinted to the [71] husband that such reports existed; still less that any facts had taken place which should require his vigilance.

I have already noticed that, to amount to connivance so as to bar the husband, there must be circumstances fixing upon him "intentional concurrence." To shew the degree of proof required by these Courts before such baseness can be imputed to a husband, and before such a heavy grievance can be inflicted upon him as that of remaining fixed with an adulterous wife, I will state the judgments given in two or three cases in which the point has arisen. In Moorsom v. Moorsom, as already mentioned, the connivance was pleaded and an allegation admitted. The following is the sentence, at the final hearing upon the evidence.

[The Court here read a note of that judgment. Vide infra, p. 105.]

In my opinion the circumstances in that case were infinitely stronger than those imputed to Mr. Rogers: yet the Court would not venture to refuse a separation by pronouncing that there was intentional consent. I may add that no Judge was more alive to any misconduct on the part of the husband than the eminent individual who then presided in the Consistory Court, but he was also cautious in administering justice according to law. In Crewe v. Crewe adultery was charged: the connivance was not pleaded: the wife did not give any defensive plea, nor even cross-examine the witnesses; there was much the appearance of collusion: and that as well as connivance were suggested in argument. The Judge made several difficulties and post-[72]-poned the decision before he finally pronounced sentence.

[The Court read a note of the judgment in Crewe v. Crewe, vide infra.]

In this case, again, the circumstances are infinitely stronger than those laid in the present allegation: in the latter, the adultery was notoriously going on for four years together; and, in both, during cohabitation. In the present case no adultery is charged nor admitted till after the separation. To support such a case as the present, where no adultery is charged nor admitted during cohabitation, it would require the clearest possible evidence of intention and consent. There is some doubt whether connivance at adultery during cohabitation would be even a bar, in point of law, against a suit for adultery with a different person, long subsequent to separation. I say that there is a doubt, on the authority of my predecessor in the case of Hodges v. Hodges (p. 118, post).

In this present case during cohabitation there was no adultery; no—not even any indecent familiarity. I do not say that if, during cohabitation, connivance at actual adultery, proximate acts, or even at such gross familiarity as necessarily inferred consent and intention to prostitute his wife, were clearly established, that the husband could not obtain relief because the wife continued, or even commenced, an adulterous intercourse with the same person after separation; that would be a case different from that of Hodges v. Hodges: but, in the present case, [73] my opinion is that the facts are not sufficient to fix any connivance. No defence is offered to the charge of adultery: it is not admitted in her plea, unless, as I have said, it is intended to be admitted by insinuation in the articles respecting the separate beds, and the subsequent pregnancy and birth of a child: but this is so ambiguous that the Court cannot rely on it. The adultery must be proved. If the husband fails in the proof the wife will be entitled to her dismissal; but if the adultery be proved, then all the circumstances laid in this allegation would not, if they also were proved, establish connivance, and therefore would be no legal bar to a sentence of separation. Whether such a husband, morose, severe, inattentive, negligent, should be entitled to a special legislative interference, dissolving the marriage and enabling him to marry again, is quite a different question, and rests upon very different principles; but his conduct does not amount to a legal bar to a sentence à mensâ et thoro: and therefore, on the grounds stated, thinking the Chancellor of London did right to reject the allegation, I pronounce against the appeal, and remit the cause.

On the 17th of July, 1830, the cause came on in the Consistory Court upon the proofs in support of the libel: when, after adverting briefly to the evidence, the Court signed the sentence of separation.

[74] Note.—As there are no cases in print in which the doctrine of connivance has been the subject of much consideration and discussion, and as the Court of Arches, in the judgment of Rogers v. Rogers, particularly referred to several manuscript judgments, some cases, illustrative of the principle, are here appended.

RIX v. RIX. Arches, 1777.—On proof, either directly or presumptively, of the wife's adultery, great inattention on the part of the husband will not bar him. To establish such a defence he must have been privy to her guilt, or have led her into the crime.

On appeal.

This was a suit brought by the husband against the wife by reason of her adultery, and on the 4th Session of Michaelmas Term, 1776, Dr. John Bettesworth, the Judge of the Consistory Court of London, pronounced that the husband had failed in proof of his libel. There had been no action at common law, and the wife had not given in an allegation. From this sentence the husband appealed.

Judgment—Sir George Hay. It is clear that there has been a criminal conversation between the parties. If the fact is proved, either directly or presumptively, which is the general case, the Court is bound to grant its sentence. Ocular proof is seldom expected; but the proof should be strict, satisfactory, and conclusive. Keeping company with a stranger privately as Mrs. Rix did, there arises from such clandestinity the strongest presumption: and where there are to that clandestinity addi-[75]-tional circumstances in proof, the Court can have no doubt. A single witness with circumstances is sufficient in cases of this kind. The man was frequently alone in the lady's bed-chamber; this is a very strong circumstance of criminality: he was more than once seen on her bed: and the witness heard them there conversing after the family were gone to bed. The law presumes what passed, though the witness has declined to mention it. There is evidence of those indicia which in law are proofs—marks of two persons in the bed. The witness says "she has no doubt of the criminal conversation." I cannot find a doubt with respect to the circumstances at Newport. This being the case, superfluous proof is unnecessary.

The difficulty is with respect to the supposed connivance, approbation, and privity of Mr. Rix. If there is a connivance on the part of the man, there is no right to a compensation from the adulterer; nor could the husband obtain a sentence here, though the adultery should be fully proved. This was the case of Mrs. Cibber.(a) Nottage swears that Rix was a stranger to the journey to Newport. The servant boy gives ground of suspicion by saying "that he believes Mr. Rix knew of it;" and assigns as a reason, "his lying there the night before." Rix and this man were acquainted. The boy swears the husband sometimes knew of this man lying in the house: but is it an inference from thence that he was acquainted with his views? The evidence is directly the contrary. There has been, I think, a great inat-[76]-tention in the husband to his family: but is a Court of Justice, on a suspicion of the husband's inattention, to suppose him accessary to the turpitude of his wife?

It would have been better if a suit had been brought against the adulterer at common law: but it would be going too far for me to pronounce, upon a supposition of connivance, without any evidence of the husband's knowledge. The clandestinity as well shews that Rix was not privy, as it shews what were the views of this paramour.

(a) See a notice of this case in Hodges v. Hodges, p. 118, post.

But, whether privy or not, there is no proof that he was. Inattention is not sufficient. I cannot presume privity without proof. If a wife is led into the crime by the husband there is no pretence for a sentence on his side. There is full proof of the wife's criminality; and not the least ground to suspect the husband's connivance. I am of opinion that the sentence below is not justified by the proof.

TIMMINGS v. TIMMINGS. Consistory, Hilary Term, 4th Session, 1792.—Great facility in condonation of adultery with A., taking no notice of adultery with B. (of which he could not be ignorant), conduct amounting to an invitation to adultery with C. —not merely to giving free scope to the wife's licentiousness, in order to obtain conclusive evidence of guilt; matrimonial cohabitation, after being in possession of full legal proof of such adultery, are criminal connivance and collusion, barring the husband of relief for his wife's adultery, all happening within two years after marriage.—In a suit for separation by reason of the wife's adultery the husband must prove his case so that his own evidence shall not create a bar, by reason of connivance or compensatio criminum—for of such evidence the wife is entitled to the full benefit.—A facility of condonation of adultery on the part of the husband leads to the inference that he does not duly estimate the injury, and will induce the Court to look with jealousy at his subsequent conduct.—Conduct amounting to an invitation to adultery, and not merely to giving scope to the wife's licentiousness, in order to obtain conclusive evidence of guilt, is legal prostitution.—The wife having committed adultery on the first of three successive nights, and the husband, aware, and having full proof of this, sleeping with her on the second, condones thereby the previous adultery, and cannot take advantage of further adultery on the third night.—Semble, that the husband, by pleading that the wife slept at his house on the night after the last act of adultery charged (of which adultery he was at the time informed), takes on himself the onus of shewing that they did not sleep together on that night—though, generally speaking, the party relying on condonation, as a bar, should plead it.

[Discussed, Dillon v. Dillon, 1841, 3 Curt. 86. Dissented from, Gipps v. Gipps & Hume, 1864, 11 H. L. Cas. 1.]

This was a prosecution instituted by the husband against his wife for a separation by reason of adultery. The marriage in 1789 was confessed and proved.

Dr. Nicholl and Dr. Swabey for the husband.

Dr. Laurence and Dr. Crespigny contrà.

[77] Judgment—Sir William Scott (Lord Stowell). In cases of this nature it is incumbent on the husband to make such strict proof of the fact charged as shall not involve himself or create a legal bar; for if, by evidence which he brings to establish adultery, he at the same time involves and implicates himself, the wife has the full benefit of this evidence, nor can he avail himself of a case in which he does not appear with clean hands.

The parties married in February, 1789. The two earliest acts of adultery are stated in the libel to have happened within the first year; the first at a house of ill fame; the other at the warehouse of the paramour. The only evidence of these are the confessions of the delinquent wife in the presence of her family and of the paramour. In what way the husband discovered or became possessed of this information there is no evidence: it is a desideratum in this cause throughout.

It has been said truly that on confession alone the Court will not build a sentence of separation,(a) but although by the rules of law a confession does not satisfy the mind of the Judge, it must satisfy the mind of the husband, particularly when direct and unequivocal, as in the present instance. And what is his behaviour upon it? His mother, in an interrogatory, says "he wished his wife to go from him—but on the intercession of friends he consented to live with her." This then is a direct condo-[78]-nation; and on these facts, even if supported by evidence, no sentence could be built.

But the facility manifested in this condonation will make the Court attentive to his conduct. A husband, if the matter is not divulged, may, from tenderness to his family, to himself, or to his wife, be induced not to complain to a Court of Justice—upon strong reasons to believe the repentance of his wife. But here were no strong inducements; the affair is passed over slightly. This part of the case is extremely barren of all information, except that he did consent to live with her again. This fact will lead me to watch his conduct, because to me he appears not to estimate the injury as he ought.

(a) See Williams v. Williams, 1 Hagg. Con. 304; Mortimer v. Mortimer, 2 ibid. 315. Crewe v. Crewe, infra.

The next act is with a second person; and it is pleaded that she renewed her acquaintance with him, whom, as well as the other paramour, she had known before marriage, that they several times committed adultery, and one day in November went together to a house of ill fame. Another act is laid at the husband's house, on 16th December, 1790, in his absence. The account of the maid servant Gibbs shews a strong habit of criminal intimacy between these persons. She was the carrier of notes and messages between them. She says he very frequently came to her house; and, excepting twice, in the husband's absence. The wife told Gibbs that he would take care of her if her husband and she should part, and that he had been her sweetheart before marriage. Gibbs also speaks to familiarities and other circumstances which leave no doubt of a criminal intercourse between those parties at the husband's house.

[79] But a fact deposed to by another witness is decisive; she plainly saw, from the street, an act of adultery between these parties, the window shutter being scarcely closed. The Court cannot abstain from remarking how slight the caution, and how little the reserve, observed upon this occasion, in order to keep her conduct from the knowledge of her husband. Usually, indeed, a husband is the last man acquainted with his own dishonor, as, in general, caution and secrecy are observed. But where a criminal correspondence is carried on in this open and shameless manner, when the fact is absolutely done "in triviis," it cannot be supposed to have been altogether unknown to him. The only evidence, however, is that he had acquired a knowledge of it by the end of January, 1791. His mother, indeed, knew it on the 12th of January; and it is most highly improbable to have travelled to the knowledge of the mother (whom he appears to have consulted on other occasions) without arriving also to the knowledge of the son. I cannot force my mind to the belief that he was the only person unacquainted with this matter: but it is the defect of this cause throughout that it does not appear when or how he first received information of the different facts.

However, the most material charges are with Smith. And how is this affair stated in the libel, and how does it come out in the evidence? In the libel it is stated "that Smith was received as an acquaintance in Timmings' house; but in the latter end of 1790, Timmings, becoming dissatisfied with his conduct, remonstrated with him and forbad him the [80] house, and his wife to receive him; notwithstanding which she frequently received his visits unknown to the husband: and in the evenings of the 10th and 12th January she did so and committed adultery with him."

Now the very contrary appears in evidence. He spoke to Gibbs about these visits six weeks before the 10th January, but there is no proof that he took any steps to prevent them.

Two facts of adultery are pleaded—one in the 12th, the other in the 13th article. I shall take the 13th first, which is, that in the afternoon of the 12th January, 1791, Timmings went to Greenwich, and his wife, having given Smith intelligence of his absence, invited him to supper. The first witness, Gillett, does prove an act of adultery on this evening as laid in the libel. I cannot help observing that this witness, by the manner he states his evidence, leads me to suspect that something has been intentionally kept from the Court: he says, by communication from Gibbs, he suspected all was not going on right, and he determined to watch their conduct; and for this purpose bored holes: he states no previous knowledge of his own; only suspicions; and he is not produced to speak to the 12th article. Now when I look into the depositions of the other witness, Montford, I see Gillett was on the spot, and had the same opportunity of ascertaining by positive proof the whole business on the night of the 10th of January.

Montford says that on the 10th, Gillett came to him, as he understood by his master's order, and desired him to go with him to watch the conduct of Mrs. Timmings and Smith; and that [81] they arrived together at the house between eight and nine o'clock. Gillett then, having been also sent to observe the criminal facts that passed on that occasion, why was he not produced to speak to them? I can see no good reason: and the Court cannot help feeling for the circumstance of having evidence denied it which the case properly afforded. Montford says that on the 10th, whether Mr. Timmings was apprised or not he does not know, but when he went he saw him in the warehouse. Can I possibly suppose him to have been a total stranger to the scene which was going on? but from the evidence of Gibbs I find he not only knew of it, but was active and, as I think, illegally active in it.

It must be remembered that the husband has pleaded in the libel that he had forbidden Smith his house; yet Gibbs says there was scarce an evening in which Smith did not come to the house. But what happened on the evening of the 10th of January? Smith, in the wife's absence, drinks tea with Timmings, and on her return sups with them. The husband then goes out and leaves them together for some time, during which they commit adultery: he returns, and they continue all together some time after. Is this proper conduct towards a man of whom he entertained strong suspicions, and whom he had forbidden his house?

True it is that a husband is not barred by a mere permission of opportunity for adultery; nor is it every degree of inattention on his part which will deprive him of relief; but it is one thing to permit and another to invite; he is perfectly at liberty to let the licentiousness of [82] the wife take its full scope: but that he is to contrive the meeting, that he is to invite the adulterer, then to decamp and give him the opportunity, I do think amounts to legal prostitution. The analogy, as to theft, in the passage cited from Sanchez, shews this doctrine: (a) and it was solidly established in a case determined in the Arches, on the last session,(b) and in all cases of this kind.

[83] But the matter does not stand there. The doctrine laid down might apply if the husband had broken in on their criminal pleasures and had said, I only availed myself of that opportunity to obtain full and complete evidence. But how did he comport himself the day after, on the spot, in the neighbourhood, and when apprized of her guilt? This does not rest on presumption; it is proved by the evidence of Montford—that he had full information of what passed between them. At this time, supposing it perfectly lawful to have used means to obtain the discovery, what use did he make of it? For if he is once in possession of a fact of adultery, and still continues his cohabitation, it proves connivance, collusion and facility. Did he apply to the law?

(a) "Viro suspicanti adulterium uxoris licitum est illam observare, cum testibus idoneis, ut eam possit de adulterio convincere. Quoniam id non est ejus peccato connivere, sed uti ejus malitiâ ad proprium commodum. Secundo, quia aliud est rogare, consulere, vel jubere malum, quod nunquam licet, et aliud permittere seu non auferre mali occasionem, quod aliquando licet ob aliquod majus bonum. Nimirum non peccare parentes vel heros qui filiis vel famulis non auferunt aliquam furandi occasionem cum eos ad furandum propensos norunt, ut sic in furto deprehensi resipiscant"—Sanchez de Matrimonio, lib. 10, Disp. 12, No. 52.

(b) Arches, Hilary Term, 4th Session, 1792.—The case referred to was a suit for separation by reason of the wife's adultery with a servant. In February, 1791, the man was discharged by the husband; for what reason did not appear. There was nothing to shew that the husband suspected any thing till the 10th of April, when a servant told his master of his suspicions: the husband set three witnesses to watch the man's lodgings in the neighbourhood. On the 18th, 22d, and 25th April two of these witnesses there saw what left in their minds no doubt of adultery. On the 25th it was agreed she should be exposed, and the room was immediately entered.

The Court—Sir W. Wynne—said that "the only remark that arose on the man's dismissal was, that the husband could not be charged with laying a trap for his wife; if he had wished to do that he would have continued him: that up to that time the facts proved no act of adultery, but a criminal inclination in the strongest degree: that in its apprehension the case came strictly within the authority of Eliot and Eliot (Arches, 1776. See 1 Hagg. Con. 302), where the parties went to a house of ill fame together. Here was a bed-room let to a man who had been her menial servant, and with whom she had before been shewn to have been too familiar; and the lady went backwards and forwards to it, and was locked up there with him, and permitted him to take gross liberties with her person, and other familiarities. That on the whole there was a complete and legal proof of criminality, and that the husband was entitled to a separation."

Note.—The above summary is taken from a long manuscript note, which does not notice the point referred to in the text as established by the facts of the case.

On the 12th another fact happened, to which a great deal of evidence applies, shewing, I think, that he was well apprized of the intended interview; and that he was posted there at nine o'clock. But, if the husband here stood clear, his conduct on the 11th would have defeated him of his remedy. He cohabited with his wife that night it is agreed; and he is not to avail himself of this subsequent discovery, having re-[84]-mitted the other. It has been said there is no condonation of this fact in proof, nor any thing to shew that he slept with her on the night of the 12th; and that if condonation is relied upon it should be put in plea, for that it is not incumbent upon the complaining party to prove there was no condonation (see Durant v. Durant, vol. i. p. 733, 751).

To this as a general doctrine I assent; but I think in this case, where it is alleged in the libel that she did not leave his house till the 13th, it is necessary the complainant should shew that they did not cohabit on the 12th by sleeping together: he has taken an onus upon him, which, in ordinary cases, does not lie on the complaining party.

There is another circumstance strong to the disadvantage of Timmings. Gibbs, the profligate instrument of the wife—the active go-between—in all her criminal transactions, still lives in his service, and, as appears by an interrogatory, in full as great a state of familiarity as is necessary between a servant and her master.

On the whole, the husband is criminally implicated in these facts. Corrupt as she has been, he is equally corrupt; he encouraged her guilt by criminal connivance and collusion. Such a man is not the object of the attention of the law. I dismiss her, not because the husband has not proved her guilt, but because he has proved himself utterly unworthy of legal relief.

[85] LOVERING v. LOVERING. Consistory, 16th July, 1792.—Where the wife made no defence to a suit for divorce by reason of her adultery, the Court dismissed the suit, on the ground that the husband, having connived at his wife's adultery with A., could not complain of an adultery, nearly cotemporary, with B.

This was a suit of adultery brought by the husband against the wife, and was heard ex-parte.

Judgment—Sir William Scott (Lord Stowell). No appearance, no plea, no interrogatory has been given on the part of the wife. Very few witnesses have been examined. The Court is left with as bare information as possible. However, there is absolute proof of adultery, and a course of shameless profligacy. The wife had a strong attachment to the apprentice, which she took no pains to conceal; it was known and talked of in the family: her bell used to ring for him ten times a day: it was a common joke in the workshop where the brother of the plaintiff was present: he did not imagine her guilty, though other witnesses speak of their behaviour as leading to a different conclusion. It is by no means probable that this partiality should remain an entire secret from the husband: there was a forwardness, as if this woman wished to obtrude it on notice; but the case does not rest on probabilities; for in the libel the husband states that in May, 1790, he had himself observed great and indecent familiarities between his wife and this apprentice.

It is said that the husband might forgive; and yet has a right to avail himself of further misconduct. The husband may be induced to remit on many grounds, from motives of com-[86]-passion—remains of tenderness—remembrance of past endearments—regard for common offspring: he may, on such grounds, on promise of amendment and reasonable prospect of it—forgive. But there was no such promise here; he says "he did not forgive; but withdrew himself from her bed."

Condonation and connivance are very different: and I must look a little at his conduct to see whether it can be set down to legal connivance. There is one circumstance here which distinguishes this husband's conduct from proper condonation, and marks an improper consent. If he were induced to forgive his wife, yet when he sees an indecent familiarity with his own apprentice, would he suffer the man to remain one moment in his house? This is impossible to reconcile with a due care of his own honor. If he had pardoned his wife after 1790, and discharged his servant, there would have been nothing in the condonation. The act of his permitting him to continue in his house, after he knew of great and indecent familiarities, and till she is guilty with another, amounts almost to consent; and is a degree of delinquency which renders him unworthy of a remedy as far as that man is concerned. The husband pleads that he left the bed of his wife: his own witnesses prove the contrary: they prove that he slept with his wife a few days before the separation, after knowing of all these indecencies. I have a right to presume that the husband was not ignorant or averse to the sort of intercourse that was going on. There is however proved criminality with another man, nearly cotemporary.

[87] The case then comes almost to this. Can a man, consenting to adultery with A., but not consenting to adultery with B., take advantage of that adultery, and say to the Ecclesiastical Court, "Non omnibus dormio." This is language not to be endured. The Ecclesiastical Court requires two things—that a man shall come with pure hands himself, and shall have exacted a due purity on the part of his wife: and if he has relaxed with one man he has no right to complain of another. I think, in this case, the husband is not entitled to relief, having consented to the turpitude of his wife. I dismiss the suit.

MOORSOM v. MOORSOM. Consistory, Trinity Term, 4th Session, 1792.—The notoriously debauched character of the paramour, his exclusion from all respectable female society, the introduction of him by the husband to his wife, the encouragement of their intimacy, the allowing her to accept a supply of money from him, expostulations from her family at such intimacy, the refusal of the husband to attend to them, and improper familiarities and liberties in his presence, and without his remonstrance, are material facts in a plea of connivance.—In a suit for separation by reason of the wife's adultery, connivance on the part of the husband may be pleaded by the wife, consistently with a denial of her guilt.—Indifference, ill behaviour, or cruelty is not pleadable in answer to a charge of adultery, nor relevant to a plea of connivance.—As a plea of connivance must generally be circumstantial and consist of many facts, trifling when taken separately, but altogether convincing, the Court must allow a latitude in such a defence.—It is not necessary to shew connivance at actual adultery. The Court, from connivance at improper familiarity, will infer corrupt intent as to the result.—Much delay having occurred in the wife's defence, a plea of minute facts to establish connivance having been admitted, and the cause now standing "to propound all facts," an allegation of the wife, not responsive, but pleading more minutely, but to the same effect as in the former plea, rejected in toto; the facts not being noviter perventa.—The whole substantive case of a party should be at once brought before the Court; but where it is clearly shewn that the facts could not have been sooner pleaded, additional articles may be given in.—To establish connivance as a bar, it is not sufficient that the man did not act as a wise or prudent or attentive man, nor that he in fact contributed to his wife's guilt: he must be shewn, intentionally, to contribute thereto: there must be intentional permission or corrupt facility.—Passive connivance is as much a bar as active conspiracy, but there must be an intention that guilt should ensue.

[Referred to, Symons v. Symons, [1897] P. 174.]

A libel, pleading adultery in the wife, having been admitted to proof, a defensive allegation was given in, which, after reciting that part of the libel which alleged that the wife left her husband's house without his knowledge, and went off with C., pleaded, 1st, coolness and cruelty on the husband's part; that she late in the evening and when it was dark quitted the house with her husband's knowledge, and with the intent to go to her father's; that though the husband saw her going, he did not prevent nor accompany her, nor send a servant with her; and that since she quitted she has been living with her father.

[88] 2d. That Moorsom had become less attentive since his marriage; and did not attend his wife to parties; but allowed C. to accompany her.

3d. That C. was gay, lewd, and debauched, and his general character so notorious that no married man in his neighbourhood would permit him to visit or associate with the females of his family; that his character was well known to M. long before and since his marriage; that M. introduced him to his wife, to whom he was a perfect stranger; that at his house he would make excuse for absenting himself and leaving them alone together for a long period; that finding them together on his return, he would express no displeasure; that he encouraged him to continue his visits, and permitted his wife to accompany him to assemblies, and to dance with him there, and to go out in his carriage with him, and that she received from him presents of fruit and game directed to her.

4th. That M. paid no attention to the remonstrances of his friends, who forewarned him of the probable consequences of this intimacy; that he continued to connive at it; that his wife's parents repeatedly told him "they feared their daughter's reputation would suffer in the eyes of the world from his countenancing the visits of C., who was known to be a man of gallantry and intrigue, and of very loose and abandoned character, and that his neighbours were very much astonished thereat, and made many remarks upon his suffering the same;" that he generally replied, very much out of temper, "that he would not affront his best customer by desiring him to make his visits less [89] frequent, or putting any restraint upon the conduct of his wife towards him." That notwithstanding such remonstrances he still continued to countenance and permit C. to visit and keep company with his wife, though M. seldom or never returned the visits or appeared on habits of intimacy with him.

5th. That C. would sit close with his arms round the waist of Mrs. M. while at the harpsicord, and put himself into amorous attitudes with, and kiss and toy with, her, and use other modes of dalliance, and take very great and unbecoming liberties with her; that M., though present, or at other times surprizing them in such situations, did not remonstrate with C. or rebuke his wife.

6th. That from the insufficiency of her allowance for her private expences she was necessarily and continually incurring bills, and under the necessity of applying to various persons for money to discharge them, and from time to time did accept of, and was liberally supplied with, money and other presents from C., which was well known to and permitted by her husband.(a)

Dr. Nicholl in objection. The Court, in a suit of this nature, looks with jealousy on the pleas of the wife, because it is her interest to keep the cause open: for alimony is received by her while the cause lasts, and she is in no danger of expence. Of the various sorts of defence, as recrimination, malicious desertion, condonation, and the like, connivance is the least favourable, because it is a tacit acknowledgment of guilt, and therefore [90] cannot be set up together with an exculpatory plea. The libel pleads a verdict with damages 3500l.: this is no proof of the wife's guilt, but a defence of connivance is most commonly used in an action against the adulterer. If the fact be so, it is not to be supposed but it would have been set up as a defence to the action: I do not argue that this is a proof that there has not been connivance, or that because it was not set up by the adulterer the wife is barred from such a plea, but the Court will be induced to observe it narrowly, and not to admit any thing not so strictly laid as to bar a sentence. [The objections taken to the 1st, 2nd, and 6th articles were to the same effect as appear in the Court's sentence.] C.'s character was its own antidote, and every woman of virtue, as Moorsom at the time supposed his wife, would have been put on her guard by it. His answer to her mother's remonstrances amounted to no more than an expression of confidence in his wife, or might be made to prevent a plan for his discovery being interrupted by premature interference. Of the facts pleaded in the fifth article there is no specification of time; no person is alleged to be present—how are they to be proved? No remonstrance from her to her husband, or to her own friends, respecting his inattention is pleaded. The whole of the facts are too slight to operate as a defence. If a husband is suspicious of his wife, the conduct which he follows, in order to detect her guilt, wears necessarily the appearance of connivance.

Dr. Battine and Dr. Laurence contrà.

[91] Per Curiam. This is a defensive allegation brought in by the wife in a prosecution for her adultery. This defence comes in a late period. The circumstances, however, explain the reason; but if I admit it, I shall expect diligence in the proof. A negative issue was at first given to the libel, pleading an elopement from the residence of the husband, to London and different places, at each of which it laid facts of adultery.

This allegation in part pleads connivance; and it has been said that such a plea is not consistent with a denial of facts; but I think it possible that a denial may be given, and yet connivance be pleaded at the same time. Undoubtedly, if the wife admit in one part of the defence a fact, or even a proximate act of adultery, it is not open to her to say in another part that she is not guilty; but it is competent to her to say there may have been suspicious appearances, though I deny criminality, and those appearances into which I have been betrayed have occurred by the contrivance of my husband, or have been produced by an insidious project on his part; but I have not completed his intention: as, in a case of recrimination, the party may deny her own guilt, but at the same time say that even if she had been guilty, yet the conduct of her husband was a bar to his prayer.

(a) The parts of the plea printed in italics were not admitted.

It is said that a verdict having been given with such large damages, the Court will regard the plea of connivance with jealousy, as this defence was not set up at common law, or at least not established. The eternal answer is, a verdict is "res [92] inter alios acta." (a) Whatever defence the adulterer set up, or declined, is nothing to the wife. It will not conclude her. On what facts the jury determined, whether the circumstances of connivance were brought forward, is out of the view of this Court. The wife's defence must be independent of that, though the fact may a little awaken the jealousy of the Court: but it will do no more. She avers the facts of the allegation to be true, and so at present they must be taken to be.

This allegation is of two parts—the one pleading connivance; the other, miscellaneous matter. This latter part is open to the objections made by counsel. The first article negatives none of the material facts in the libel. That she quitted him from his coolness is no justification. Indifference, ill behaviour, or cruelty is not pleadable in a suit for adultery. It will not justify her criminal misconduct. The only fact negatived is that she quitted him without his knowledge: and it is now pleaded that she quitted him with the intention of going to her father's, and that he did not oppose it nor accompany her. This will not affect his claim for relief. If he did not attend her, it may be incivility or not, according to his circumstances. It pleads she has since lived with her father; but it does not say that she went there directly, nor has continued there ever since; nor does it appear how soon her intention was diverted; on this there is an entire silence. The fact negatived is immaterial, and [93] I shall not put the husband to the expence of a contradiction by plea.

The second article is also immaterial; it pleads that he was a more attentive and polite lover than husband; that he did not attend her to places of amusement. That a tradesman should so attend his wife is not perhaps much to be expected. The fact of his allowing her to go with C. appears sufficiently in another article. I therefore reject the two first articles.

The sixth article is also liable to objections. The parsimony of the husband depends on his discretion and circumstances, and the Court cannot take on itself to judge in such matters. That she accepted money and presents from C. is of importance, but it may be added to the third article. It would be a striking circumstance if he knew she was in the habit of receiving money from this man. As to his allowance to her for pocket-money, I cannot inquire into it; and but little advantage could be drawn from it if I knew it. It is sufficient that with his consent she was supplied with money by C. I therefore direct this fact to be added to the third, and reject the remainder of the sixth article.

A plea of connivance must for the most part, in its own nature, be circumstantial, and consist of many facts, trifling perhaps when taken separately, but altogether making a case calculated to affect the judgment of the Court. That the husband entertains such a design must be a matter of inference, for it can hardly be supposed that a man who frames a project of the kind against the honor of his wife will avow it, or betray his purpose by any single [94] broad unequivocal act. The Court then must admit a latitude in such a defence.

The third article pleads very material facts. If the husband is so very imprudent as to recommend to the society of his wife a man excluded by others, it goes further than carelessness, and lays a foundation for the belief of the design imputed. If the husband had such a design he would not introduce a virtuous man as his accomplice, but just such an one as C. It has been said that C.'s character was the antidote; in the same way it might be said that if he carried her to a brothel and told her the character of the house, it was a sufficient caution. He should remember the dangers of seduction and the infirmities of human nature; and it is his duty to give to his wife the benefit of his prudence and protection: his practice of leaving her alone with a man of such a character is not to be explained upon the ground of a virtuous and proper confidence; nor his permitting him to conduct her to, or dance with her at, assemblies, without expressing displeasure; this and the other behaviour is not justifiable on the part of the husband; it may lead to that interpretation on which the wife relies. The conclusion of this article is slight—"that she received from him presents of fruit and game." This stands on a different ground from the supply of money. Presents of fruit and game are not of the same import; they pass as common acts of civility.

(a) Vide infra, 107, and Hoar v. Hoar, infra. Also, upon this subject, see Elwes v. Elwes, 1 Hagg. Con. 289, in notis. Loveden v. Loveden, 2 ibid. 51.

The fourth is extremely stringent. Her family taking alarm at the intimacy, and his refusal to attend to their remonstrances on the impropriety of her conduct, go a great way to impress a sus-[95]-picion of his criminal design; and to shew connivance. It is argued that his refusal may be no more than an expression of confidence in the virtue of his wife, or that he might wish for an opportunity of discovery. If he had shewn alarm and said, "I will avail myself of your communications and watch her conduct," this might be a sufficient answer; but if, on the contrary, he said—what is here laid—"that he would not affront his best customer by laying a restriction on his wife's conduct," this is most important.

The fifth, it is said, will be difficult of proof: but there is undoubtedly a possibility of proof: and if it can be shewn that improper familiarities from a very debauched man passed in his actual sight without his interference, it would give reason to believe that the husband was not averse to greater familiarity: but I shall defer delivering judgment on their effect till I see how they turn out in proof.

It is not necessary to prove connivance to actual adultery, any more than it is necessary on the other side to prove an actual and specific fact of adultery. If a system of connivance at the improper familiarity, almost amounting to proximate acts, be established, I shall infer a corrupt intention as to the result, and shall not call for more direct proof.

Hilary Term, 1st Session, 1793.—A responsive allegation on the part of the husband, admitted without opposition, in substance pleaded: 1st. That C. was visited by all respectable people; was married and had four children; that he was looked upon as a man of honor; was a man of pleasing manners [96] and conversation; had parties at his house which were attended by ladies of good character, and that other ladies, besides Mrs. M., accompanied him in his carriage; that M. was very domestic, seldom from his wife, except on business; was a tender and indulgent husband, that her brother was a great friend of C.; and another brother, a great friend of C.'s son; that C. was forty and a good customer to M.; that M. sometimes went to the assemblies with his wife, and at all other times sat up till her return; that she always went in a chair and had a servant to attend her; that C. presided at the assemblies, walked out and danced with other ladies.

2d. That C. and Moorsom were on terms of great intimacy and friendship, and Moorsom constantly returned his visits.

Easter Term, 1st Session.—On the first session of Easter Term, 1793, a further defensive allegation on the part of the wife was given, consisting of two articles; and pleading, more minutely and circumstantially, acts of undue familiarity and improper assiduity on the part of C., in the presence, or to the knowledge, of Moorsom: and also that the conduct of the three parties was matter of general notoriety, observation, and conversation.

The admission of this allegation was opposed.

Per Curiam. In this case the libel was admitted on the 3d Session of Trinity Term, 1791. No answer was [97] given till the second session of Michaelmas Term: on the first session of Easter Term, 1792, publication was prayed, and to propound all facts: and on the second session an allegation was asserted for the wife; it was not debated till the third session of Trinity Term, and was admitted on the fourth. That allegation pleaded many circumstances composing the defence of the wife—to the effect that her conduct was occasioned by the corrupt encouragement of her husband. She did not thereby admit the fact of adultery, for she gave a negative issue; she only asserted that, if the fact had been true, the husband, under such circumstances, was not entitled to a divorce. That allegation was very minute and particular, and on that ground parts of it were rejected. The rejoining allegation by the husband was not debated. A commission for the examination of witnesses has been returned. The cause stands "to propound all facts," and now another allegation of the wife is brought in, not responsive to the husband's allegation, but pleading circumstances, some almost the same as those in her former plea, others of the same nature. It is the duty of the Court to compel parties to bring the whole of their substantive case before the Court at once, where it is possible, which is not always the case; for the knowledge of facts, or the proof by which the facts are to be supported, may not always be in the power of the party, and then additional articles may be given in; but it must clearly appear to the Court that they could not have been given in before: a contrary practice would be extremely oppres-[98]-sive, especially where one party pays all the expences on both sides.

It is said that the facts pleaded generally in the former plea are more specifically and circumstantially stated here. This is of itself an objection. If the party is to plead facts, then to split and make them minute, where will the matter end? When a party states facts, he ought to be required to state the circumstances, and is not to be allowed to state them separately. The wife had a year to consider of and prepare her defence. The facts, which almost every one happened to herself and in her own presence, must have been known to her; and she had abundant opportunities for making all necessary inquiries as to—and, from the nature of the facts pleaded, she must have known—the means of proving them. If, being in possession of the facts, she did not prepare her defence, the husband is not to bear the inconvenience.

They pleaded in the first allegation that C. often went out in the chaise with Mrs. Moorsom: here they plead that when Moorsom was with them in the chaise familiarities passed; and that Moorsom used to get out, leaving them in the chaise alone together. Now of this fact the wife must have been in possession: and as to the excuse, that inquiries were not made with success for the evidence necessary to establish it, this, considering the great stake at issue, was great negligence, from the effect of which the Court cannot relieve her. They might have stated this in the former articles. The same observation applies to the other familiarities, those at the assembly for instance: they had before pleaded that C. accompanied her to, and [99] danced with her at, assemblies; and now they plead Moorsom's conduct after: that after C. had danced with her they would all three retire into a private room, where Moorsom left them together. This was not secret; it might have been proved by many persons: the party must have known the fact, and that she could prove it.

Some of the circumstances are such as would come out under the articles of the former allegation, and in that allegation more general words might have been added. The objection to the former was that it was too particular. The second article pleads that Moorsom's conduct was matter of notoriety in the town: she must have known of the existence of this, and of the means of proof at the time of giving in the former allegation; for that a matter of such universal publicity should be a secret to the party before is incredible. Then as to the remonstrance from Moorsom's mother to C.'s mother on this intimacy, it is not pleaded that the husband was privy to it; if it could affect him, they might have pleaded it before, when they alleged that the familiarities were observed by the friends, and that remonstrances were made; but the fact is insignificant: considering that the effect of this allegation is to increase the stringency of her own facts, it would be very improper to admit it at this late period, for the party should bring forward the whole of her substantive defence at first, or shew that she could not. The contrary is manifestly the case here. The party might before have pleaded the whole in general words. If facts are now excluded, it arises by her own negligence. On the important considerations of the injury that [100] the admission of this allegation, by increasing delay and expences, will inflict on the husband's character and fortune, I reject it in toto.

1st July, 1793.—The case now came on for the final hearing.

Dr. Nicholl and Dr. Swabey for the husband. The libel pleads the marriage on 22d June, 1785, Moorsom being then twenty-six years of age, and Mrs. Moorsom seventeen. On the 10th January, 1791, she left her husband's house without his knowledge and eloped with C.; went to North Allerton; arrived there at four in the morning; she desired the chambermaid to make only one bed, which was prepared in a single-bedded room; she went to bed; he went up; door was locked; parties slept together. Next day went to Grantham; slept together: on 15th January arrived in London, stayed a week there, passing for and cohabiting as man and wife. Verdict, damages 3500l. Ten witnesses; marriage confessed; exhibit proved.

1st witness—a friend of C. who borrowed from him clothes and a trunk—saw Mrs. M. in chaise; came to prevail on C. to leave her and return to his wife; placed Mrs. M. under care of a brother-in-law. 2nd. Driver of chaise knew both parties; drove them to North Allerton. 3rd. The chambermaid at North Allerton proves arrival, sleeping together; did not know them; told by post-boy not husband and wife. 4th. The chambermaid at Grantham proves their sleeping together; positive as to identity; gives [101] no reason, but explained by the attorney of Moorsom, who shewed C. and Mrs. M. to the last witness, who recognized them. Three others prove their sleeping together in London, and her going by name of C.: these were examined on the trial at common law: no doubt of identity.

On responsive allegation fifteen witnesses were examined, and on the rejoining allegation five. 1st. Mrs. M.'s mother—That C. was addicted to gallantry; believes M. must have known it; has twice seen her daughter in C.'s phaeton; daughter received a toothpick-case and knife; nothing clandestine; no evidence that he supplied her with money. Witness often expressed her surprise that C. should be so much at the house; once said "feared daughter's character would be injured." M. said, "Would you have me affront my best customer." It appears her objection to M.'s acquaintance with C. was because the latter was expensive and of superior fortune. Mrs. M.'s custom was to spend Saturday evening with her father and mother; once was late; her excuse, that she was detained by a visit from C., and under these circumstances the objection was made. 2nd. Mrs. M.'s father proves the long acquaintance of M. with C. 3rd. A maid-servant to M.—C. often came; stayed there; M. would go out; C. drove mistress out in phaeton; made her presents of fruit, &c.; sat close to her; squeezed and kissed her hand; scraped her nails; and kissed her hand in presence of M. 3rd. A man servant to C.—Danced with her; arm round her waist at harpsichord; M. sometimes reading; one evening, at parting, C. kissed her in [102] presence of deponent and M.; gave her meat off his own plate with his fork when dining by waterside. 4th. Another maid-servant to M.—M. left them together; and went into counting-house. 5th. A third maid-servant to M.—M. left them together; went out in phaeton together; M.'s child sometimes with them. 6th. This witness, of the age of sixty-seven, would not have trusted his wife for an hour with C.; M. might not have known his general character. 7th and 8th. Two other witnesses—Went together in phaeton; walked arm in arm. 9th. A clergyman—From notoriety of C.'s character thinks it impossible but M. must have known it. 10th. Another witness—Was sent with a present of peas. 11th. M.'s father—Met C. coming out two days before elopement; said "too often there; was an expensive man." 12th. M.'s nursery-maid—C. came two or three times a day on business; asked first for M.; when there, M. would retire into counting-house only on business; walked out together; went together to assemblies; believes M. had no bad opinion of C., or would not have permitted this.

The ground-work of the charge on the husband is the notoriously bad character of C., that no one with a wife or daughter would admit him into their house: but, on the rejoining plea, five witnesses of respectable character prove the facts as pleaded, that C. was held a man of honor, that there was no report of C. being forbid any house, and that M. was a tender and indulgent husband; one witness says he had no reason to suppose that M. thought C. a man of debauched character; and all depose that they think M. was incapa-[103]-ble of conniving at improper conduct in his wife. The only fact referred to appears on interrogatory, that C. had, eighteen years before, had connexion with some woman. One gentleman deposes that he would not have hesitated to trust his wife with C.; does not believe M. had the least suspicion of the elopement; that when M. was first told he was so much affected that witness did not expect he would have lived; he scarcely ate or drank for two days.

This is the substance of evidence. Adultery is fully proved. The defence, containing serious accusations on the husband, is unfounded. Character of C. not such as to excite fear of any husband; his bad repute unknown to M.; an old and intimate acquaintance of M. Nothing happened which should induce him to interfere in his wife's acquaintance with a man whom he considered as a most intimate friend. What is connivance? Perhaps, from the expression in Sanchez, "vir qui uxorem prostituit," (a) one might be led to think it necessary that the husband should be active: but we admit that if he is passive it is sufficient; he must however be conusant and guilty. The Court will consider likewise the habits and manners of life of the parties and of the place where they live: there is less reserve in the country and among people in a middling situation than in town, and in the superior ranks. It must be shewn that he knew and wilfully lay by and permitted the crime. The intention of the husband may be proved by facts: but they must be unequivocal facts; there must be shewn such [104] familiarities and approximations as could leave no doubt, or at least must raise a suspicion in the husband.

(a) Sanchez de Matrimonio, lib. 10, Disp. 5, No. 3, 4.

The question is whether such facts were known to M., as, considering the relative situation, &c. of the parties, might and did excite alarm in the husband. The charge here depends on C.'s being a man of so notorious character as to be excluded from decent houses; all that is suggested on the interrogatories is a connexion with some young woman, eighteen years before, prior to his marriage; no similar charge since. The familiarities were of a nature that would not alarm in the country, and in the situation of these parties. There was nothing clandestine; all was done openly before the servants: they were not surprized by them. There is nothing in the character of the husband leading to this suspicion: he was a domestic, tender, and indulgent husband. What inducement could there be to such a man? he was almost distracted at hearing of the elopement.

Dr. Battine and Dr. Laurence contrà. One clergyman had a bad opinion of C.; had heard was excluded from one house in the neighbourhood: deponent would not have admitted him if he had a wife; M. must have known his character from notoriety. Mrs. M.'s father and mother—that C. always considered as addicted to gallantry; M. must have known it as always residing in the same place. The witness of the age of sixty-seven—that C. had a general bad character as to women. Several witnesses—that [105] no doubt M. must have known C.'s character. Another witness—that few ladies kept company with him without losing their character. Two servants—C. visited often in same day; M. retired and played on a flute; that M. finding C. staid several hours, shewed no displeasure. One witness says they walked together hand in hand; M. present. Presents are proved, and remonstrances are pleaded. Many parts of rejoining allegation not proved. M. was told of the elopement at an early hour, yet did not pursue. On the whole, M., when he introduced C. to his wife, knew his general character, admitted his frequent visits; familiarities and indecencies passed in his presence; he allowed her to receive presents from him; her conduct excited attention and remonstrances; he refused to interfere. Husband has no right to sentence.

The Court took time to deliberate.

9th November.—Judgment—Sir William Scott (Lord Stowell). This suit is brought by Richard Moorsom against his wife for a separation by reason of her adultery. The marriage is confessed and proved. The adultery is proved and almost confessed. A negative issue has been given, but the allegation, on behalf of the wife, is not an assertion of innocence: it rests her defence on that which indirectly admits the truth of the husband's plea, the defensive allegation charging connivance on the part of the husband.

It is not necessary to state the evidence of the adultery further than that C., the party charged to have eloped in 1791 with Mrs. Moorsom, is proved to have so done. The chaise-[106]-driver, who knows both C. and Mrs. Moorsom, says the same. The chambermaid at the inn proves that the persons brought by him slept together in the same room: she did not know them, but is told by the post-boy that they were not husband and wife. The chambermaid at another inn proves that they slept together: she is positive as to their identity: and it appears, from the evidence of the attorney, that this witness has since seen both C. and this lady, and recognized them. Three other witnesses also speak to these parties sleeping together and going by the name of C. There is also a verdict giving 3500l. damages. On this evidence there is no doubt of the guilt nor of the identity.

The defence which, in law and reason, is as available to the party as the fullest contradiction of fact is—that the husband himself was the author and accomplice of the crime; that he has practised a train of conduct which led to her guilt, and which he foresaw and intended should lead to it; that he is therefore not the object of relief which the law gives to the innocent only. The conduct then upon which the wife relies for her defence is of a passive and permissive kind, to be proved therefore by circumstances. Active conspiracy appears in overt acts, but unless there are declarations to establish it, connivance must in general depend on circumstances, and is to be gathered from a train of conduct which the Court is to interpret as well as it can.

The first general and simple rule is, if a man sees what a reasonable man could not see without alarm; if he sees what a reasonable man could not permit, he must be supposed to see [107] and mean the consequences; but this is not to be too rigorously applied without making allowance for defective capacity: dulness of perception, or the like, which exclude intention, is not connivance; there must be intention. The presumption of law is against connivance; and if the facts can be accounted for without supposition of intention, the Court will incline to that construction. Undoubtedly there have been some persons who have conspired against the virtue of their wives to gain a separation, and (experience has proved) have even connived without such an object: but either of them is contrary to the usual conduct and disposition of mankind; and the Court is to presume according to general rules of conduct. However, though to bar the husband there must be intention on his part, I have no difficulty in saying that mere passive connivance is as much a bar as active conspiracy; he would be particeps criminis.

The expression of the books, of a man prostituting his wife, is too strong, but the rule is "volenti non fit injuria;" that is the true principle: active or passive, the husband is not the object of legal relief.

The verdict giving such large damages, it is forcibly contended, rebuts the argument of connivance; for it shews either that no such defence was attempted, or that it was not proved. It has been often observed that a verdict to the disadvantage of the husband is strong, because he is a party to both proceedings, and therefore such a verdict will operate in other courts: but a verdict against the adulterer is slight evidence against the wife, who is no party to the action, and who has no control in the conduct of it. At [108] the time of the trial she is often at variance with the adulterer: he may have good reasons not to set up a defence which she may sustain. The defence of connivance is hazardous where the action is for damages, for it is to be proved by circumstances, and if it should fail, it will inflame the damages. Here part of the wife's defence is that C. is a man of debauched life; but he could not set up the turpitude of his own character. Possibly, or probably, he was not in possession of a material part of the evidence, which has been much relied on—a conversation between the mother of Mrs. Moorsom and the husband. It was natural that she would step forward to the aid of her daughter's character, which she would not do to protect C. from high damages. On all these considerations, I am satisfied that it was impossible this defence could be submitted to the King's Bench; it was impossible that such damages could have been given on the evidence now before this Court. I shall not suffer my mind to be influenced by the damages.

The marriage of these parties was in 1785. As far as appears, there was no disparity of condition or age, no seeds of dissatisfaction; they had one child, and lived, as far as appears, on terms of general amity. The contrary is not pleaded. An interrogatory has been put whether he was an affectionate husband; but the witnesses are such as do not know much of the parties. This interrogatory is not put to the witnesses upon the second allegation, who might know. Mercer says that, as far as he saw, Moorsom was an affectionate husband. He pleads that he was affectionate, and the [109] witnesses support it as far as they speak. I may therefore set off with this—that there was nothing in the general state of Moorsom's affections towards his wife that would lay a ground of suspicion that his conduct was such as to tempt her to part with her honor, or that he would consent to her pollution with a view of getting rid of her.

The defensive allegation pleads that C. is notoriously a man of very debauched life, and of such a character that no man of credit would suffer him to visit the females of his family; that his character, both before and after his marriage, was known to Moorsom; and that he first introduced him to his wife. As to the private morals of C., I have no curiosity nor right to inquire; but I have a right to inquire into his character, because it involves the intentions of others; and I am compelled to say that before this he did labour under the ill opinion of many of his neighbours as a man of unrestrained life. I do not advert to the blind account of a fact which happened before his marriage, and so long ago that, even if it were better proved, the man might be considered as emendatus moribus; but I advert to the depositions given by many witnesses as to his conduct and reputation at a late period. It is by no means true that the witnesses do not speak to conduct after marriage. One in particular says, C. was reported to have been connected with a variety of women since his marriage: others confirm this account, and the contrary is not pleaded: the responsive allegation only pleading that he was a man of pleasant manners, but these are frequently associated with very free morals. I may there-[110]-fore consider it as a fact proved that C. was regarded in his own neighbourhood as a man of free conduct; but that he was so notoriously profligate as to be shunned by all decent people, and to be the terror of fathers and husbands, is not only not proved, but is contradicted. Some speak to reports which others never heard: some say that they would not admit him into their houses; others, as respectable, speak to the contrary; and that some persons in the neighbourhood cultivated his acquaintance, and lived on the same social terms of intimacy with him as Moorsom did. He was certainly, therefore, not a person of that marked character that a husband could not introduce him to his wife without putting her virtue to the proof. More cautious persons might exclude him, but the general reception of him in many families acquits any one individual of a criminal design in admitting him to their domestic circle. No doubt his character was known to Moorsom. In a capital a man may hide such a character, but in a provincial town that is next to impossible. Here both were brought up in the same town and street. C. was a magistrate, a married man; Moorsom must have known the general opinion that C. was a man of free conduct; but that his conduct was so flagitious as for him not to be received, he did not see, for it was not the fact; he saw he was well received. Then I cannot impute an ill design to him in admitting him into his house. C.'s first introduction to Moorsom's house happened thus: Moorsom had dined in company with C., and brought him to tea. This shews no evil design in the original introduction. Is there any thing in the history [111] which follows inferring that such a design was taken up afterwards? I must always carry with me that Moorsom started without suspicion, for he was without ill design: if he had originally entertained a suspicion, there must have been an ill design: and whether his suspicion was afterwards excited is a material inquiry. A violent intimacy was struck up, which lasted two years and more—great attentions and assiduity, marked by particular circumstances of gallantry, as appears, passing from C. to Mrs. Moorsom. C. was in the habit of buying his timber of Moorsom. I cannot help thinking that Moorsom had reason enough to consider that the intimacy and constant visits were not all on account of the timber, nor all on account of himself. They were very different men in their characters and tempers. Moorsom was reserved and attentive to business; C. was gay and a lively companion; he was not likely to be attracted by Moorsom's society; and, judging from the frequency and length of his visits, he must have spent such time with Mrs. Moorsom, and paid such such attentions to her that I cannot admire the quickness of Moorsom's apprehension.

It was said that Moorsom had confidence in his friend. I do not mean to say that a man is to disturb the common intercourse of social life by jealousy; but manly confidence is consistent with caution, and does not exclude the use of reasonable discretion: the wife was free enough in her manners generally, the man was gay: the appearance of the thing was ungraceful, and the intercourse was likely to produce one great harm —the discredit of his wife's reputation. It has been said that it was strange [112] he should be alarmed when no one else was alarmed: but the contrary is proved: her mother was alarmed, other persons were alarmed. A lady, one of his own witnesses, heard it spoken of in different companies with surprize. It is proved out of C.'s own mouth: for he told his friend he supposed he had heard the reports about him and Mrs. Moorson. It was said that the husband was the last to hear; and so he is in ordinary cases; because in ordinary cases he is the last who sees; for caution is observed before him; but here all passed before him; he had the same data and materials for judgment as others. Then he did not see what others saw, or, if he did, he approved and tolerated; and was content that the effects should follow. That he did see appears not only from a variety of facts in his presence; and in his responsive allegation there is a contradiction to two of the articles, but none to the third, stating acts of amorous dalliance passing in his presence.

I decline entering into a particular discussion of the acts of freedom, chiefly because the effect produced on my judgment is not produced by them as detached facts, but as being in connection. When detached, some are improprieties or indelicacies; others not much so; others not at all. Put the question on each distinct fact, and it may not amount to much; but that is not the way of considering the case. I take the whole together; I consider them as a train of assiduities and marked attention—as conduct distinguishing the gallantries of one man to one woman—as making a system of behaviour from him to this one woman which differs from his [113] conduct to others. Other facts are to be connected with these which, if put in a detached way, do not consist with perfect propriety, as a habit of squeezing her hands, kissing them, and holding them in his before her husband—not walking out arm in arm only, but her hand in his, and sitting with his arm round her waist. It is not too much to say that a husband who sees this is sufficiently indulgent of the person of his wife to another. It was said that manners are different in the country; there persons are not so particular: but these parties are not in the lower rank of life, they are not villagers who can set up the simplicity of rustic manners. The manners of the town in which these parties resided seem to correspond with those of any other town. The opinion of the place appears from the evidence of a respectable gentleman, who had considerable confidence in C.; but who, on an interrogatory put to him whether if he had seen certain specified liberties he would have suffered them, answers, if he had seen such, and such are proved to have been taken with Mrs. Moorsom before her husband, he would not have permitted them. I presume that the same would have been the answer of every other person of character in the place.

Another class of facts is Moorsom's frequent retirement, leaving his wife in the sole company of this man, and giving them an opportunity of private conversation. It has been said, is there any harm in this? but it is to be taken in connection with the other facts. The fact which alarms me most is the conversation between Moorsom and his mother-in-law; for though if [114] it were once established that there was blind, unsuspecting confidence in Moorsom, and not corrupt facility, the law would not refuse him relief; yet it is strange confidence to hold out against admonitions coming from so grave a quarter; moreover, he returned an answer, very improper, and as near as can be, shewing an extreme indifference to the consequences. It is pleaded that the mother remonstrated frequently; and I think it is so proved: but the counsel say it was merely a remark of surprise from the mother at C.'s associating on such familiar terms with persons of inferior fortune and station, not a remonstrance with her daughter on the too great intimacy she kept up with him; but it appears that the remark was made in consequence of his paying much attention to her daughter. The terms used are not mentioned; they must, however, have borne relation to the too great attention. The mother once used this expression, "If no other harm happened, her daughter's reputation would suffer:" and Moorsom's answer was, "His best customer must not be affronted."

It is said, why were these remonstrances not followed up? How could they? I must confess Moorsom's answer gave no great encouragement to a repetition of them. Every thing substantial was said. No special pleader could have drawn up a fitter remonstrance, which, coming from the mother of his wife, could not fail to awaken the sensibility of any husband. It does lay open his conduct to this interpretation, that he put the timber in one scale and his wife in another, and was willing that the timber should preponderate. But the most fa-[115]-vorable interpretation is, "I have such confidence in my wife and in my friend that I fear no real mischief, and for the mere opinion of the world I will not lose my best customer." In this interpretation of the reply I do not commend either the discretion or delicacy of it; it at best shews that he was not attentive to the character of his wife, but it does not go the length of shewing that there was intentional permission or corrupt facility.

It is said the elopement is in favour of Moorsom; since, if the parties could gratify their passion at home, there would be no necessity for their elopement. But the answer is, if the parties had formed a criminal attachment they would be uneasy; the one, at living with her husband; the other, with his wife: they would elope to emancipate themselves from this restraint, and not to indulge a criminal passion hitherto ungratified; and I say this the rather, because it is proved to me that opportunities of criminal gratification were not wanting; this is not to be controverted. I cannot therefore admit the conclusion that no criminal intercourse had taken place before the elopement. Another circumstance is Moorsom's extreme grief and concern at his wife's elopement, which could not be affected, and is proved to have been vehement: he was much shocked at her infidelity. But it does not appear to me that this inference follows. The sort of criminality which would attach on Moorsom, if the evidence be taken unfavourably, is not that he had a design to get rid of his wife, but that he was willing to make advantage of C. as a lucrative customer, and to purchase this at any rate; he did not wish for [116] a separation as long as he had his wife and customer; and therefore though he was easy whilst this intercourse continued, yet the elopement made him feel different: the sweets of the connexion were gone, and nothing but the disgrace remained. These feelings would be aggravated by the reflection that his own conduct had contributed to this result; and the opinion that the world would form upon it might much shock him: the expression of the witness who states the extreme concern is, "that Moorsom was very much surprized at the elopement," which, in the point of view that I have taken, is consistent with a knowledge of their previous guilt. On the other hand I must not omit the presumptions in favor of Moorsom: the familiarities were not clandestine: the freedoms were not taken by stealth; they were the conduct of a man of bold and familiar manners, whose actions would not bear the same interpretation as those of other men. Another presumption in his favor is that the connivance of Moorsom was too much public and unguarded to be insidious; for nothing was more likely to provoke the defence which has been set up.

These are the facts and presumptions upon which the Court is called to decide. I have considered them more at large, because I must confess I have at different times felt some fluctuation of opinion. On the one side, here is an unhappy woman who has not met with that care and protection from her husband which she had a right to expect. On the other hand, there were facts that passed in his presence which ought to have alarmed a reasonable man: and Moorsom is not proved to have been deficient [117] in that degree of capacity. But considering, as I am willing to consider, his conduct as the result of unsuspecting confidence, yet he shuts his eyes after they were opened by other persons—after the remonstrance of his mother-in-law with an answer which must ever recur to my mind, "I must not affront my best customer."

In pronouncing for a separation I feel that I shall tolerate a negligent inattention to marital duty; and that I shall pronounce a decree which will not lead to the peace and honor of families, nor to the purity of private life, to which this Court always attends. On the other side, there are facts of adultery which are grossly and palpably proved, combated by presumptions which the Court is to found by inference, on particular facts, and which very possibly the Court, not knowing the husband's feelings, may misinterpret to his disadvantage; and, attributing to intention what is merely the result of dulness of apprehension, injure him by a refusal of relief. But the Court must decide. If the question were whether Moorsom acted as a prudent, a wise, or an attentive man, the result would be unfavorable: if it were a question whether in fact he contributed to the disgrace of his family, the answer would again be unfavorable; but the question is whether he contributed with a corrupt intention: and, on a consideration of the evidence, I do not think myself judicially warranted to pronounce that he did so; I am bound to pronounce judicially, and I accordingly do pronounce that he is entitled to his separation.

[118] HODGES v. HODGES. Arches, 26th February, 1795.—The husband having proved the wife's adulterous connexion with one individual, five years after separation, of which connexion two children were born, the Court held that the husband's knowledge of, and consent to, gross indelicacies, or even adultery, with three other persons, during cohabitation, would not bar him.

This was a suit for separation, by reason of the adultery of the wife with one individual during the years 1789, 1790, and 1791. On the part of the wife an allegation, pleading connivance, was to this effect: that A., a person of high rank, introduced himself to the wife; that the husband was pleased, knew she accepted presents from A., removed to lodgings near the residence of A., who visited her every day; that the husband left the room, often the house; that A. visited her in her bedchamber when she was without her stays; that in January, 1784, the husband and wife being in bed together at two in the morning, A. came to the door, told the husband there was a great debate in the House of Commons, wished him to learn the event—he went, leaving A. in the bedchamber with his wife; that A. went away without waiting to hear the result of the debate; that her brother remonstrated, ordered her to return the presents; that the husband reluctantly consented. At Spa another person, B., was attentive; went into her bedchamber; the husband saw and was pleased; B. took lodgings near them and was often in her bedchamber. At Brussels they lived in the same house with C; that the husband used frequently to go to bed, leaving his wife and C. together. An action was brought against the party with whom she [119] was charged in the libel, and a verdict for the defendant was given with costs.(a)[1]

The cause was argued by Sir William Scott and Dr. Swabey for the husband.

Dr. Nicholl and Dr. Laurence contrà.

Judgment—Sir William Wynne. The evidence is such that the counsel for the wife have not aimed at a denial of her guilt; but, as a defence, recrimination and connivance are set up. The first is not proved; the second defence is singular—the wife does not allege that she had been guilty, but that there had been during their cohabitation previous to 1785, when a separation took place, a freer correspondence than there should have been between her and other persons, with which her husband was acquainted, whence it is to be inferred that she committed adultery with them; but this adultery is not pleaded by her nor by the husband. I take the law to be, as laid down in the books, that if it appears that the wife committed adultery, that the husband connived at her adultery, that he knew that she was living in that improper manner, that he was aware of what was going on, such conduct deprives him of a right of applying to the Court, [120] and obtaining a remedy for the injury done him—if it can be considered as an injury. But when I say that this is the law, I admit at the same time that I do not remember any one instance, nor am I acquainted with the circumstances of any case, in which a sentence has been refused on this ground,(a)[2] except the case of Cibber v. Cibber, where it was said that connivance was clearly proved.(b)

[121] It is strange that there should be no precedents, for I should have expected that such a defence must frequently have been set up. But, however, I do not doubt

---

(a)[1] Hodges v. Windham, 1 Camp. N. P. 54, Lord Kenyon, in summing up, said that, "the husband having suffered such connexion with other men, was equally a bar to the action, as if he had permitted the present defendant to be connected with her."

(a)[2] The cases of Timmings v. Timmings, p. 76; Lovering v. Lovering, p. 85, had, however, been recently decided in the Consistory Court.

(b) The editor has considerable doubts whether sentence was ever given in Cibber v. Cibber: he can discover no trace of a judgment in any note to which he has access, and all that he can find in the assignation book of the Consistory, respecting the proceedings of that case, is as follows:—Cibber v. Cibber was a suit for restitution of conjugal rights brought by the wife. The citation was returned on the first session of Michaelmas Term, 1738. A libel was admitted and the marriage confessed. An allegation of faculties was given in; alimony allotted; costs were twice taxed, and twice excommunication was pronounced, and a significavit issued against the husband. An allegation on the part of the husband was asserted, but not brought in: publication passed of the evidence; the cause was concluded; and on the by-day after Michaelmas Term, 1739, the proctor for the wife porrected, in pœnam, a sentence, and prayed the husband to be condemned in alimony and costs; when the Judge, having heard counsel in support of the prayer, took time to deliberate. On the by-day after Trinity Term, 1740, the sentence was again porrected and the prayer repeated. This assignation was continued at different intervals till the second session of Michaelmas Term, 1742, when the cause stood to be sentenced, as before. The assignation was then further continued till the third session of the next term; but there is no further trace of the cause.

For the circumstances at common law of this case, see Cibber v. Sloper, 1 Selwyn, N. P. p. 10 (n. 4).

The action was tried before Lee, C. J., Middlesex Sittings after Michaelmas Term, 1738. The plaintiff and defendant lived in the same house; their bedrooms communicated. Mrs. Cibber used to undress in her husband's room and retire to Sloper's room, with a pillow taken from the bed of her husband, who shut the door after her and wished her good night. He sometimes called Sloper and Mrs. Cibber up to breakfast. Verdict for plaintiff, damages 10l.

However, "The law on this subject is now clearly settled to be that, if the husband consent to his wife's adultery, it goes in bar of his action; if he be only guilty of negligence, or even of loose or improper conduct, not amounting to a consent, it only goes in reduction of damages." Per Buller, J., Duberley v. Gunning, 4 T. R. 657.

the law to be so, provided that, on a suit brought by the husband, the wife could shew that the fact complained of was done with his connivance. In such a case the Court would not pronounce a sentence; but that the wife having committed adultery with one or two persons, on account of which the husband quits her society and lives apart from her for many years, during which she, without his knowledge, contracts an acquaintance, and commences an adulterous intercourse with another person and cohabits and has children by that person, the husband, because he once knew of the adultery of his wife with another and did not complain, should be bound to retain his wife and take her children—the fruit of this adulterous intercourse—as his own, is a very different case; I cannot think the law goes so far; I know of no case, except Cibber v. Cibber, where the sentence was refused on the ground that the husband knew of and consented to his wife's guilt without complaining; and the great [122] distinction between the two cases is that here the adultery was committed with another person, and at a great distance of time. For this reason it is not necessary to examine minutely into the evidence as to the connivance, but taking it to be as criminatory and as complete as possible, supposing that the husband was cognizant of and conniving at her adultery with the three persons mentioned, yet the parties having separated by articles in 1785, and there being no account of any adulterous connexion of the lady till 1789, when this new connexion is mentioned, of which children have been the fruit, I cannot think that the law is so severe as to bar the husband of relief. One child was born just after this suit was brought; she had another child afterwards, this may go on for ever. There is, then, a strong ground why the husband should complain when he finds children are born; each child was baptized by the name of the husband; this may be a severe grievance, an irreparable injury: for the presumption of the law is that these are the legitimate children of the husband.(a) I think this is such an increased injury that, under the circumstances,(b) the party is justified in ap-[123]-plying for relief. The adultery is proved: the recrimination is not proved: the connivance at her criminal or indelicate conduct proved is not sufficient in law to operate as a bar. I pronounce for the separation. As to the verdict, the Court does not know upon what grounds it was given. All that appears is that on the whole case the husband was not thought to have established his claim to damages.

CREWE v. CREWE. Consistory, Trinity Term, 1800.—On a suggestion that a charge of collusion and connivance, raised in argument on his own evidence, was a surprise on the husband, there being no counter-plea or interrogatories, the Court refused to rescind the conclusion in order that letters might be pleaded, holding that the husband was bound to guard himself originally against such suggestions.—A constant intercourse, continued for four years, between a wife and her paramour, not clandestine, but the common subject of conversation among servants and friends, raises a grave suspicion of the husband's knowledge and acquiescence.—On proof of the wife's adultery, continued for four years, under circumstances which raised a strong suspicion that the husband could not have been ignorant, the Court, after much hesitation and difficulty, granted the sentence of separation, as it could not affect the husband with a direct knowledge of the adultery, and as three witnesses had positively sworn they believed the husband was ignorant.—Witnesses should be required to answer to their belief or impression as to whether adultery has been committed or not, though the Court cannot rely on such opinion.—On proof of adultery, sentence may be barred—1, by compensatio criminis; 2, by condonation; 3, by active procurement or passive toleration; and, possibly, by other conduct.—Collusion is an agreement between the parties for one to commit, or appear to commit, a fact of adultery, so as to suffer the other to obtain a remedy at law as for a real injury. The law permits no co-operation for such purpose, and refuses a remedy for adultery committed with such intent; but it is not proof of collusion that, after the crime is committed, both parties are desirous of a separation.—The 105th canon requiring that divorce should not go on confession alone, the Court is almost bound to reject an affirmative issue in a suit for separation for adultery. —Passive connivance, or toleration, arising from the husband's insensibility to his own honor, or unwillingness to seek redress, is a bar to relief; if there be proved a long course of criminal conduct, of which he was, or of which he must be presumed to be, cognizant: he may wait for adequate proof, but no longer. —The long duration of a criminal intercourse, and delay in applying to the Court, and the indirectness and want of stringency in the evidence, are strong presumptions against a preconcerted scheme to obtain a sentence by contrivance. —A judgment by default against the paramour, and no defence on the part of the wife, are not proof of collusion.—Passive sufferance of adultery for a length of time enures to a waiver of legal remedy, but is difficult of proof.

(a) It was pleaded in a responsive allegation by the husband "that though he had not cohabited since 1785, that his wife was delivered of a child in 1791, at the house of the adulterer; that she declared 'it was a pity it was a girl, and that such an estate (meaning her husband's) should be lost.' That a son was born in October, 1792; that the husband went abroad in 1791; that he came to Paris; that he heard his wife had left that city on the day before; that he was advised to go away, lest she should return and assert him to be the father of the child."

(b) This consideration seems to have had much influence in the decision of the learned Judge; but it may perhaps be doubted whether any such weight would be attributed to it, since the case of The Banbury Peerage has more exactly ascertained the strength of this presumption. See the answers of the twelve Judges to a question proposed to them by a Committee of the House of Lords at the conclusion of the arguments in The Banbury Peerage case. The answers will be found at p. 433 of Mr. Le Marchant's Report of The Gardner Peerage case, to which is appended a collection of cases illustrative of the law of legitimacy, and a valuable report of the claim to the earldom of Banbury. See also 2 Selwyn, N. P. p. 745, et seq.; 1 Phillipps on Evidence, 158.

[Referred to, Churchward v. Churchward, [1895] P. 17.]

The argument in this case took place on the 3rd of May, 1800: Dr. Arnold was counsel for the husband. Sir John Nicholl and Dr. Fisher, who were counsel for the wife, rested their case on collusion, connivance, and insufficient proof of adultery.

The Court took time to deliberate.

On the 11th of May the husband's counsel made an application to the Court to rescind the [124] conclusion,(a) as connivance was suggested by surprise at the hearing, there being no plea nor interrogatories on the subject—that as the charge of collusion could not be foreseen by the husband he had omitted to bring evidence to repel it: the husband now offered an affidavit with certain letters, and prayed the conclusion to be rescinded, to meet the suggestion of surprise by introducing proof consisting chiefly of exhibits (the least suspicious evidence), and to introduce in this Court before sentence that which he might, it was apprehended, introduce in the Court of Appeal.

Contrà. There is no surprise; the charge arises on his own evidence: that they are noviter perventa cannot be averred of these letters.

Per Curiam. I apprehend this application is not made as a matter of right, but of indulgence and discretion—that is, of such indulgence as can legally and justly be given, and as is governed by a regard to the genuine and fair administration of justice. I should be unwilling to deprive the party of a remedy on any thing which appears to have been suggested as a surprise: and, if that suggestion were founded on facts appearing in the case, I would, in a matter of such importance to the husband's comfort, allow this evidence to be introduced, though the inconvenience of doing so generally is evident: [125] but I am of opinion that the suggestion of surprise is not founded. The objection of collusion and connivance arises on evidence produced by the husband himself, not on matters extrinsic; and he is bound to guard against all suggestions, not merely in the plea of the other party, but which may arise on his own evidence: if the original facts pleaded furnish such objection, he is bound to repel that by the original proof; and if he slumbers over his own remedy for such a length of time, he is not to be allowed any extraordinary indulgence in order to escape from the effect of it. How far the present evidence may affect the husband it is not for me at present to pronounce; but I am by no means inclined to allow that this is matter of surprise, for it does not grow out of any thing external. I shall therefore admit no further pleadings in this stage. There is, however, a letter referred to in the original evidence, which communicated the transaction that had passed, and the misconduct of Mr. Crewe: this letter I have some curiosity to see, and, if the party think proper, I would allow this to be introduced: but I cannot consistently with practice and general convenience admit the others.

(a) See Hamerton v. Hamerton, vol. ii. p. 24, and note. See Jones v. Jones, vol. i. 254.

2d July.—The letter having been brought in, the Court said: I have great difficulty upon the point of toleration. If the wife does not take the objection, the Court will. The husband must lay his case before the Court in such a manner as not to give occasion for such an inference. In this case there has been a course and system of habitual intercourse for four years, which could not exist without the husband's knowledge: if [126] he had a conversation with his own servants he must have learnt it. I have no reason to suppose that all the servants in the house were leagued in a corrupt faction. Even this letter, which leads to the discovery, startles me; it is rather stimulatory on the part of the paramour's friends than a letter of information. I think it points strongly to previous knowledge. The case must stand over.

11th July.—Judgment—Sir William Scott (Lord Stowell). The parties were married at Jamaica in 1780, and have had five children. A lady, who resided with them from 1793 to 1797, says "the gentleman visited in the family; till 1795 she observed nothing particular; when she was at Brighton this gentleman was much with them: he called in London, and when Mr. Crewe was at home only left his card."

Witnesses also prove "that he constantly visited Mrs. Crewe and remained alone with her when the husband was absent: but that when he was at home the visiting was in the usual form." The footman, who went to live with Mr. Crewe in August, 1797, mentions likewise "their coming from card-parties in hackney coaches together, till they were near the husband's house, and that then the gentleman got out." The same witness deposes "that he was frequently dispatched with letters from her to him, and, on one occasion, about the time when Crewe was going out; that the gentleman came late in the evening, and that on the husband's returning home he was let out clandestinely by Hawkins, the lady's-maid." Another, a maid-[127]-servant, says, "At Richmond he visited as a common acquaintance, but afterwards at Brighton was on a different footing:" she speaks to "his opening the door himself —to his knocking by a single rap—to his paying great attention to Mrs. Crewe;" and both say "that the impropriety of these visits became the subject of conversation among the servants." Hawkins also is examined. Such witnesses force the Court to observe that when servants degrade themselves by living with a woman corrupted they partake in the corruption of the house; they can neither see nor hear any thing. All that can be obtained is an ounce of truth mixed up with pounds of equivocation and the various artifices by which corrupt minds endeavour to palliate vice: but I must take the evidence as I find it.

Hawkins says she saw nothing but what was pure and proper; yet I apprehend, even from her account, that the gentleman did visit Mrs. Crewe in a way that was not consistent either with purity or propriety of conduct. Another witness, a friend of Mr. Crewe, called at Mr. Crewe's house, and found Mrs. Crewe alone: she gave a little hem, or said, "You may come in." The paramour came out of an adjoining room: she said, "He withdrew because he thought it might be some one whom he would not wish to see." Crewe was then absent. The witness called on another occasion: she said something—the servant replied that the witness was on the stairs —he found her and the lover in the room. This is the only witness who speaks to any thing respecting the anonymous letter: but there is no account in the evi-[128]-dence of what measures were taken after the receipt of it, though there is in plea.

It appears from that time the husband and wife lived apart, and the conduct of the wife and the paramour became more clearly improper. The footman says the lover was there the first day he came; was always there afterwards, and at all places, and every day; boarded in the house; stayed till one o'clock in the morning. Witness saw Mrs. Crewe in his bedchamber, and saw him twice in hers, early in the morning; it was evident there was great fondness; has found them with the doors locked. Sarah Pulteney says he visited her in the morning, and again in the evening; at the Isle of Wight he was constantly with her, and also in town; dining, supping, and staying late; slept two or three times with her mistress at Haverstock. At Southampton she waited upon her instead of her maid, and put her to bed; the paramour sat an hour by her bed-side. One night she was sent by Mrs. Crewe to tell him she was in bed. On passing through the room afterwards she saw his clothes, and the curtains close drawn. This is another fact which leaves no doubt that the parties were in bed, and were living on a criminal footing together; it gives a colour likewise to all the antecedent conduct—it shews what the connexion was originally.

I must here notice that the depositions have not been taken exactly as the Court could wish; nor as is usual in these cases. That part of the allegation which directly pleads that adultery did take place has not been examined to. The Court, though it cannot rely on the opinion of the witnesses, has a right to know their im-[129]-pression and belief whether the crime was committed or not; and it is material that the examiner should understand that it is necessary the witnesses should be required to give this information.

On the action at law there has been a judgment by default; and, on inquiry before the sheriff, damages were assessed at 3000l. What evidence was there produced does not appear to this Court, and part of the evidence here, viz. that which relates to the conduct subsequent to separation, is posterior to the action. Notwithstanding then the exceptionable mode in which the evidence has been taken, I think, attending to the later depositions, the matter of adultery is on the whole sufficiently proved; and if there are no objections to the conduct of the husband, he is entitled to his sentence of separation.

There may be, however, such objections, and of various kinds: 1st. Recrimination—for that is a bar by the law of the country: (a)[1] 2d. Condonation—unless there be a renewal of criminal conduct (Durant v. Durant, 1 Hagg. Ecc. 733): 3d. Active procurement or passive toleration of his own dishonor: and there may be others. Of these, not one has been put in plea by the wife, nor suggested in interrogatories; for she has not even cross-examined the witnesses. But, in argument, two defences are set up—collusion and connivance. These are different in their nature. Collusion may exist without connivance, but connivance is (generally) [130] collusion for a particular purpose.(a)[2] Collusion, as applied to this subject, is an agreement between the parties for one to commit, or appear to commit, a fact of adultery, in order that the other may obtain a remedy at law as for a real injury. Real injury there is none where there is a common agreement between the parties to effect their object by fraud in a court of justice. If such conduct were permissible, it would authorize parties to violate their marriage vow, and would encourage profligate and dissolute manners. The law therefore requires that there should be no co-operation for such a purpose, and does not grant a remedy where the adultery is committed with any such view. It is a fraud difficult of proof, since the agreement may be known to no one but the two parties in the cause who alone may be concerned in it, for the adulterer may be ignorant of the understanding. However, it is no decisive proof of collusion that, after the adultery has been committed, both parties desire a separation; it would be hard that the husband should not be released because the offending wife equally wishes it; she may have honest or dishonest reasons, innocent or profligate; an aversion to live with the man she has injured, a desire to live uncon-[131]-trolled, or to fly into the arms of the adulterer; it would be unjust that the husband should depend upon her inclinations for his release; he has a right to it.

It has been often said, and with peculiar injustice, that although the original adultery was not collusive, yet the proceedings in these Courts lead ultimately to collusion in the conduct of the cause; because, as the suit is between the suffering and the offending party, the latter frequently prays a sentence which she does not wish to obtain. On a little consideration, however, it will be seen that this arises from a wise provision of law: the canon directs that a divorce shall not go upon the mere confession of the party: (a)[3] the wife therefore must give a negative issue (indeed the Court is almost bound to reject an affirmative issue, since it is necessary, by the canon, that evidence should be produced): she must deny her guilt, and her prayer must be according to her denial; but this is mere style and form. If the Court sees a fair case made out, what may be the inclination of the wife, be it corrupt or honest, is of little importance; the question is whether the husband has received a real injury, and bonâ fide seeks relief.

(a)[1] Forster v. Forster, 1 Hagg. Con. 144. Proctor v. Proctor, 2 Hagg. Con. 292. Astley v. Astley, 1 Hagg. Ecc. 714.

(a)[2] It is presumed the learned Judge did not mean that connivance cannot exist in any case without collusion; for it seems that the husband may, by winking at (connivere) and pretending not to observe attentions paid to the wife by, or her attachment for, another man, lure her on to adultery, for the purpose of a separation, and obtaining damages from the paramour; and this may be done without the wife's or paramour's suspicion that the husband saw what was going on: whereas collusion must be an act in which two or more parties join to deceive the Court, or entrap another party.

(a)[3] See Timmings v. Timmings, supra, 77.

Another ground of objection is the connivance or toleration of the husband: he may have an insensibility to his own honor, and, from a conformity to the corrupt manners of the world, may have no wish to pursue a legal remedy, or [132] may not think it worth pursuing; and if such a person, after a long continuance of toleration, of himself awakes, or is compelled by the clamour and outcry of the world to awake, he awakes too late. If the adultery has gone on for a length of time, he does not stand before the Court in the favorable light of a person acting on the spur of honest feeling, whom the law delights to succour; he has made up his mind to some other satisfaction. I do not mean by this to say that the husband is immediately to rush into Court upon suspicion; he must wait for adequate proof, but he is to shew his vigilance; he is not to lay by longer than to obtain proof: if he does, his lethargy will be fatal to any application that he may make: whatever his motives may be for coming afterwards, if it be proved that there has been a long course of criminal conduct of which he was cognizant, or which, by law and by presumption, he must be supposed to have been cognizant, he cannot receive relief.

What are the circumstances here as to collusion and to connivance? The long duration of the criminal intercourse is a strong presumption against collusion, for if there had been a preconcerted scheme, an original design to separate, I think it impossible but that the application should have been sooner made, and that the purpose would have been more speedily effected. This applies to all the evidence before the separation; and as to the later evidence after the separation, there is much force in the observation that if the parties had intended to have obtained a sentence by contrivance, the proofs would have been more direct and conclusive; [133] though at present they are sufficiently so to warrant the Court in saying that the adultery is established.

It is true that the adulterer suffered judgment by default; that may in some cases arise from collusion, but it also may arise from other motives—from prudence and discretion—from a hope of mitigation of damages—from a desire of not further vexatiously annoying the party whom he has injured. The wife too has given in no plea, nor administered any interrogatories; this may arise from collusion; but it may also arise from other circumstances; at any rate the husband cannot compel the wife to do either. Looking, then, at the general circumstances of the case, I am not entitled to say that there is collusion.

I come then to the next head of objection, viz. connivance or toleration for other purposes: and this is the part of the case which presses with most force. By toleration, I mean that passive sufferance of adultery for a length of time which, in law, enures to a waiver of legal remedy. The proof of this is difficult enough; for it must arise in general, not from a positive act, but from negative conduct—inactivity. If information were proved to have been conveyed to him, that would be decisive; and if there be nothing of that kind, still the circumstances may be so strong as to raise an almost certain presumption that he has seen; and, if seeing, has tolerated. There are circumstances in this case which set in an uniform current in that way: the general mode in which these parties lived together is extraordinary and not unimportant: there was no formal separation, yet [134] as much estrangement as can well consist with the marriage state: she is allowed to go to Bath, to Brighton, and to other public places, without the husband being there for more than a night or two: the Court cannot compel the husband, even if he has no office nor profession that prevents him, to be constantly with his wife; but every man must observe that this husband did not give his wife the benefit of his care. I do not say that the husband is to dog his wife at every step with sullen and gloomy suspicion, but the protection and comfort of his society is to be afforded to a person so closely connected with him, and in whose conduct his happiness as well as her own is involved. What was the state in which these parties were living? As soon as the husband went out the lover came: the visits attracted the notice of all but the husband; it was the common conversation among the servants; and this sort of intercourse continued for four years and more:

and yet it is to be presumed that the husband was ignorant of the fact, or, if not, he was perfectly unconscious of the nature of these visits. According to the modes of life with which I am acquainted, it is not very reconcileable with credibility that a man can be so much a stranger to his own house as that a person, not particularly connected with him, shall enter his house almost constantly as the master quits it, and that the other facts proved in this case should happen. I know well that it is not uncommon that the husband is the last acquainted with the dishonor of his family; that may happen where the facts occur at a third place, where there is great intimacy with the husband, and [135] advantage taken of it; but that is not the case here: there was no particular acquaintance with the husband, yet these continual visitings going on day after day, for months and years, are noticed by every one, and still it is pressed upon the Court that the husband remained ignorant till he received the anonymous letter.

There may be modes of life with which I am little acquainted, and which may allow things to pass of which I have no idea, and which may afford opportunities no situation I am acquainted with does afford. It would be of lamentable consequence that such visits could be so paid for years; that every time the husband went out another man could come in with views observed by all, and yet that the husband should have no information communicated to himself or his friends from the variety of servants whom he entertained. There are one or two facts of a peculiar nature that strengthen this difficulty—first, the carelessness with which they carried on their intercourse: the lover came to the house on the husband going out at a late hour; he came within about half an hour; it is not stated that Crewe's absence was foreseen, or a message sent to the lover; the latter continued till the husband returned, sitting in the drawing-room into which there was the greatest probability that the husband would enter, if he returned: he did return, and instead of going there he went to the kitchen and talked to the servant: the servant heard Mrs. Crewe call her maid to let out the paramour; she did let him out; the opening of the door was heard in the kitchen. It is impossible, therefore, that there could be greater negligence; there is no appearance of that cir-[136]-cumspection for which a witness gives these persons credit. The facts mentioned by that witness are also extraordinary; and do not convey to the Court the same impression of the circumspection of the parties that he received. This fact of the lover being entertained in the absence of the husband happened twice within his knowledge. The lover was secreted in an adjoining room, and he was let out again with as little affectation of secrecy as may be. An anonymous letter is now produced: it is not a letter of information, but rather seems to refer to antecedent knowledge. It conveys no distinct information to a man perfectly ignorant, but calls upon him to support his honor, as the tongue of the world is loud against him. It is said that subsequent letters are of a different character, expressing passion, and that the wife was apprehensive of his passion; it is, however, suggested that such would not shew sincerity, but are exactly what he would write if he now came to change his conduct, and determined on vindicating his honor by applying for a remedy.

These circumstances press strongly on my mind; but when I consider that the proof of adultery is clear, and, as to the inattention, that the parties had been married twenty years, had had five children, there might be less circumspection and a more unlimited confidence on the part of the husband: but there was not less fervour in her blood than at a former period. What were Mr. Crewe's habits that might produce this estrangement do not appear. I will not take upon myself to say that there may not be modes of life in which there may be such conduct and such ignorance; but it is not [137] for the happiness of the world, nor for the security of married life, that such should often occur. Seeing little, or rather nothing, of this gentleman's mode of life, I cannot say it is impossible. Not being able to affect the husband with a direct knowledge; and there being three witnesses who swear, in express terms, that they verily believe in their consciences the visits were unknown to the husband, I think it would be taking upon myself too much to affirm, in contradiction, that they were known to him. Therefore, under all these difficulties I am compelled to pronounce for the divorce, though with no great satisfaction of mind: and I will add that possibly, in other places to which this case may be brought, the nature of it may be more accurately disclosed.

HOAR v. HOAR. Consistory, Trinity Term, By-Day, 1801.—Mere imprudence and error of judgment are not connivance; and, in determining whether the husband's behaviour has barred him from relief on proof of his wife's adultery, the honesty of his intentions, not the wisdom of his conduct, is to be considered.—Affectionate conduct to a wife for many years, no appearance during that time of a wish to withdraw from her society, and the absence of any reason to suppose that the husband knew or suspected her depravity, till very shortly before she left him, tend most strongly to disprove connivance at the turpitude of, or active co-operation in, the prostitution of a wife.

Judgment—Sir William Scott (Lord Stowell). This is a suit for adultery brought by the husband against the wife. The parties were married in 1787, and went abroad to India in 1790. In the following year Mr. Hoar, leaving his wife at Madras, joined the army, and while on military service formed an acquaintance with an officer whom he afterwards introduced to his wife. A great intimacy ensued; this officer was much at their house, and much intercourse took place between the parties in India.

Mr. and Mrs. Hoar returned to England in September, 1793, and settled in Hampshire. This officer arrived in February, 1800; he paid [138] them a visit soon after, and also another the same summer with his mother. Mrs. Hoar was indisposed and recommended to go to Tunbridge, but first to take advice in London: whence she and Mr. Hoar, accompanied by this officer, proceeded to Tunbridge. She used his curricle as easier than her husband's phaeton, but a servant always attended them. On their return they paid a visit to this officer's mother in London, and then went home, where they were visited, on the 12th of September, by that lady and her nieces, and were soon afterwards, viz. on the 25th of September, joined by the officer, who staid there till the 6th of October, while his mother remained till the 7th.

A maid-servant observed "two or three days before some uneasiness between Hoar and his wife, but had not the slightest suspicion of the cause. After the 6th of October Mrs. H. ordered the witness to pack up her things to go to her uncle's for a few days only: the journey was put off to wait for Mr. Hoar's brother. On the 9th they set off. Witness believed they were going to her uncle's; so did the man-servant; and the witness adds she believes her master did the same. At Hounslow Mrs. Hoar ordered the post-boy to go to an hotel in London; witness asked her 'if she was not going to her uncle's?' said, 'Not to-night.' On arrival at hotel asked if rooms were prepared—they were. The officer came, dined, and supped there. Her mistress, in her bed-room, told her she was extremely miserable, but said nothing more. The next day the maid asked to go and see her relations: the officer came before she went: on her return at night she found Mrs. Hoar gone: the next morning the officer came and carried her to Ealing. She [139] mentioned the uneasiness between Mr. and Mrs. Hoar, and that Mrs. H. seemed to wish to explain: he said Mrs. H. would explain: near Acton, at a small house, found the officer's mother. She saw Mrs. Hoar's clothes, but was not permitted to see her mistress: the officer told her Mrs. H., being ill, declined to give the explanation she had promised, and he made it by her desire. Mrs. H. had an attachment for him and would not return to her husband: asked if she would stay, she said (very properly) 'she would not live with a mistress whom she could not respect.'" [Evidence of cohabitation at Kensington and subsequent adultery.]

No doubt therefore can exist that Mrs. Hoar was guilty of adultery; and, unless something is proved to bar the husband, he is entitled to a sentence. There is nothing of the same immorality suggested against him: but if there is no turpitude of his own, has he connived at the turpitude of his wife? for that would bar him; still more would it bar him if he has actively contributed to her prostitution. This is suggested, and it is said that it appears from the libel itself—from the depositions of his brother and of his friend—from her letters—and from his own conduct. Two things are to be premised. First, that he had been a very affectionate and kind husband for thirteen years, and during that time there was no appearance of a desire to withdraw from the society of his wife; still less to get rid of her in this foul and dishonorable manner. The second is, there is reason to suppose he neither knew nor suspected the depravity of his wife till within two or three days of her quitting his house.

[140] It does not appear that any thing had occurred to awaken his attention or rouse his suspicions in India. The officer had been separated from Mrs. Hoar for seven years—time enough to cool the force of any attachment if it had existed; he comes to his house; nothing passes there to excite his attachment; nothing to alarm any person connected with the family; nothing which is not within the limits of such intimacy as modern manners allow; nothing till she acknowledges this attachment herself.

All the evidence therefore of passive connivance, or of active encouragement, is confined to the last two or three days. This is very material; for it is incredible that Hoar should at once so change his principles and conduct, and in so short an interval resolve to dishonor his wife and friend; there must be very precise evidence to bring this home to him. It is not mere imprudence and error of judgment which the law deems connivance; where a man takes a step for the best which turns out otherwise, it is not such an error which is to be laid to his charge. Different men have different degrees of judgment, and judge differently: nor are we to judge by the event. A Court of justice must look quo animo the step is taken, and, if it be meant well, though it have a fatal consequence, it were hard indeed to fasten on mere imprudence the consequence of guilt. Conduct to bar must be directed by corrupt intention. His situation was extremely difficult.

It is pleaded "that on the 1st of October the husband noticed her coolness and indifference, but conceiving that her temper might be affected by indisposition, took no notice of it [141] till Friday the 3rd of October, when he asked her 'if they were always to go on in this unhappy way?' She said, 'Yes, for ever.'" She acknowledged a fixed attachment to this officer—"that she had loved him from the first day she saw him in India; that she adored the ground on which he trod; that she had not dishonored him, and she begged him not to mention it whilst the officer's mother was there." By this avowal the unhappy husband was placed in a situation requiring the exercise of the greatest discretion. How was he to act so as to produce good consequences? It is said that he should have resorted to bodily coercion, and perhaps that would not have been improper. At a time when the violence of her blood must have been over, when she had been married thirteen years, to avow such an attachment, to renounce all virtue, modesty, honesty, duty, and regard to her family, did betray symptoms of that malady of mind which requires such discipline; but these extremities are in no case to be resorted to at once—milder expedients should first be tried.

"Sunt verba et voces quibus hunc lenire dolorem."

Hor. Epist. i. v. 34.

Besides, in other respects, she did not shew insanity, and there was nothing which betrayed this to the rest of the family. In this sort of dubious state can it be said that a man does wrong if he takes a little time for honest deliberation of his own, and for consulting with his friends? He did advise with his brother and with a friend, and in the meantime he abstained from any thing violent. If this was an error in [142] judgment it was excusable in such delicate circumstances. Before his brother came, viz. on the evening of the 5th of October, the husband communicated his wife's declaration to the officer. This conduct has been much blamed: it is said that it was very indiscreet, nay, very improper, to communicate this attachment: he told him of her declaration of attachment, and the conversation that had passed—represented to him the breach of hospitality and friendship he was meditating—expressed his hopes that his wife would see her error and that things would end well, but declared that in the meantime he could not entertain him in his house. The officer appeared much affected; and accordingly went early the next morning. It has been said that this was telling him how easy a conquest he might make. It was, however, necessary to tell him in some way, for he must be sent out of the house: perhaps it would have been less exceptionable if, instead of proclaiming to him her strong declarations of affection, he had stated that she shewed some uneasiness of mind; possibly some gentle and mild communication might have been more prudent. But I cannot say this explicit declaration necessarily led to the consequences. I know no system of morals by which it is necessary for a man, if a friend's wife or daughter express a guilty passion for him, to give way to the depraved inclination of such a woman, and to forget all he owes to his friend. Perhaps even this mode was not so very imprudent: he might expect, and not unreasonably, that his friend would assist him in counteracting the perverse inclinations of his wife. His account states that the officer was [143] affected by this appeal: happy would it have been if this impression had remained! At the same time I give into the observation that the communication might possibly have been contrived in a more discreet manner.

However, the intimate friend of Hoar was sent for—he found Hoar in great agitation. He said he had sent for him to consult with him—that his wife had acknowledged this guilty attachment—that he wished her to go to her uncle's to compose her mind—that he feared suicide; he begged his friend to talk to her—to say he was convinced that nothing criminal had passed, and that if she would conduct herself with propriety he would forgive her: he saw her, she avowed to him her love for this officer, and said, in a determined way, that she would go to her uncle's—that she would see this officer once more, would stay a few days at her uncle's, and then, if she could get the better of the idea of suicide, would return. He remonstrated with her on the propriety of her seeing the man, not against her going to her uncle's: she persisted; he, hoping her uncle might persuade her not to see this man, and trusting that nothing criminal would occur, invited her to his house when she should return. As for the witness acceding to the proposal of her going to her uncle's and to her seeing the man, Hoar is in no degree answerable for it, unless he adopted it. I will observe this only, that there could be no corrupt motive in the witness, which would go far to remove it from Hoar: the witness had no reason to think his advice was asked other than from honorable motives. The same conversation took place with the brother. Other judgments [144] might have been differently exercised; but it is not a question of wisdom, but of honesty of intention. It is not distinctly stated in the evidence (as it should have been) whether the dangerous part of this compact—the interview at her uncle's with the officer—was made known to the husband: but it was the duty of the friend and the brother to communicate it, and I must presume that they did.

Assuming, however, that he did know it, yet she was to be placed under such guards at her uncle's, who had a previous knowledge of the whole, that Hoar might anticipate no danger: her uncle might dissuade her from seeing this officer—could watch her if she did—his friend was persuaded no dishonourable consequences would ensue, for he invited her on her return to visit his wife. But, looking at the difficulties with which the parties were surrounded, I see no proof of corrupt conduct; nor any thing to shew they entertained a doubt of her going to her uncle's: they were alarmed at her threat of suicide, more than cooler men might have been. I should have had little apprehension from the bottle of laudanum which she had. The result of their deliberation was, that she should go to her uncle's, should take a last farewell of the object of her depraved attachment, on an understanding that nothing improper should pass, and that the interview should take place in her uncle's presence; but that is no corrupt conduct: I do not say it was wise—perhaps a set of cooler men might determine otherwise, especially after the fact has happened: they might even have foreseen the event—they might have considered that a woman who had so violated [145] her duty to her husband was not much to be trusted: but they appear to have had an intense confidence in her sincerity, and possibly might hope that the man would have resisted the temptation, and acted more honorably and generously by his friend. The case seems to have been reduced to a question of bodily coercion, or this allowance. She was going to a venerable relation: other methods of expostulation, of reasoning, and of remonstrance had failed. In determining on the former alternative they perhaps did not act prudently, but they did not, on the other hand, act dishonestly.

She however went, and it is objected that she was not duly accompanied. I think their prudence was asleep: she positively refused the attendance of Hoar or his brother; and they acquiesced. This refusal, couched in these strong terms of resistance, possibly ought to have excited more alarm; and should have made them insist the more firmly on one of them attending her: she was, however, accompanied by a female servant who had been long in the family—a woman whose conduct was not tainted by her mistress' guilt, whose principles are excellent, and one to whose care the duty might well be delegated, as far as it could to any person in her situation.

Another objection is, that on the receipt of her letter Hoar did not post up to town soon enough; but the short interval that elapsed goes far to take off the force of this. The letter of the 9th of October mentioned that she had seen the officer. Hoar had reason enough to presume that her intention of going to her [146] uncle's was much shaken, and even that the worst consequences had already followed, or would occur before his utmost diligence could have brought him up: in truth, if he had come, he would not probably have arrived till they were at Kensington, when the commencement of his dishonour would have begun, and when his wife was only to be regarded with horror and disgust. I am, then, of opinion that, though there may have been considerable mistakes in the treatment of this lady, there has been no corruption.

I am not ignorant that the same case has been before the great tribunal of the country which has held that no damages were due to the husband. If there had been here the same question, on the same evidence, between the same parties, and for the same purpose, it would have been a great comfort to follow the judgment of that eminent person to whom the law and morals of the country owe such important obligations. There, probably, more evidence was given as to the conduct of the paramour: it might be shewn "non rapuit sed recepit"—that he was not the thief but the receiver of her affections—that he was not the active seducer, but that she was the victim of her own loose principles and vicious inclinations; that he therefore owed no compensation in damages. On the very same ground that the action failed there, this Court would—on the question whether Mr. Hoar is obliged to cohabit with his wife—give its sentence in the negative: for if she be the corrupter of her partner in guilt, the husband is so much the more entitled to be relieved from her depraved society. My judgment does not clash with the other [147] judgment, but both rest on the same foundation.(a) I pronounce that the adultery is fully proved; and that it is not proved that the husband has intentionally contributed to it.

MICHELSON v. MICHELSON. Arches, February 27, 1804.—The adultery of the wife being proved, but she having, with her children, but without her husband, resided in a gentleman's house (of which she was treated as the mistress, and where she was delivered of three children), without the husband sufficiently accounting for his absence, or providing for her, or interfering with such residence, the Court dismissed her, on the ground that the husband, by such conduct, had consented to the connection and adultery.

The facts in this case were shortly these. The parties were married in August, 1792; and in 1799 came, on their way to London, to Peterborough, where the wife was confined. The husband shortly returned to Scotland with two of his children. Soon after a gentleman, pleaded to be an intimate friend of the wife and her mother, and known to the husband, was admitted on a familiar footing in the family, but did not live in the house. He was very attentive to the wife, and she complained to a female friend living in the house "that he teazed her." He went to town and returned; she made fresh complaints of his attentions: this female friend left the house "because he returned:" the wife came to town in the middle of December, 1799; but though it was pleaded she eloped, she did not come with the gentleman, nor was there any proof the journey was not taken with [148] the husband's consent. In town she resided in lodgings taken for her by this person, and passed under a former name of her husband, but observed no secrecy. The gentleman visited her there frequently: the person, at whose house she was, not from his own observation, but from the reports of others as to her conduct, requested her to quit his house; she moved in succession to the gentleman's house in town and country, was treated there as the mistress, her children joined her there, and a child was born at this gentleman's house on the 14th of September, 1800. The husband was in London from the 4th of February, for two months: during this time the wife was in the lodgings; access was not pleaded, nor was it proved. An accoucheur of great eminence, engaged by the gentleman to attend her, deposed "that he thought the child was full grown, though he could not swear she had gone more than seven months and ten days (from 4th February to 14th September"). There was no hostility at the time between the husband and wife, no complaints, nor any distress on his part at her conduct, though it was pleaded that he heard of the adultery in December. No fact of adultery—no indecent familiarities were proved: there was no plea nor interrogatories on the part of the wife. Action: Judgment by default—damages 8000l.

(a) See, however, a report of Hoar v. Allen (this case), 3 Esp. N. P. C. 276, and a notice of it, 1 Selwyn, N. P. p. 11 (n. 4), and p. 24. The letter from Allen to Hoar, referred to in Espinasse, formed no part of the evidence in Hoar v. Hoar, and of course the letters from the wife to the husband, after her elopement, could not be evidence for him in his action against Allen.

The cause was appealed to the Arches, from the dismissal of the wife by the Judge of the Consistory Court of London: and the birth of two children subsequently was pleaded and proved.

[149] Judgment—Sir William Wynne. [After stating there was full proof of the adultery]: It is for the Court to consider what has been the conduct of the husband; for, however culpable the wife may be, if he has been negligent and suffered her to form a connexion and live on the terms of cohabitation, here proved, with another man, she is not culpable towards him. Where there is so strong a case on the part of the husband, the Court has only to inquire if he has done his duty; if not, the Court will not pronounce a sentence of separation. At Peterborough the husband and wife stopped for her to lie in: after a few days he returns into Scotland, and remains there several months. A physician proves that he was seized with an acute disorder, which confined him for several months: he had likewise business there: this may account for his absence from his wife, but not for her's from him: he did not send for his wife; it does not appear that he wrote one letter to her: he pleads that he knew nothing of her adultery till December—how did this happen? there were many persons from whom he might—her mother, friends, and other acquaintance. What provision did he make for his wife in London? The lodgings were taken for her by the adulterer; the husband's children were sent to the adulterer's house: it does not appear that the husband made any provision for her, and yet his circumstances would have enabled him. This is a total desertion of his wife. If this would be sufficient, what have parties to do but that the man should leave his wife, and that another man should take her for a time, and [150] then that the parties should come to the Ecclesiastical Court and obtain a sentence? If, as I think appears here, the husband is totally indifferent to his wife, if she goes with another man—lives in his house as mistress of his family—has children by him (for all that is added in this Court by the pleas is, that she had had two other children since the former plea), I do think that the husband has, by his conduct, consented to her adultery; he is not, therefore, by law, entitled to a separation: and therefore, in this case, I cannot pronounce for such separation.

GILPIN v. GILPIN. Arches, June 25th, 1804.—To establish connivance, in bar to a suit on account of the wife's adultery, it is not necessary to shew knowledge of, and privity to, the actual commission of adultery; such extreme negligence to the conduct of his wife, and such encouragement of acquaintance and familiar intimacy, as are likely to lead to an adulterous intercourse, are sufficient.

This was a suit brought by the husband against his wife by reason of adultery. The libel—after pleading the marriage on the 29th of December, 1793, and the birth of four children, and that Mr. Gilpin, having, professionally as a surgeon, attended an officer in the army, introduced him into his family: after which, towards the end of the year 1801, he used frequently to visit at the house—charged three specific acts of adultery in the house of the husband in January, 1802: and that, on the 29th of that month, the maid-servant in Mrs. Gilpin's presence informed Gilpin of his wife's infidelity; that she did not deny it, but quitted the house; and, in the afternoon of the same day went to Marlborough with the particeps criminis, where they cohabited till the third of [151] February. Annexed to the libel was a letter, dated 30th of January (the day after her elopement), from Mrs. Gilpin to her aunt, in which was this passage—"You long ere now must have heard the dreadful news of my separation from the best of husbands, by my own infamous conduct."

The defensive allegation, in substance, pleaded: 1st. That in April, 1801, Gilpin was of the age of forty-four years, the officer of the age of twenty-two, and Mrs. Gilpin of the age of twenty-four: that Gilpin seemed very desirous of promoting an intimacy between his wife and the officer, and frequently invited him to his house.

2nd. That the intimacy formed between Mrs. Gilpin and the officer was frequently the subject of conversation with Gilpin's friends; that he did not take any steps to check it, but was very desirous of promoting it, and was also very negligent of his wife; that he frequently requested him to call upon Mrs. G. when he, G., intended to be from home, and to write cards, and do other offices for her, and to walk out with her sometimes alone, and at other times in company, and to attend her to the public rooms and other places of public resort when he, G., did not accompany her: and that in the husband's absence he was almost constantly with her.

3rd. That in August and September, 1801, Gilpin generally slept at a lodging about one mile and a half from Bath, and several times asked his wife and this officer to accompany him there in the evening, and walk home alone, which they did.

[152] 4th. That in September, 1801, Gilpin invited this officer to accompany him and his wife to Chippenham races; that, on their arrival, he left him and Mrs. G. to walk about on the race-ground, and while he, G., was in the stand, he called out to this officer and desired him to give Mrs. G. his arm; and after the races desired his wife to shew this officer the town of Chippenham, which she did; that they dined at the Angel Inn in a room up one pair of stairs, and afterwards he, G., left them alone together at the inn, saying, "I am going to call upon my tenant; you will take care of my wife."

5th. That in the beginning of 1802 Gilpin brought his action for crim. con., that the cause was set down for trial after Trinity Term, 1802, but, "Gilpin being conscious of the impropriety of his own conduct towards his wife, and knowing that he had been the cause of, and had promoted, the intimacy between her and , did, on the day preceding that on which the action was to be tried, withdraw the record, and that he and had since executed mutual releases to each other."

6th. That G., having so connived at the intercourse hereinbefore set forth, was barred from a separation.

The admissibility of this allegation was argued by—

Sir John Nicholl and Dr. Robinson for the wife.

Dr. Arnold and Dr. Laurence for the husband.

[153] Judgment—Sir William Wynne. A libel has been given in this case pleading sufficient facts to entitle the husband to relief, and annexing a letter in which the wife admits her guilt, and speaks of her husband as "the best of husbands." This letter may be used at the hearing, but is not such as to preclude the defence now set up. What disposition the wife was in at the time she wrote it—what was the effect expected, the Court cannot say; but it is not a letter that will prevent the admission of this plea.

The present allegation, without admitting the adultery, charges the husband with such conduct as would avoid a sentence, even if adultery were proved. The plea is such as is often admitted—of negligence and encouragement on the part of the husband. Connivance is the word used. It has been argued that it must be such as to shew knowledge of, and privity to, the actual commission of adultery: but that is not so. If there has been such extreme negligence to the conduct of his wife, such an encouragement of acquaintance and familiar intimacy as was likely to lead to the consequence that ensued—an adulterous intercourse—it would subject him deservedly to a refusal of the sentence he prayed. The relative age of the parties is not improper to be pleaded: the husband is older than his wife: that may lead to an obligation in him to exercise a more vigilant superintendence over her conduct.

It is alleged that the husband frequently invited this man, an officer in the army, to his [154] house, and promoted his intimacy with his wife. In the libel it is pleaded that he became acquainted with him as a patient: but he did not so treat all patients; this is not an excuse. It is alleged that their conduct was observed, and became the subject of conversation; then if the husband acted with the discretion which he ought, he must have taken some care. On the contrary, he appears to be and was desirous of promoting the acquaintance: he was so negligent of, and inattentive to, his wife, as not to interfere in order to check, but rather to encourage, their intimacy. He sent letters inviting this young officer to his house when he himself intended to be out. It is said, How can you prove this? You can prove the facts—that letters were sent; that the man came; that the husband was out, and from thence the Court would infer the intention. He was invited to walk out with Mrs. Gilpin, sometimes with others, sometimes alone. It was singular the husband should ask them to walk alone: the other part is not of so much weight. He was invited to go to public places where the husband did not go; and the article concludes by alleging that this man was almost always with her, and the husband from home: this, if proved, will be very material, and will go far to establish the allegation, and what is relevant to the defence.

The 3rd article pleads an extraordinary fact, that the husband had a lodging near Bath where he slept alone; that he asked his wife and this officer to walk with him there; and that they returned alone to Bath. This possibly may be explained; but it is extraordinary [155] that he should have a lodging for himself alone, that his wife should not sleep there; and stranger, that he should leave this man to walk home with his wife.

The 4th pleads that they went together to Chippenham races. There is not much in that: but the article pleads, during this short trip, three different occasions on which the husband studiously took care that his wife and her paramour should be alone together. This was negligence, inattention, and encouragement likely to lead to the consequences which happened.

The 5th pleads that the husband brought his action; and then, conscious of his own misconduct, withdrew it, and that mutual releases were executed. It is said there might be other good reasons: if so, the husband may set them out: on the contrary, if the fact be that he had no other; but that he was conscious of his own misconduct, it may bring out what is material; he must give his answer to it. The fact is very striking.

I admit the allegation.(a)

Note.—Shortly after the admission of this allegation the cause determined by the death of the husband.

[156] CAPEL v. ROBARTS AND NEELD. Arches Court, Trinity Term, 1st Session, 1830.—An allegation, on the part of the executors, responsive to a libel in a suit of subtraction of legacy, and pleading circumstances dehors the will, is admissible to explain a latent ambiguity as to the object of the bequest; but the Court rejected the testator's declarations to the drawer of the will as inconclusive, and expressed a strong disinclination to their admission, in such a suit, under any circumstances.

On admission of an allegation.

This was a suit of subtraction of legacy brought by John Capel, Esq., treasurer of the City of London Lying-in Hospital, against the executors of the will of the late Philip Rundell.

The testator, by his will, gave 200l. sterling to the treasurer for the time being, of various charitable institutions, to be applied to the purposes of the respective establishments; and, among them, he enumerated "The Lying-in Hospital in Aldersgate Street, London:" and the fourth article of the libel pleaded "that the City of London Lying-in Hospital, Old Street, City Road, was formerly situate in Aldersgate Street, London, and was called 'The City of London Lying-in Hospital:' that subsequently the said hospital was removed to the corner of Old Street, City Road, bordering on Aldersgate Street, where it carries on its charitable purposes, and is now called 'The City of London Lying-in Hospital:' and that there neither now is, nor ever was, any other lying-in hospital in Aldersgate Street, London, save the one which removed, as aforesaid, and to which the testator subscribed during 1818-19-20-21-22. The article further pleaded the identity of the hospitals, and that Mr. Capel was the treasurer, and, as such, a legatee."

The executors gave in their answers to the libel, and they admitted "that the City of [157] London Lying-in Hospital, Old Street, City Road, removed from Aldersgate Street in 1773; but denied that the present building was bordering on, or contiguous to, Aldersgate Street, for that it was more than a mile distant; they admitted that there was not now any lying-in hospital in Aldersgate Street, but denied that there never was any other such establishment save the City of London Lying-in Hospital therein, for the respondents said that for some time after the removal of the said hospital from Aldersgate Street the hospital now called by the name of the 'General Dispensary in Aldersgate Street,' carried on its charitable purposes as a lying-in hospital, although it had now ceased to do so: and that they believed that the testator, by the words 'The Lying-in Hospital in Aldersgate Street, London,' intended the hospital called 'The General Dispensary in Aldersgate Street;' and to which the deceased was an annual subscriber, as well as an occasional donor, from 1786 to his death, and to which hospital during that period he constantly sent patients, and in the welfare and management whereof he greatly interested himself, and that the respondents have paid the legacy in question to the use of the said dispensary."

(a) Consistory, 16th June, 26th November, 1802.—In Loader v. Loader, on proof of the wife's guilt, the Court called for an affidavit from the husband explanatory of his delay to bring the suit; and, being satisfied therewith, pronounced the sentence. See also Best v. Best, 2 Phill. 161.

An allegation, responsive to the libel, pleaded, on the part of the executors, in substance:

1. That the testator, from 1786 to his death, was an annual subscriber to, and also a life governor of, the General Dispensary, Aldersgate Street, London; frequently sent patients to it, interfered and voted in the election of the officers, and greatly interested himself in its [158] concerns; and in 1817, having sent a greater number of patients thereto than usual, presented to it an additional donation of 20l. That the hospital was instituted in 1769, and had ever since been carried on upon the site of a building on which a lying-in hospital had been.

2. That the testator first came to London in 1769, about which time a certain hospital was removed from Aldersgate Street to a building erected for that purpose in the City Road (next adjoining to St. Luke's Hospital, to which the testator, by his will, gave 200l., by the description of St. Luke's Hospital, in Old Street Road), and hath ever since been, and is now, called "The City of London Lying-in Hospital," and "The City of London Lying-in Hospital, City Road;" that it is not bordering on, or contiguous to, Aldersgate Street; but is five furlongs distant from it, and seven furlongs distant from the site on which the hospital formerly stood: that the testator never sent any patient to, nor interfered in the concerns of, the hospital; and in 1822 discontinued his subscription, and never afterwards resumed it.

3. Exhibited a printed book of the concerns and purposes of the hospital, published by authority of the governors, in 1827; and alleged that in the title page the hospital is designated "The City of London Lying-in Hospital, City Road;" and that in the 16th page, wherein directions are given to persons inclined to benefit the hospital by will, it is described by the same name.

4. That the testator intending by his will to give among other charitable bequests 200l. to the "General Dispensary, Aldersgate Street," gave to Mr. Coles, his solicitor, written instruc-[159]-tions for the same, and a list of the various legacies: that in such instructions all the charitable institutions which the testator intended to benefit by will were respectively described by their local situation; that the solicitor on that occasion read the instructions to the testator, clause by clause; that on coming to the bequest of 200l. to the hospital described in the instructions as "The Lying-in Hospital, Aldersgate Street, London;" the testator said "Yes, the hospital in Aldersgate Street:" (a) that a draft of the will (executed) was afterwards approved of by the testator: that by the words "The Lying-in Hospital," &c. the testator meant "The General Dispensary," &c. and that the executors had so accordingly paid it.

5. Recited part of the 4th article of the libel, and pleaded that an institution called "The City of London Lying-in Charity" had since 1815 been, and is now carried on, in Aldersgate Street; and that application for the payment of the said legacy was, before the commencement of this suit, made on behalf of such institution, and also of another lying-in hospital, now situate in Knight-Rider Street.

6. A correspondence, in respect to the said legacy, commenced by a letter from the then secretary of the City of London Lying-in Hospital, City Road, to the executor, Neeld, and answered by Coles on the 1st August, 1827; also a further letter from Coles, on the 9th, mentioning the payment of the legacy, and the reasons generally that enabled the executors [160] to fix upon the hospital; also a letter, dated 28th August, 1828, addressed by Coles to the Committee of the City of London Lying-in Hospital, City Road, stating that from the testator's instructions, as well as from oral explanations, there was no doubt as to the meaning and intention of the testator; it further pleaded that, in conversation, Coles had explained the reasons to Mr. Capel.

7. Exhibited the original letters of the secretary, and copies of three letters from Coles.

Lushington and Dodson in objection to the allegation. The three first articles are admissible, but the fourth introduces declarations to construe a written instrument: this is guarded against by the statute of frauds, and does not come within the exception stated and explained by Gibbs, C. J., who, in delivering, in the House of Lords, the unanimous opinion of the Judges, says, "The Courts of Law have been jealous of the admission of extrinsic evidence to explain the intention of a testator; and I know only of one case in which it is permitted, that is, where an ambiguity is introduced by extrinsic circumstances" (Doe dem. Oxenden v. Chichester, 4 Dow, 65). There is a wide difference between allowing facts explanatory of an ambiguity, and declarations: if there were a latent ambiguity, facts in respect to either institution might be admissible, but declarations of what the testator said at the time the will was prepared cannot be received as evidence. There [161] is a material distinction between an hospital and a dispensary. In the fifth article an application by other institutions is pleaded; but that does not bear upon the question. The correspondence is inadmissible. The jurisdiction exercised by the Ecclesiastical Court in these suits for legacies is very convenient and summary; it avoids the necessity of resorting to Chancery, where the numerous parties and the nature of the proceedings occasion a much larger expence and delay than are produced by the simple and expeditious remedy afforded by these Courts. It is therefore very desirable to keep the pleadings within the smallest possible compass.(a)

(a) The part in italics, and the 6th and 7th articles were ordered to be expunged.

[162] The King's advocate and Nicholl contrà. This is not a question in a court of probate, but in a court of construction: the inquiry is not as to the factum of the instrument, but as to the meaning of a clause in it; and, in a court of construction, parol evidence is admissible, and is only admissible when the ambiguity is latent. What is the case here? There is nothing of ambiguity on the face of the will itself; and that any such ambiguity exists, only appears from dehors the instrument, viz. from the fact that there is no institution which answers in all respects the testator's description. The existence of this ambiguity is admitted by the manner in which the other side have [163] shaped their case. The libel stated, that by the hospital described in the will the testator meant the Lying-in Hospital in Old Street: the claimant, therefore, admits that the description would not, of itself, and without explanation, carry the legacy to this or any other existing institution, and has undertaken to shew that the testator erred in the local description of the hospital he proposed to benefit. The latent ambiguity thus admitted to exist is sought to be explained by extrinsic circumstances: this explanation may be repelled in the same way; and accordingly the present allegation pleads, in reply, facts shewing that it not only was not likely that the testator should give a legacy to the claiming hospital, but it assigns reasons—among others, the deceased's declarations—why it was probable that he intended to benefit another institution to which the legacy in question has been paid.

(a) The jurisdiction in personal legacies belongs to the Ecclesiastical Courts:* but the simple mode there pursued of enforcing payment is but little known. This jurisdiction is exercised by the Arches Court in cases of all wills proved in the Prerogative Court, and by the official principals of each diocese in cases of wills proved in the Diocesan Courts.

The course of proceeding in the Arches Court is usually as follows:—The executor being cited to answer the legatee in a suit of subtraction of legacy, a short libel is brought in, pleading that A. B. made a will; that he thereof appointed C. D. executor, and is since dead, leaving bona notabilia, and without revoking or altering his will; that, since his death, C. D. has proved his will in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury; that by his will A. B. left a legacy to E. F. in the following terms [the clause of the will containing the legacy is here recited]; that this legacy remains unsatisfied, and that C. D. is possessed of, and has admitted, assets; has been applied to and refuses payment; and further pleads the identity of E. F. and the legatee, and that he is of age; and the libel concludes with a prayer that the executor may be compelled to pay the legacy, and be condemned in costs. The records of the Prerogative Court prove all the facts, except the assets, age, and identity of the legatee, and the executor is, upon the libel being admitted, assigned to give in his answers. Should he, in his answers, deny assets, or the legatee's identity or age, witnesses may be examined. Sometimes, as in the case in the text, there may be some special circumstances stated in the libel, and the executor also may plead responsively; but in a

---

* See Reynish v. Martin, 3 Atk. 333. 2 Roper on Legacies (White's edition), 691, and the cases there cited: and Barker v. May, 9 B. & C. 489. See also Norris v. Hemingway, 1 vol. 4, in notis.

It is admitted that facts, to shew intention, are pleadable as explanatory of a latent ambiguity; but it is denied that the deceased's declarations are. In Thomas v. Thomas, however, Lord Kenyon said declarations at the time of making a will were admissible to explain a latent ambiguity.(a) That there are four different institutions which have claimed the legacy, all of which assert that the terms in [164] the will apply to them, is a circumstance in itself against this demand: and the onus to establish a particular and exclusive claim is on the party asserting that claim. It is always pleaded in libels for legacy that demand of payment had been made on the executors, and resisted. The correspondence is annexed, as responsive to this and explanatory of the refusal, and may affect the question of costs.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This question is in respect to a legacy which has already been paid; and the only point is whether it has been paid to the right party. The Court is disposed to enter more fully into the case, as perhaps its observations may prevent a charitable hospital from a waste of its funds, and from exposing itself to costs.

It is a suit for subtraction of legacy brought by the treasurer of the London Lying-in Hospital against the executors of the late Philip Rundell. The libel pleaded the clause in the will by which the legacy was given. Among a variety of legacies to different charities, the legacy demanded is in the words following:—"The Lying-in Hospital in Aldersgate Street, London." The heading of the libel describes the institution for which the legacy is claimed as "The London Lying-in Hospital formerly the Lying-in Hospital in Aldersgate Street:" and the fourth article more fully describes its history and the testator's connexion with it. By thus pleading, the plaintiff seems to admit that the words of the will, without circumstances dehors the will, would not carry the legacy to [165] the hospital for which it is claimed. The will is dated in 1827, five years after the testator had ceased to subscribe to this institution; and the allegation now offered pleads that the charity claiming this legacy is not the charity described or intended by the testator in his will. [The Court here shortly stated the substance of the allegation.] The three first articles are not objected to: but a question is raised whether the parol declaration, pleaded in the fourth article, is admissible. The Court would be very cautious in admitting such an article for the purpose of explaining what the deceased intended. If such a course be open to the one side for the purpose of explaining this ambiguity, it is also open to the other in order to shew that the testator meant not the dispensary in Aldersgate Street, but the hospital in the City Road. The will speaks for itself, and the declaration does not carry the matter further. The expression still is "hospital," not "dispensary:" and I do not know whether assistance to lying-in women does not come within the objects of a general dispensary. I am, however, very strongly disinclined, without further consideration, to make a precedent of introducing declarations between the testator and the drawer of his will. There may be circumstances, as where they are the only evidence, and where they are direct and stringent, in which it might possibly become the duty of the Court to admit declarations; but, in great majority of cases the legacy is paid either as soon as the citation is taken out, or as soon as the libel is admitted. From the early stage in which these suits usually terminate, they pass, in a great degree, sub silentio, and are thus generally supposed more rare than is really the case. Of late they have, it is believed, become more frequent than they were a few years since. Sometimes, as a preliminary proceeding, an inventory and account is called for in the Prerogative Court.

---

The bill for establishing local Courts proposes that those Courts should be entrusted with a jurisdiction for the recovery of legacies, in which the course of proceeding would not be very dissimilar from that above detailed; but possibly, if the extremely simple, cheap and expeditious jurisdiction, now exercised by the Ecclesiastical Courts in this class of cases, were more generally known—still more if it were extended to the recovery of legacies charged on the realty—the want of any further remedy would not be felt.

(a) 6 T. R. 671. 1 Phillipps on Evidence, 519. "It seems to be now settled that all conversations and declarations of testators will be received where parol evidence is admissible, whether made before, at the time, or after the making of their wills, but with different degrees of weight and credit." 1 Roper on Legacies, 155 (White's edition), citing Lord Eldon in Trimmer v. Baynes, 7 Ves. 508.

the present instance, they do not alter the case: the question still remains whether the testator meant the General Dispensary in Aldersgate Street, or this lying-in hospital which was formerly [166] situate there, but which is now removed. The fifth article is in some degree contradictory and explanatory of the libel; but yet not directly so, because the title of the institution now existing in Aldersgate Street is "Lying-in Charity," not "Hospital."

The two next articles, pleading the correspondence, appear irrelevant; or, at all events, are unnecessary. The sole question is, the intention of the testator in giving this legacy. I cannot think this correspondence can tend to shew what was the opinion of the testator: it tends to shew the opinion of the executors but not of the testator. It is, indeed, chiefly relied upon as bearing on costs: and also as explanatory of the conduct of the executors: but that requires no justification; no one will impute to them that they are acting otherwise than quite properly. The party suing must make out his case.

The sole question then is, whether the legacy is given to "The City of London Lying-in Hospital, City Road." That institution comes not within the words, neither by name and title, nor by locality; neither by the beginning nor by the end of the description. First, as to the name and title, or beginning of the description. The legacy is not given "to the City of London Lying-in Hospital," which is the description of the claimant; but to "the Lying-in Hospital," which would apply as well to any other charity for lying-in women—of which there are several. Secondly, as to the locality, or end of the description: it is not "the City Road," but "Aldersgate Street." An attempt is made in the libel to remedy this by stating that about [167] sixty years ago the City of London Lying-in Hospital was carried on in Aldersgate Street. That was about or before the time that the testator came to London: and, on that account, he was not likely to make a blunder in its locality. On the other hand, the site of the dispensary having formerly been a lying-in hospital, it is likely enough to have retained the name of a hospital, or the Lying-in Hospital, though the correct name was the General Dispensary. The deceased, then, was much more likely to mistake as to its title than as to its locality: and, from the description alone, the probability is in favour of the locality, and that the legacy was not intended for the City of London Lying-in Hospital in the City Road, but for some institution in Aldersgate Street.

The extrinsic circumstances are more decisive. In support of the claim of the hospital in the City Road, it was thought necessary to plead that the testator had subscribed to that institution from 1818 to 1822. This, standing alone, is rather unfavourable than otherwise, for the contribution was discontinued for five years before the will was made. He probably subscribed from some temporary considerations, but his withdrawing, when possessed of immense wealth, shews that he thought the institution did not want funds, or was no longer entitled to his support; and it is expressly pleaded that he never interfered in its concerns, never sent patients there, and never resumed his subscription: but, on the other hand, looking to his connexion with this institution in Aldersgate Street, he was an annual subscriber [168] for forty years—a life governor—sent a number of patients—made an additional donation in 1817, because he had sent an unusual number of patients, and took an interest in it by attending the election of its officers. All these circumstances then tend to shew that he meant that institution; and though he was mistaken in the exact title, he was accurate in describing its locality.

The testator has enumerated in his will no less than fifteen charities to which legacies of 200l. each are given, and he is very particular in describing each by its locality, however well the institution may otherwise be known. It is, therefore, very improbable that he should misstate the locality of the charity he intended to benefit, and describe it in Aldersgate Street (where he had never known it) when it was in Old Street, City Road, which is at some distance, particularly when he left a legacy to the hospital next door to it, by the description of St. Luke's Hospital in Old Street Road. It is equally improbable, or still more so, that he should omit altogether this charity in Aldersgate Street which he had so much supported, and about which he so greatly interested himself for forty years, and to the time of his death. I feel satisfied that the testator intended to give this legacy to the General Dispensary in Aldersgate Street, notwithstanding the objection arising from the mistake of the name. But the executors are not bound to prove for whom the legacy was intended: it rests with the other party to shew that the institution, for which he claims, is entitled.

The allegation, excepting the parol declara-[169]-tions in the fourth article, and the whole of the sixth and seventh articles—which I direct to be expunged—is admissible; and I may venture now to say that if the facts stated in this allegation, thus reformed, were proved, I should pronounce against the application. If the party stops here, the executors probably will not press for costs, to which they would be entitled if the cause was persisted in.

Allegation to be reformed.

Note.—The proceedings were discontinued.

THE OFFICE OF THE JUDGE PROMOTED BY LEE v. MATHEWS. Arches Court, Easter Term, 4th Session, 1830.—Brawling and smiting at a vestry attended only by five persons, and held in a room situate within the churchyard, are, ratione loci, offences within stat. 5 & 6 Edw. 6, c. 4, though of a very slight ecclesiastical character. In such a case, where the promoter, a private individual, was proceeding vindictively, and had in the articles exaggerated the smiting, and suppressed his own brawling expressions, which provoked the smiting, the Court directed the matter to stand over for private arrangement; but, that failing, on a subsequent day pronounced the brawling and smiting proved, decreed the defendant to be suspended ab ingressu ecclesiæ for a week for brawling, and to be imprisoned 24 hours for smiting, and ultimately condemned him in costs.—The minister has, in the first instance, the right to the possession of the key of the church, and the churchwardens have only the custody of the church under him: if he refuses access to the church on fitting occasions, complaint must be made to higher authorities.—Where the office of the Judge is promoted, the whole transaction should be fairly stated in the articles, in order, first, that the Judge may consider whether he ought to allow his office to be promoted, and, secondly, that the defendant may be enabled, without injustice to himself, to give an affirmative issue.

[Applied, Ritchings v. Cordingley, 1868, L. R. 3 Adm. & Ecc. 123. Discussed, Reg. v. Bishop of Oxford, 1879, 4 Q. B. D. 267, 585.]

In this cause, brought by letters of request from the official principal of the Consistorial and Episcopal Court of Winchester, the office of the Judge was promoted by Sir John Theophilus Lee, Knt., against Michael Mathews, Commander in H.M. navy, "for quarrelling, chiding, and brawling by words at a meeting of the parishioners of Bedhampton (Hants), held in the vestry-room situate in the churchyard, and adjoining to, and communicating with, the parish church, on Thursday the 29th of October, 1829; and for (then and there) laying violent hands upon and smiting the said Sir J. T. Lee."

The second article charged, "That you, M. [170] Mathews, in the course of some explanation arising out of an enquiry you had made of the said Lee, as to the particular object for which the vestry meeting had been convened, in a brawling, &c. manner, said, addressing the said L., 'That is a lie;' and shortly afterwards, 'You are a damned liar;' and that on the said L. remonstrating with and telling you 'that, as a magistrate, it was his duty to keep, and not break, the peace, and that you should not induce him to do otherwise;' you immediately replied, 'You are no magistrate here, sir.' And then, advancing towards him in a passionate manner, you struck the said L. a violent blow on the face with your doubled fist."

On these articles three witnesses, viz. the parish churchwarden and the two overseers, were examined: and from their evidence (as far as respected the brawling and smiting, and the general character of the defendant) it appeared that they and Sir J. T. Lee were alone present at the commencement of the vestry meeting of the 29th of October. Lee was chosen chairman; in about ten minutes after, Mathews, the rector's churchwarden, came and inquired of Lee "what the vestry was for?" Lee read aloud the notice, the purport being, that the vestry should order a new key to be provided for the churchwardens, in consequence of the rector keeping both the keys of the church in his possession. Mathews then, addressing the meeting generally, said with great warmth, "You will do it at your peril;" he repeated the words two or three times. Lee then said to him, "It will be the minister and his churchwarden [171] against the vestry who represent the parish, as every act of the vestry is that of the parish generally;" Mathews said, "That is a lie!" L. replied, "You shall not tempt me to break the peace; you are acting like a blackguard to make use of such language." M.—"You are a damned liar." L.—"You are still acting more like a blackguard; as a magistrate it is my duty to keep the peace, &c." M.—"You are no magistrate here, sir;" and walking up to L., Mathews, with his open hand, struck L. a sharp blow upon the cheek. L.—"Now, sir, I'll trounce you for this, as sure as you are alive." The conduct of Mathews was very violent, and he was in a great passion. A statement, by Lee's direction, was then drawn up of what had passed, which at the time was admitted by Mathews to be correct, except that the blow was not severe.

Upon interrogatories: Mathews is a man of gentlemanly, inoffensive, meek, and quiet manners, except when irritated and provoked; and of high moral character and respectability: he is a constant attendant at church. At a vestry meeting, subsequent to that of the 29th of October, he stated to the effect, "That what he had done was strictly under a sense of his duty as churchwarden, in upholding the character of the minister's sacred office, and that he had never supported the clergyman from any other motive, and certainly not in opposition to the parish."

After the cause had been opened, the Court proceeded to make some observations as follows:—

[172] Per Curiam. This is a suit for brawling and smiting: the first article states the law, the second article lays the facts.

Three witnesses have been examined, viz. the parish churchwarden and the two overseers: no other person was present: they prove both the offences charged. In respect to the brawling, the articles do not state all that passed: the witnesses, even upon their examination in chief, prove that certain words were used by the promoter which are not inserted in the articles. In respect to the smiting, they prove less than what is laid. It is pleaded that the blow was given with the "doubled fist:" the witnesses say with the "open hand." These facts shew that the articles are drawn in an exaggerated spirit; and that circumstance may not only affect the costs, but the degree of punishment. Long interrogatories have been administered suggesting various circumstances which, it is true, are for the most part contradicted, but they do disclose some circumstances tending to shew that this parish is in an unfortunate state of disunion and conflict.

There was in this parish some difference of opinion about painting the church. Sir John Lee, who became a parishioner only at Michaelmas, 1828, appears to have supposed that the minister, and the churchwarden nominated by him, had no voice in matters that were to be paid for by the parish, nor with the vestry book. Sir John Lee was strongly opposed to the minister and his measures—was often called to the chair; and, as chairman, had inserted in the vestry book some entries censuring the [173] rector, and which the chancellor of the diocese advised should be expunged. On the other hand, the minister kept possession of the keys of the church, and as it should seem, in order to prevent this painting at that particular time; and surely the minister of the parish is the fittest person to decide at what season the public worship may be suspended with least inconvenience to the religious duties of the parishioners. This vestry was called for the purpose of ordering an additional key of the church to be made for the use of the parish churchwarden. This was very irregular; for the minister has, in the first instance, the right to the possession of the key, and the churchwardens have only the custody of the church under him. If the minister refuses access to the church on fitting occasions, he will be set right on application and complaint to higher authorities. These are miserable disputes, much to be lamented: as to which was the party perverse and blameable, or whether there were not some faults on both sides, the Court is not desirous of forming an opinion; but I much fear that the present suit will be far from tending to promote union.

At this vestry, consisting of the parish churchwarden and the two overseers, and Sir John Lee, the chairman, Mr. Mathews, the rector's churchwarden, attends (no other persons were present); he inquires into the object of the meeting, and protests against the measure; and at length words ensue. From the previous history it appears the parties did not meet in amity and good feeling towards each other. The evidence shews that most un-[174]-seemly language was bandied about between the parties: there were mutual brawlings, one gives the "lie," the other uses the word "blackguard:" this was rather a strange mode of "keeping the peace." At all events, it was not observing "the sanctity of the place."

The witnesses describe Captain Mathews as a moral, gentlemanlike, quiet man, except when provoked, but unfortunately he is irritable: he was provoked to give Sir John Lee a slap on the face; and undoubtedly, though an officer in the navy, and though the insulting and opprobrious term "blackguard" was applied to him, he ought not to have forgotten the sanctity of the place. Immediately Sir John Lee exclaims "I'll trounce you for that" the transaction is reduced into writing, and the suit is brought. But how are the articles laid? Not by setting forth all the words, and the provocation given; the term "blackguard" is entirely omitted: but though the provocation for the smiting is omitted, the smiting itself is highly coloured and exaggerated: the articles lay it to have been "a violent blow with the doubled fist." Now this being a case of office, the whole transaction should have been fairly and candidly stated at once, in order, first, that the Judge might have an opportunity of considering whether, both parties being involved pari delicto, he ought to allow his office to be promoted; and, secondly, that the defendant might be enabled, without injustice to himself, to give an affirmative issue. Had all the facts appeared in the articles, I doubt whether, considering that the promoter is not a disinterested officer of the parish, proceeding in his official capacity ob publicam vin-[175]-dictam, but a private individual proceeding for an offence committed against himself, I should have allowed the case to have gone on. At all events, the suppression of the whole truth and the exaggeration of part of the offence is very material, as applying to the question of costs, because it has prevented the defendant from giving an affirmative issue, and submitting to the judgment of the Court. In that case the costs would have been trifling: now they are probably considerable. The Court will let the whole stand over, recommending to the parties to talk together, or rather to get their counsel to talk together, out of Court, thinking it possible that in that case the judgment of the Court may never be required; and trusting that the parish may go on more amicably in future.

On a subsequent day Lushington, on behalf of the promoter, stated that terms of agreement having been settled on the part of Captain Mathews by the King's advocate and by himself, and the defendant having declined to accede to them, the promoter was under the necessity of calling upon the Court to pronounce judgment.

Trinity Term, By-Day.—Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The recommendation of the Court has not been attended with success, and the Court is now called upon and compelled to give its sentence. The brawling and smiting being proved, the consideration remains—what is the proper [176] degree of punishment to be applied, and what is to be done as to costs? With reference to both these questions, the Court must look to all the circumstances and to the spirit of the proceedings.

In order to determine the degree of ecclesiastical censure, what, first, are the circumstances of the transaction? The object of the law is to preserve the sanctity of the place, and to prevent public disturbance therein. Here, the transaction did not occur in the church, nor yet in that part of the churchyard appropriated to religious purposes—the Christian burial of the dead—but in the vestry-room, where the temporal concerns of the parish are transacted: and though, as the building stands upon consecrated ground, a long stream of authorities forbid the expression of a judicial doubt as to its coming within the meaning of the statute, still it cannot be denied that the sanctity of the place is of an inferior character.

Again, the transaction was not to the disturbance of public worship, or of any religious service, when the parishioners were met for pious purposes or for the burial of their dead, but it occurred at a vestry very limited in numbers—almost a private meeting of Sir John Lee and the parish officers. It was then, in fact, almost as little of an offence against public decency as if the scene had been laid at a neighbouring alehouse; and it is merely ratione loci, because the vestry-room stands within the precincts of the churchyard, that it becomes an offence at all of which this Court has cognisance. The case, therefore, is of as slight an ecclesiastical cha-[177]-racter as can well be imagined, for, as an assault on the individual, this Court has nothing to do with it.

What are, secondly, the character and spirit of the whole proceeding? Offensive conduct on the part of the defendant; and, on the part of the promoter, a feeling not so much of the outrage done to the sanctity of the place, as of the insult offered to himself. By the promoter's own witnesses the defendant is described as a gentleman-like, a moral, and a quiet man, though, by his irritability, he has been surprised into a violation of the law. On the other hand the smiting is laid in a very inflamed manner; while as to the brawling, the promoter's own witnesses prove him equally to have been a brawler; and though the Court cannot punish that brawling under the shape in which it now comes out, yet when such a promoter asks for his costs, his own conduct necessarily forms part of the consideration. His original motive in commencing this suit is shewn by his exclamation, "I'll trounce you for this:" he has exaggerated the defendant's misconduct, and has suppressed his own: whereas, for the reasons assigned on a former day, all the circumstances ought to have been candidly stated in the first instance. On the whole, then, neither is the ecclesiastical character of the case, nor the character and spirit of the proceedings such as to demand a severe measure of punishment, nor to give the promoter a strong claim to costs.

The Court, therefore, would have been well pleased if, after what had passed on a former day, neither party had moved in this cause; for in that case it would have been dismissed [178] as a matter of course; but I am compelled to proceed: and, looking at all the circumstances of the case, I pronounce the brawling and smiting to have been both proved: and—since the law as to the former leaves the punishment to the discretion of the Court, but as to the latter is imperative, though the subsequent statute in commutation of excommunication empowers the Court to regulate the time of imprisonment—I shall, for the brawling, suspend the defendant ab ingressu ecclesiæ for one week, and, for the smiting, decree an imprisonment of twenty-four hours (see 53 Geo. 3, c. 127): and, further, considering the extreme length of the interrogatories, and that, after both parties had referred the matter to the decision of their leading counsel, the defendant refused to abide by the arrangement entered into for him, I shall condemn him in costs.

THE OFFICE OF THE JUDGE PROMOTED BY FIELD v. COSENS. Arches Court, Easter Term, 4th Session, 1830.—A defendant, on giving an affirmative issue, suspended ab ingressu ecclesiæ for a month, and condemned in costs for brawling on two occasions at a vestry held in the chancel.

[Followed, Combe v. Edwards, 1878, 3 P. D. 132.]

This cause came by letters of request from the official principal of the Episcopal and Consistorial Court of Chichester, and was promoted by the churchwarden against the defendant for brawling and creating a disturbance in the parish church.

The third article objected, "that at a vestry meeting held on the 31st of December, 1829, in the chancel, for the purpose of making a rate [179] for the relief of the poor, Cosens did by mere noise and clamour, and without any just cause, interrupt the business of the vestry and most grossly abuse F., and utter several profane oaths, and called him a damned infernal rogue, and that he always was a rogue and a rascal, and several times damned him for a rogue."

4th. That on the 11th of March, 1830 (in a meeting of vestry as before), Cosens did again repeatedly by mere clamour, &c. interrupt, and, speaking to and of Field, say "that he was a rogue; and that H., one of the overseers, was another rogue; and that F. and H. were the largest rogues in the parish, and that, speaking of their signatures to the said rate, did assert, 'there are the names of two rogues.'"

An affirmative issue having been given to the articles, the Court suspended Cosens ab ingressu ecclesiæ for one month, admonished him, and condemned him in costs.

TAYLOR v. MORSE. Arches Court, Trinity Term, By-Day, 1830.—A respondent may be admitted as a pauper in the Court of Appeal; and the Court looks at his faculties at the time of his application, not at what he may have been possessed of at a former time.

On appeal.

This was a cause of inventory, appraisement, and account, and was promoted originally in the Consistorial Episcopal Court of Wells by Joseph Taylor (asserting himself to be a creditor of James Morse, deceased) against Charles Morse, the brother and administrator of his effects. Taylor's interest being denied, he pro-[180]-pounded it in an allegation, and examined one witness in support of it: and the præsertim of the appeal was that the Judge, "on the 25th of February, 1829, pronounced that Taylor's allegation of interest was not proved, and dismissed Morse, and condemned Taylor in costs."

Upon the prosecution of the appeal the respondent, Morse, was put into Bristol gaol under a writ de contumace capiendo for not appearing to the inhibition and citation which had issued from this Court: but having since made oath that he would obey, in future, the lawful commands of the Court, and upon an affidavit sworn upon a commission that he was not worth 5l. after payment of his just debts, he applied to sue as a pauper: this was objected to by the appellant: and the present question, in respect to that application, came on upon act on petition and affidavits.

On behalf of Taylor it was in substance alleged that "after the death of James Morse, his brother Charles, in October, 1827, administered; and took possession of the deceased's effects, of the value of 170l., and of his other property of the annual value of 32l.: that he had sold the property and premises, or if any part were not sold, he now receives the profits and applies them to his own use; and had not paid the deceased's debts, nor made any distribution; that he has other property of his own, and earns a weekly income as a shoemaker."

In reply. "That upon the death of Charles Morse proceedings were for some time depending, in the Consistory Court of Bath and Wells, between the respondent and the asserted [181] relict who claimed administration; that she took possession of property of the deceased of the value of 350l. and upwards, and sold part to the amount of 100l.; that she is dead, and great part of such property is in possession of the appellant, who claims it as the residuary legatee in her will; that the respondent, as administrator, sold property to the amount of 106l. 16s., and that, as to an unfinished house, the fee-simple of which was claimed by different persons, he, to avoid a suit, delivered it up to the lord of the manor for 50l., of which sum 25l. was paid to the deceased's heiress at law, as a compensation for her interest, and that he had also delivered up the deceased's cottage and orchard for 20l., he not knowing what estate or interest the deceased had therein, the whole of the title deeds having been retained by his asserted widow, or Taylor; that the deceased's freehold was taken possession of by his heiress at law; that he was possessed of four acres of land (held on a life of 72), let for 7l. 10s. per annum; and also of another piece of land (not quite two acres) held on life, and let for 3l. per annum; but that he had only received 5l. for rent. That the respondent has been involved in various causes as administrator of the estate; and is now indebted to the Rev. Mr. Hare in 80l., for money advanced to him for defraying the expences of such suits; that he owes a large balance to Samuel Pratt, his proctor at Wells, and to Henry Smith, his attorney at Bristol, upwards of 100l. for law expences; and to other persons several small sums; that he is insolvent and a pauper; that, upon his contempt being signified, he was imprisoned until his fees [182] were paid for him; that he is 72 years of age, has a wife and five children; and by his business has not earned for many weeks, and does not now earn, more than four shillings a week; that he and his family are unable to support themselves, and receive charitable assistance; that part of his wearing apparel is now in pawn for 8l.; and that all his furniture and goods, including a few tools, are not worth 5l."

Lushington in objection to the application. Morse is in possession of land worth ten guineas per annum: this income, notwithstanding his debts, is alone quite sufficient to disqualify him as a pauper. His own affidavit does not negative the material facts, and that of the solicitor only enters into particulars not bearing on the present question.

The King's advocate contrà. The appeal has been occasioned by the irregular course adopted by Taylor in the Court below: he exhibited no affidavit of debt, and failed to establish his claim as a creditor. In regard to the income said to accrue to the respondent from land, I admit there is no specific denial on that point: but that arises from there being no averment of it, on the part of the appellant, in the act on petition. The facts are such as amply entitle the respondent to proceed in formâ pauperis.

Per Curiam [after stating the proceedings in the Court [183] below and in this Court]. This is an application to be admitted a pauper, and it is objected to by the appellant. Affidavits are exhibited that the party applicant is a pauper and insolvent; that he has no means of livelihood, except four shillings a week, which he earns by his trade as a shoemaker; and that he has a wife and children: while on the other side it is alleged that he got possession of "some property on the death of his brother in October, 1827, and has converted it to his own use:" but it does not follow that he has property at present. Morse's affidavit specifically sets forth his debts; and there is the fact that he was imprisoned for nine months, and at length got his contumacy fees paid for him: he is also the respondent; he has the sentence in his favour, and this very materially distinguishes his case from that of a person who attempts to appeal in formâ pauperis. On the whole I think he is entitled to be admitted a pauper.(a)[1]

[184] LILLIE v. LILLIE. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 1st Session, 1829. —The law presumes, primâ facie, 1st, that if a paper (a will) be left at a party's house, it comes into his possession: 2dly, that if it be thus traced into his possession, and be not forthcoming at his death, he destroyed it. A draft will being propounded under these circumstances, the Court pronounced the deceased was, as far as appeared, dead intestate, and condemned the party setting up the paper in costs.

This was a cause of proving, in solemn form of law, a draft of the will of Charles Edward Lillie, deceased: the will was alleged to have been destroyed without his privity or consent. The draft was propounded by the mother of the deceased, and opposed by his widow.

Lushington and Nicholl in support of the draft.

Dodson and Addams for an intestacy.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The instrument set up in this case is a draft of the will of Charles Edward Lillie: the will itself being alleged to have been destroyed without his privity or consent. The fact that the deceased executed such a will is proved; but, as it is not forthcoming, the party setting it up must satisfy the Court (a)[2] that it was not [185] destroyed animo revocandi by the deceased; as, for instance, by shewing that he had no opportunity of so doing,(a)[3] or that it had been lost or destroyed without his privity or consent.

The deceased died on the 28th of October, 1828, leaving a widow, a mother, a brother, and a sister. Not only was his marriage with Anna Goldsmith (which took place on the 5th of September, 1827) disapproved of by his mother and family, but they objected, on account of his circumstances, to his marrying at all. Soon afterwards he had a violent attack of illness, and in October sent for his friend Mr. Whitmore, a stockbroker, to whom he gave instructions for his will. Whitmore employed his own solicitor: the will was duly executed, and was deposited by Whitmore at his banker's. Whit-[186]-more and two other friends were appointed trustees and executors.

This will was not favorable to his wife, and it was executed without her privity

---

(a)[1] In Bland v. Lamb, 2 J. & W. 402, a pauper was admitted to appeal: but the case of Taylor v. Bouchier, 2 Dick. 504, was cited contrà. It appears, however, from the report of that case, Bro. P. C. 709-715, that Taylor and his wife, on the 20th of October, 1758, filed their bill in Chancery as paupers. Bouchier appealed from an order of the Master of the Rolls on the 11th of March, 1774, and from a decree of the Lord Chancellor on the 21st of July, 1775. The respondent, therefore, was the pauper; and if what is reported in Dickens passed, it was a mere dictum—not the point decided.

(a)[2] Not by evidence amounting to positive certainty, but only such as reasonably produces moral conviction. Davis v. Davis, 2 Add. 226. Colvin v. Fraser, 2 Hagg. Ecc. 325. For the acts, declarations, conduct, and affections of the deceased may raise such an extremely strong improbability, almost amounting to an impossibility, of his having himself destroyed the will, animo revocandi, as to rebut the primâ facie legal presumption, and to compel the Court to conclude that the deceased, at the time of his death, believed the will was in existence, and would act upon his property; and consequently that its non-appearance was the result of some cause other than the wish and intention of the deceased. This was the principle of the decision in James v. James (an amicable suit), Prerog. Hilary Term, 1829, wherein an executed fair copy was pronounced for; the will itself, though it was known to have been in the deceased's possession, not being found on his death. The facts, proving adherence to the last moment of his life, were quite irresistible.

(a)[3] Thus, if the will is traced out of the deceased's possession and custody, it rests with the other party either to shew by the same sort of evidence that it came again into his possession or custody, or that it was destroyed by his directions, or with his privity and consent. Colvin v. Fraser, 2 Hagg. Ecc. 327.

or knowledge of its contents. His property consisted of a freehold house and of about 3500l. personalty. The house was devised to the mother for life, and then to the brother: he gives to his mother an annuity of 100l., and to his wife the interest of the residue, and that only during her widowhood. Now this interest at 4 per cent. would not exceed 40l. a year. He also gave her some contingent interest after the death of his mother.

The reason suggested for this disposition was that she brought him only 500l. as her fortune; that this was too slight a portion; that her father ought, and was fully competent, to provide for her; and therefore, though at the altar the deceased had endowed her with all his worldly goods, he intended to throw the onus of her maintenance on her own father. But as a professional man he must have known that, having accepted the portion given with his wife, he was bound to support her. If any credit be due to the deceased's declarations, he believed his mother and brother had used means to give him, while on the bed of sickness, unfavorable impressions of his wife; and there are circumstances which tend to confirm the sincerity of his belief, whatever foundation it might have had in reality. Taking, however, the simple fact that the will, made only two months after marriage, when he was dangerously ill, was so adverse to his wife, is it highly improbable that he should revoke it?

[187] That the wife shewed him great attention during his first illness is not denied, and the subsequent history of his own conduct proves that he became greatly attached to her. He went with her to reside at Tottenham: he went with her on tours; he resided for some time with her at her father's house, but they never went to reside with his mother. His ill state of health continuing, his wife was a constant and vigilant nurse, and his great anxiety was lest by her attention to him she should injure her own health. Looking, then, at this history, nothing could be more improbable than that he should suffer this will to stand.

In addition to this conduct there are various confidential conversations and declarations that he would revoke it; but it is said that he did not intend to die intestate; and it is true that he might propose to make another will. There is, however, a declaration "that the law would make his will in a manner that would be quite satisfactory to him." What would that be? His brother would take the small freehold; his widow would take a moiety; and the other half would be divided between his mother, brother, and sister: and the deceased himself, being a solicitor, must have been aware that the law would thus dispose of his property. An intestacy, therefore, in this case is not improbable: and is quite consistent with a continuance of affection for his mother, brother, and sister, though not with its continuance to the same extent, and to that exclusive degree, as when he made this will. The probability, then, is that he would revoke and destroy this will.

On the other hand, what evidence is there to [188] shew the impossibility of such destruction by himself? None. It should at least be shewn that no opportunity for it occurred: but the evidence bears all in an opposite direction. It appears from the deposition of Mr. Whitmore (against which and against whose credit and character there is not the slightest imputation) that though, as the deceased's confidential friend, he had been employed in preparing the will while the deceased was ill, he did not agree in or approve of the disposition; and therefore when the deceased recovered from the violence of the attack, Whitmore fetched the will, together with a codicil, from his banker's, and inclosed them, and the solicitor's bill for preparing the will, in an envelope, and called at the deceased's house to deliver the packet to him. The deceased being at dinner, or lying down, Whitmore left the papers at the house, either with the female servant or with the clerk, but with which of the two he does not recollect; nor has the servant nor the clerk (both of whom were in the habit of receiving parcels and messages) an exact recollection of Whitmore's leaving this particular parcel: but there is no reason to doubt the accuracy of that gentleman's evidence; and then the presumption from the will being left at the house is that it came into the deceased's possession. Here, therefore, the paper is traced back to the possession of the deceased, under circumstances which raise a strong probability that he would destroy it.

That the deceased himself did destroy it there is no direct legal evidence: but the widow, in her affidavit of scripts, swears that the will was delivered to, and that it was then torn and burnt [189] by, the deceased. She did not even know the contents; but only the fact that it was burnt, and this is no after-thought, for she mentioned the circumstance in the deceased's life-time. She has therefore purged herself by her oath that it was not she, but the deceased himself, who destroyed these papers.

Looking, then, to all the circumstances—to the contents of the will itself, to the time and circumstances under which it was made, to the subsequent conduct of the deceased, to his very great affection for his wife, to his various declarations, to the positive evidence of Whitmore that he had carried back the will together with the solicitor's bill, and—to what I have hitherto omitted to mention—the admitted fact that the deceased himself called to pay the bill, and though he had not the bill with him, yet that he knew the amount—I am of opinion, not only that there is no proof that the will was destroyed without the deceased's privity, but I am morally convinced that it was destroyed by the deceased himself: it is not necessary to prove that; for the fact that the will was left at the deceased's house is, as I have said, sufficient presumptive proof that it came into his possession; and it is not attempted to be denied that, if traced into his possession, the law primâ facie presumes that he destroyed it; (a) and, in this [190] case, that presumption is strengthened by the parol evidence of his declarations and of his increased attachment for his wife.

(a) Prerogative, September 11, 1723.—In the case of Pinhallow v. Robinson, administration of Pinhallow, as dying intestate, was granted to his nephew, Robinson: he was called by Pinhallow to shew cause why it should not be revoked, who offered an allegation propounding the draft of a will; that the deceased gave instructions to Mills, which were written over and executed by him; that soon after the execution of the will he went into Cornwall, and there declared, on the Thursday before he died, that he had made his will, and that it was at London; that he had made his kinsman, Pinhallow, his executor, and that "he will be the squire now;" * that since his death the will could not be found.

Per Curiam (Dr. Bettesworth). If the will had been found cancelled, it might depend on circumstances how it came in that state; and, if any declarations near the time of the testator's death, it might be presumed to have been done by the person prejudiced by it. It will lie on the other side to shew that the deceased departed from his intentions, in order to lead the presumption that he cancelled it.

Allegation admitted.

The instructions and execution were proved, but it did not appear how the will was lost, and that the deceased was privy to Mills having preserved the draft. The original will, which had been left with Mills, the writer, was taken out of his hands by Pinhallow, when he was going into the country; but there was no account of it afterwards. The declarations of the deceased relating to his will were not uniform—some, that he had no will.

Trinity Term, 4th Session, 1724.—Per Curiam. The question in law is whether it is necessary that the will should have been seen after his death, and whether the law presumes, if there be no account of a departure from his intention, that it has been lost by misfortune. If it does not appear, it must be supposed to have been destroyed by the deceased himself, unless there were stronger presumptions on the other side.

Pronounced to die intestate.

The presumption in the case of cancellation was thus held in the following case, similar in some respects to Colvin v. Fraser (2 Hagg. Ecc. 325).

Boughey v. Sir William Moreton, Prerogative, June 16, 1758.

Lady Moreton, in pursuance of power on marriage, executed two duplicates of will; one she kept, and the other was left in the hands of an executor. Soon after her death, that in her custody was found cancelled, in a trunk, with other papers, her seal, name, and entire attestation of witnesses torn or cut off. Sir William swore he believed she cancelled it herself, it being found, upon the search, in the state it now is, which was the first time he ever saw it. This cancelled and uncancelled duplicate being brought in, the matter was brought before the Court to determine whether probate should be granted to Boughey of the uncancelled duplicate, or administration should be granted to Sir William as husband.

The Court was of opinion that a cancellation of one duplicate was in law a cancella-

---

* The real estate was likewise devised to him by the will; but he was neither his heir at law nor next of kin.

The only difficulty is to find out some fair grounds to justify the mother in setting up such a case. All the facts were fairly communicated to her, and to her friends and advisers. There was no appearance of mystery nor of concealment. The executors were satisfied that the [191] will had no existence either in fact or in law; nay, there was the widow's affidavit directly stating that the deceased had burnt it. In opposition to this, the mother chose to set up a case of spoliation against some persons. It is true that no person is directly fixed upon against whom the charge of spoliation is made: but on whom must the imputation attach? Though, however, she does not directly charge spoliation, she, at all [192] events, by necessary implication imputes to the widow perjury in her affidavit of scripts and answers, wherein she swears "that she saw the deceased burn a paper, saying, 'he wished he had never made it;' and that while it was burning she read the words 'This is the last will and testament.'" The engrossed copy, which is before the Court, has the words "Last will and testament," in a large text hand, and [193] thus strengthens the widow's affidavit. The mother, brother, and sister are entitled to one-half of the personalty, and I think it more just that the expences incurred in this suit should fall upon the mother, the party in this cause, than that any part of the costs should fall upon the widow in diminution of her share of the effects.

I therefore pronounce against the instruments propounded; that, as far as appears, the deceased is dead intestate; and I condemn Mrs. Christiana Lillie, the mother, in costs.

AITKIN v. FORD. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, By-Day, 1829.—Administration, as to a creditor, decreed to the mother of an intestate, advanced by her; the father, though alive, having been divorced à vinculo matrimonii and married again.—The Court, before granting administration to a creditor, requires an affidavit (inter alia) that he has no other security; and if the person first entitled to the grant is abroad, and the service of the decree is on the Royal Exchange, that such person has no agent in this country.

---

tion of both; and that as the cancelled duplicate was found in her custody, and it did not appear that any other person had access to it, it must be presumed the deceased cancelled it herself: therefore refused to grant probate to Boughey, as prayed, upon the evidence now before the Court, but gave time to the next Court to determine whether he would propound the uncancelled duplicate or would undertake to prove, either that the other part was cancelled by some other person; or, if by deceased, that she did it inadvertently or accidentally, and not animo cancellandi; otherwise the Court decreed administration to her, as dying intestate, to be granted to Sir William as husband.

So, in the case of Hare v. Nasmyth, before the House of Lords, Lord Chancellor Eldon said: "According to all principle, if a paper, cancelled, and the seal cut off, or the name erased, is found in a fast-locked place of the testator, the primâ facie inference from that is, not that the testator meant it should continue to be his will, but that the testator was the person that did that act himself, which is found to be evidenced by the state of the paper found in his fast-locked closet." Vide 1 Shaw, 73, S. C. 2 Add. 25, n.

Again: "I am satisfied that the seal was taken away by excision; and it appears to me also that this excision is primâ facie to be taken to be an excision by his own act; and that, according to the principles which you apply to cases of this sort, the circumstance that it was found in his own custody, and in a place of security, and with this excision, is to be taken as evidence that it was his own act." Ibid. 77.

But it is believed that the presumption, when a testamentary paper is not forthcoming on the death of a party, and no evidence be given of its destruction by the deceased, or by any other person, has never been ascertained by a judicial decision in the courts of Westminster Hall; however, it seems probable that those Courts would be guided by the principle acted upon in the Ecclesiastical Courts; for in Moggridge v. Thackwell, 7 Ves. 79, Lord Chancellor Eldon thus expressed himself: "Lord Thurlow, referring to the case of The Attorney General v. Siderfin, does not take notice of the circumstance that though there had been an appointment, it might have been revoked; and the non-existence of it was primâ facie evidence of that fact that it was revoked."

On motion.

Gostling moved for letters of administration on an affidavit, the substance of which is as follows:—Catherine Aitkin of Weymouth, single woman, made oath: That Charles Ford, late of Trinidad, a lieutenant in H.M. First Regiment of Foot, died on the 1st of April, 1829, a bachelor and intestate, leaving James Ford, his natural and lawful father, now residing in the United States of North America; that the deponent in 1804 was duly married to James Ford in Scotland; that in October, 1817, she separated herself from him in consequence of discovering his adultery, and in 1820 obtained a decree of [194] divorce in the Commissary Court of Scotland; which decree was affirmed by the House of Lords; and that James Ford had since married the woman with whom he had been living in adultery: that the deponent, during the time of her marriage, had, by James Ford, her husband, ten children, of which the deceased was one; that from the time of quitting her husband in 1817 she had entirely maintained and educated her children from her own separate property; that in the purchase of two commissions in the army for the deceased, and in fitting him out, she had expended upon him 900l.; that the same was now justly owing to her from the deceased's estate; and that the only property thereto belonging in this country was about 120l. due from the War Office.

Per Curiam. The decree, citing James Ford, has only been served by affixing it to the Royal Exchange: and the affidavit does not state that he has no agent in this country; nor that the party applying for the administration has no other security for the money with which she purchased the deceased's commissions: it is therefore deficient in these particulars: but when such defects are supplied, the administration may pass to Catherine Aitkin.(a) [195] IN THE GOODS OF MARY POWELL. Prerogative Court, Michaelmas Term, 4th Session, 1829.—The Prerogative Court granted an administration, limited to assign a term in the diocese of A., the will of the deceased (who had no goods out of the diocese of B., except this satisfied term) having been proved in the Court of B., and the chain of executors being subsequently unbroken.—Semble, that a diocesan probate can give no authority, nor continue any privity, as to a satisfied term in another diocese.

On motion.

William Powell by his will appointed his wife, Mary Powell, sole executrix and residuary legatee: and in 1775 she proved his will in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury.

Mary Powell by her will appointed her son, her daughter, and John Pocock executors: and in 1784 they proved her will in the Episcopal Court of Gloucester. John Pocock survived his co-executors, and died in March, 1819: and his will was proved by his wife, Jane Pocock, the sole executrix, in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury. She also made her will, and appointed Ann Watts and Reynold Gunter her executors, who in 1820 proved in the same Court.

In 1761, by indenture of mortgage, certain premises in the county of Somerset were assigned to Robert Powell, to be held to him, his executors, &c. for the remainder of the term of [196] 1000 years, with the usual proviso of redemption. By an indenture of 1st January, 1828, reciting that the claims of Robert Powell were satisfied,

---

(a) The Court, before granting administration to a creditor, requires an affidavit of the amount of the effects, and of the debt, and that the creditor has no other security. Justifying security is called for at the Court's discretion, according to the circumstances of each case, save that there is one general rule, that in all cases where there is not a personal service of the decree on the party or parties having a prior claim to the grant, justifying securities are required; and if the party first entitled is abroad, the decree must be served on the Royal Exchange and on his agent, or an affidavit must be made that he has no agent in this country.

When the property is large, and exceeds to a considerable extent the amount of the interest of the party applying for the grant, the Court—even when the party first entitled to the grant is abroad—sometimes requires to be satisfied that he has had notice of the intention to apply for such a grant, and frequently directs the matter to stand over till sufficient time has elapsed since the service of the decree, for an appearance to be given.

but that there had been no assignment of the term to the owners of the freehold, it was witnessed that Watts and Gunter, executors of Jane Pocock, and, as such, the representatives of Robert Powell, had sold and assigned the premises to John Hooper and others: that assignment, however, was considered insufficient, inasmuch as the term assigned was not within the diocese of Gloucester, in which diocese Mrs. Powell's will was proved, and within which were all her effects, except the term stated to have been satisfied; and accordingly an administration, limited to the assignment of this term, was granted to the nominee of Hooper and others: but the purchasers still objected, on the ground that the term, whether satisfied or not, vested in Mary Powell as executrix of Robert, and they required that she should be represented by a grant from this Court to Watts and Gunter, the executors of Jane Pocock.

Lushington, under these circumstances, moved for a limited administration to Mary Powell to be granted to Watts and Gunter for the purpose of assigning this term.

Per Curiam. The property to be assigned is in Somersetshire: a probate therefore in the diocese of Gloucester cannot give any authority in respect to it. I have no difficulty in granting an administration limited to assign the term.(a)

Motion granted.

[197] CROSLEY v. THE ARCHDEACON OF SUDBURY AND OTHERS. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 4th Session, 1815.—The Court will not enforce a monition to transmit the original will proved in an inferior jurisdiction, where the deceased died, but will grant a limited administration to assign a satisfied term situate in another diocese.—Generally speaking, all ecclesiastical jurisdictions are limited in their authority to property locally situate within their district.

On petition.

This question respected the enforcement of a monition served upon the registrar of the Court of the Archdeacon of Sudbury to transmit to this Court an original will; and the grant of letters of administration (with the said will annexed) under certain limitations.

The registrar of the archdeaconry appeared under protest, denying the jurisdiction, and, in substance, alleging "that Thomas Underwood, the deceased, did not leave bona notabilia; that, save the residue of a term of 1000 years in certain premises in Essex, of which he was a mere trustee, and where no money was due, and which was of no pecuniary value, all the rest of his property was in the archdeaconry of Sudbury, where his will was proved by his executor in 1786; that the residue of the term of years was, at his death, a satisfied term, which had been assigned to the deceased merely to attend and protect the inheritance against mean incumbrances, and was of no value as part of the deceased's property, could not be converted to profit, and therefore not bona notabilia:" and prayed to be dismissed.

To this petition it was answered: "That by deed in 1771 between N. of the first part, R. of the second, and Underwood of the third, the premises were sold to Underwood, his executors, administrators, and assigns, during the remainder of 1000 years, then unexpired, in trust as there set forth; that Underwood died without [198] having assigned such interest—made a will—that probate was taken in the Sudbury Court, where the will remained; that the executor was dead and there was now no legal representative; that by sufficient conveyances William Taylor and James Hales were become entitled to the freehold and inheritance of the premises in question, and of the remainder of the term, but they could not make a legal title without a legal assignment of the remainder of the term by the representative of Underwood; that the premises being so situate in Essex, and the legal interest being in the deceased, who had goods, as admitted, in the jurisdiction of the Court of Sudbury, they together formed bona notabilia so as to give jurisdiction to the Prerogative Court; that the term could not legally be assigned under any probate or administration from the Court of Sudbury, nor by any representation except from the Prerogative Court: that in December, 1813, Crosley, as nominee of Taylor and Hales, prayed a monition to transmit the original will which has been duly executed; and now petitions that the protest be overruled and monition enforced."

Jenner and Lushington in support of the protest. To prove a satisfied term forms bona notabilia, it must be proved that it is of some value; but, whatever may be the value of such trusts, it belongs to the freehold; they are of no pecuniary value: here the legal interest is in the trustee, but the beneficial interest in the cestui que trust. Maundrel v. Maundrel (7 Ves. 567), Villars v. Villars (2 Atkins, 72). The trustee could neither sell [199] nor dispose of it. If the term should be considered as forming bona notabilia, it would be attended with great inconvenience—the will must be transmitted, and the probate, hitherto acted upon, would be void.

(a) See the case of Fowler v. Richards, 5 Russ. 39.

Swabey and W. Adams contrà.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The question assumes a very awkward shape from the appearance in this case not being given by the party, but by the Judge of another jurisdiction asserting his own right in opposition to the right of this Court: it is awkward for this Court to have to decide on its own jurisdiction; but as this is cast upon it, the Court must endeavour to discharge the duty. I must first observe that jurisdictions are not established for the benefit of those who exercise them, but of the public who have occasion to resort to them. The emoluments of the Judges and registrars and others connected with them are a very secondary consideration: the primary consideration is the convenient administration of justice to the public.

The metropolitan has, under certain circumstances, the right to grant a prerogative probate for this purpose; that where the property lies in different jurisdictions parties interested may be saved the expence and inconvenience of resorting to more authorities than one. Now (except under very special circumstances),(a) [200] all jurisdictions are limited in their authority to property locally situate within their limits. The archbishop to his province—the bishop to his diocese—the archdeacon to his archdeaconry. Here the property is not locally situate within the archdeaconry of Sudbury, the jurisdiction where the party died, but in another jurisdiction and diocese.

There is an absolute necessity that acts should be done in respect to this property in which the rights of parties are interested, and which acts can only be done by the legal representative of the deceased quoad this property: it is quite clear that the Archdeacon of Sudbury cannot grant a representation sufficient for this purpose, because the property (whatever be its value, or if of no value) is not locally situate within his jurisdiction. It seems equally clear also to me that the ordinary of the place, where the property is locally situate, cannot grant a representation because the deceased has left other property, above 5l. in value, in another jurisdiction—Sudbury. What then is to be done? Are the rights of the parties to be lost, and is no legal title to be made to this property? That cannot be. What other jurisdiction has authority but the archbishop's to supply this deficiency? The representation then being necessary, and no other jurisdiction com-[201]-petent to grant it, I think, ex necessitate, that this Court, without inquiry as to the value, has not only jurisdiction, but is bound to exercise it: the grant, however, must be limited, and strictly limited, to the purposes prayed.

The next question then is, as to the mode of making the grant: and whether any and what arrangement can be made in that respect?

It is said that the property is of no value; but the legal property was in the deceased, and his act, if living, would be necessary to make a title: and though, as a trustee, a Court of Equity would compel him to do such act, yet in law he is the proprietor. Still I should be sorry to hold that these naked trusts in all cases create bona notabilia, which would make the grants of other jurisdictions null and void; and it might be an inconvenience to the parties beneficially interested in the property to be obliged to take a prerogative probate, when a local jurisdiction might otherwise be competent; yet I suppose no conveyancer would be satisfied with a conveyance of property situate in one jurisdiction under an administration granted by the authority of another jurisdiction; for manifestly it would not be any conveyance, because the

(a) It appears, however, from the case of The King v. Yonge, D.D., 5 Maule & Selwyn, 119, that the Archdeacon of Sudbury has, by composition with the bishop of the diocese, jurisdiction, with certain exceptions, over the effects of all persons dying within the archdeaconry, wherever such effects may be locally situate within the diocese. Of course the bishop could only delegate such authority as he himself possessed, and therefore no grant from him could extend the right beyond the diocese; but within the diocese he has delegated to the archdeacon his own authority, limited not by the locality of the effects, but only by the locality of the death.

Archdeacon of Sudbury could not make any person legal representative quoad hoc—to make a valid title to premises in another jurisdiction. However, as an administration, limited to this particular purpose, is only prayed—not a general administration—the former grant will not be revoked, nor the other property of the deceased, nor his representatives, be thereby disturbed. I do not therefore see any substantial advantage in having the will transmitted.

[202] The administration might as well be granted on an office copy, except that it has been the usual practice to have the original transmitted: but I am inclined to grant this administration without ordering the will to be sent up; and thus the probate will not be rendered void. A practice prevailed, I understand, for two years, of granting such administrations without the will—or even a copy of it—why it was discontinued I do not know: but in the present instance I shall not enforce the monition for the transmission of the original will; and will reserve the consideration how the administration shall issue.

Note.—The administration, without any copy of the will annexed, limited to assign this term and sworn under 100l., afterwards passed the seal.

TAYLOR v. D'EGVILLE AND BEBB. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, 1st Session, 1830.—Probate (as of a codicil) refused to a paper as not testamentary, though found in the same envelope as the will and a codicil, and explanatory to the executors of the nature and value of, and most advantageous mode of managing, the deceased's property, but having no dispositive nor revocative effect.

On admission of an allegation.

William Taylor in and by his last will and testament appointed James D'Egville and Joseph Bebb two of his executors; and on the 8th of June, 1825, they took probate of the same together with a codicil. A decree having issued at the instance of George Taylor, the natural and lawful brother (and as such one of the persons claiming the residue of the deceased's undisposed of personal estate), against the executors, they brought in a certain paper referred to in the decree, and alleged to be a se-[203]-cond codicil to the deceased's will; but they declared that they would not take probate of it.(a)

(a) The contents of the testamentary papers, as far as they affect the question before the Court, are here subjoined:

"This is my last will and testament, written with my own hand, this fifteenth day of February, 1823. I hereby will and bequeath all the monies that may come to me from the funds now in Chancery, arising from the sale of the Opera House in the Haymarket, for the purpose of paying all my just debts; and the surplus to be divided equally between the children of my brother, Captain George Taylor. I also will and bequeath all my interest in the property boxes in the said Opera House [the testator then enumerated certain boxes] to Ann Dunn: and my will and request is, that the executors to this my last will shall let all the afore-described boxes for the said two years or opera seasons at the best rents, and out of the said rents to set apart, for the use and benefit of Ann Dunn, the sum of six thousand pounds." The testator, after suggesting certain modes of investment for this sum, directs "that Ann Dunn shall not have the power to assign or alienate any part of the 6000l. or of the income to arise therefrom during her lifetime, but that she shall have the power of bequeathing 3000l. thereof by will, and the remainder of the 6000l. is, upon her demise, to be equally divided between the children of my said brother, George Taylor." Then, after some small legacies, the testator appoints executors, and dates and signs the instrument.

By a codicil, subjoined to the will, he directs that "if by the assignment, during his lifetime, of the before-mentioned property boxes, the rents thereof shall not produce 6000l., his executors shall make up the deficiency out of the rents of certain other property boxes, and divide the residue of the last rents of the said enumerated boxes, for the year 1825, equally amongst his said brother's children. Witness my hand again, this 15th day of February, 1823. "WM. TAYLOR."

There was no disposition of any surplus beyond the 6000l. that might arise from the rents of the first-mentioned boxes.

The paper propounded as a second codicil was headed—

"Memorandum. London, 15th day of Feb. 1823.

"In reference to my last will and testament (of this date) I beg leave to observe, [204] An allegation in support of the paper was given in on behalf of Taylor, the admissibility of which was now debated.

The substance of the allegation was as follows:—That the testator having a mind and intention to give further directions to his executors as to the administration, distribution, and management of his property, and more particularly as to the provision he had made for Ann Dunn, spinster; wrote the second codicil (pleaded and exhibited) and placed it in the same envelope in which the will and first codicil were enclosed, and deposited it with his other papers of moment and concern; and that by the letters "Mrs. D." was meant Ann Dunn named in the will. The handwriting, finding, and identity of the paper were also pleaded.

Addams in objection to its admission. The paper is in no part of it testamentary: it is a mere calculation, and begins thus, "Memorandum." Whether the date refers to the day on which the paper was written or to the date of the will may be doubted. No sentence in it is expressed in imperative terms. The [205] will is formal; and there is a codicil written on the same paper. If the residue is undisposed of by the will and codicil, there is certainly a disposition of the surplus rents for 1825.

Per Curiam. Can the Court receive this paper unless testamentary? What part is relied upon to make it codicillary?

Lushington in support of the allegation. A suit in Chancery is now depending as to the person entitled to the residue of the deceased's estate: the executors claim a large portion of the property as undisposed of, and the legatees and next of kin have filed a bill to ascertain the point, and they are advised that the paper, now propounded, will assist in shewing that the deceased intended his executors to be trustees only, and not legatees.(a) That this paper is testamentary and codicillary appears from these passages—"by way of instructions to my executors"—"It will therefore be advisable to try to make a bargain." The will seems to have been written by the deceased without assistance: the first codicil has no formal com-[206]-mencement; and the second codicil must, primâ facie, be considered as written on the day it bears date—the same date as the will and first codicil. I admit that the testator may not have anticipated the probate of this paper, but the Court will consider it as testamentary if it purports to affect the disposition of the testator's property even under the directions of the Court of Chancery.

Per Curiam. Suppose the testator had omitted in this calculation some of those boxes which he has bequeathed by his will and codicil, would such omission be revocatory?

Lushington. I do not contend that. But the paper is operative as explanatory: it is clear that by it the testator proposed to point out to his executors how the greatest benefit would accrue to third parties from his property. If the paper is excluded from probate, it will deprive the next of kin from making out their case against the executor. The paper was found in the same envelope with the will.

Per Curiam. This paper does not appear to me to be at all testamentary: it is merely explanatory to the executors of the nature and supposed value of the deceased's property, and of the most advantageous mode of managing it. The paper has no dispositive nor revocatory effect. If the paper is not testamentary, the parties by way of instructions to my executors, that for 1824, I have bequeathed the centre box in the pit," &c. [the paper then proceeded to enumerate certain boxes, estimating his interest in them to be worth 8150l.] "to secure the 6000l. bequeathed to Mrs. D.," and after stating his tenure, interest, and some considerations which would influence their value, pointed out that the boxes might be more advantageously disposed of to Mr. Ebers than to any other person; as in these terms: "It will therefore be advisable to try to make a bargain at an early period with Mr. Ebers." But there were no further words declaring for whose advantage these arrangements were to be made.

---

(a) The 1 William 4, c. 40, entitled "An Act for making better provision for the disposal of the undisposed-of residues of the effects of testators," provides, that "after the 1st of September, 1830, executors are to be deemed, by Courts of Equity, trustees for persons entitled to any residue under the statute of distributions, unless it appears by the will that such executors were intended to take such residue beneficially"—sect. 1. The Act is not to affect the rights of executors where there is not any person entitled to the residue under the statute of distributions; nor is the Act to extend to Scotland.

(especially when five years have been suffered to elapse since the testator's death) ought not to be put to the expence of a new probate. I must reject the allegation.

[207] BRAGGE v. DYER AND OTHERS. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, 1st Session, 1830.—A paper, written by the deceased herself—at least three months before death—with a blank for the date, an attestation clause, but no witnesses, and unsigned, with other evidence to shew it unfinished; and declarations that she intended to "settle her will in a few days," is not entitled to probate, either as intended to operate in its actual state, nor on the ground that the execution was prevented by her sudden death the day after such declaration.

On admission of an allegation.

An allegation, to establish a paper as the will of Mary Dyer, was offered on the part of one of the executors, and opposed by fourteen of the lawful cousins-german and next of kin of the deceased. The paper began thus: "In the name of God, Amen, I, Mary Dyer of the parish of St. Paul in the city of Bristol, spinster, do this day of one thousand eight hundred and twenty , make this my last will, in manner and form following. I appoint my friends, Benjamin Belcher and John Bragge, and my cousin William Dyer executors:" and the paper, after giving 100l. to each of her executors, and a variety of legacies to her relations, to strangers, charitable institutions, and providing for her funeral, ended with these words, "To this my will I shall annex a schedule of the property I possess to make every thing as plain and easy as possible, and with it the names and places of abode of persons interested in the same, and if any thing in this will should not be understood, I will my said executors should each choose a person and so settle any thing that may be obscure. Signed, sealed, published and declared to be the last will and testament in the presence of us who have hereunto set our hands, witnesses, the day and year above [208] written in the presence of the testatrix and each other."

(L.S.)

The allegation, in substance, pleaded:

1. Mary Dyer died a spinster, aged 69, on the 8th of March, 1829, leaving several cousins, and a personal property of 4400l.

2. Some time in 1828 the deceased wrote the paper propounded, and intended to sign and execute it before witnesses; but was prevented by sudden illness and death.

3. That she was a dissenter; was interested for the societies benefited; had affection for the legatees, corresponded with some and gave money to others; that she wished to draw up a schedule of the property and of the residence of the legatees, and for that purpose was occupied in making inquiries till her death.

4. A disagreement between the late father and Josiah Dyer, the uncle of the deceased; that she had scarcely any intercourse with her cousins, some of whom she had never seen, and that she spoke of them very seldom and then with indifference.

5. Displeasure, some years ago, with William Dyer, and also with one of her cousins.

6. That Susanna Palmer died in March, 1812, and appointed her sister (the deceased) sole executrix of her will and two codicils, who never proved them; that by the second codicil she gave to her executrix a note of hand for 50l., in trust for Bragge or her family; that Mary Dyer had a great regard for Bragge, and by her will bequeathed to her the note of hand.

7. Great confidence in Belcher, one of her executors: that on the 7th of January, 1829, an assignment of some leaseholds for an annuity [209] for her life was executed by the deceased in Belcher's presence; that on the solicitor taking away the bond for inrolment, and promising to return it in three weeks, she said, "I shall then finally settle my will;" that on the 17th of February the bond was returned, and on the following day she observed to Belcher, "I mean now finally to settle my will; for in that will the vaults and the house adjoining are mentioned as not being sold."

8. That a day or two afterwards she was attacked with inflammation on the chest, thought her illness not serious, went as usual to shops to buy articles; and on the 7th of March told Belcher "she had not settled her will yet, but hoped to do it in a few days."

9. On Sunday, 8th of March, went to chapel; was suddenly taken ill and died immediately: that on the same day Belcher found in her desk the will propounded, carefully wrapped up in a large bill of a tea shop with a red string tied round it.

10. The handwriting of the deceased.

The King's advocate and Pickard opposed the allegation.

Lushington and Addams contrà.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The presumption of law is, I apprehend, against the claim of this paper to probate; and it is necessary to examine precisely what the presumption is that must be repelled. It is true that the paper is all in the deceased's [210] handwriting—is fairly written—is correctly worded. In this paper the deceased, who was a spinster of advanced age—possessed of property to the amount of 4400l.—has inserted a great variety of legacies, though she has not disposed of the residue: the inference is that, when she wrote the paper, she had most fully considered its effect and intended to confer upon the several legatees the benefit therein detailed: in short, that the paper contained her testamentary intentions at the time when it was written. It does not require evidence either of affection towards the legatees, or of disaffection towards others, to sustain the probability of the disposition: but what requires to be shewn is the reason why she did not complete it. Here is an attestation clause, but no witnesses: here is a blank for a date, but no date: here is a seal, but no signature, though there is a clause to that effect. It is quite clear, then, that it was the intention of the deceased to do something more to give it effect. From the body of the paper it appears that she intended to annex a schedule of her property, and of the residence of the legatees; but there is no such schedule: the inference, then, is, that it is an imperfect and unfinished paper, and it must be shewn that she adhered to the disposition; and the non-execution must be accounted for.

It has been stated in argument that there are circumstances which would shew that this paper was written late in 1828, but even if it were written quite at the close of that year, there was ample opportunity for its completion. The third, fourth, fifth, and sixth articles plead remote circumstances to support the probability [211] of the disposition a priori; but these would in any case be unnecessary. The seventh and eighth articles are the material part; but they are rather adverse to the paper: it is apparent from them that the deceased was not prevented by the act of God, nor did the paper remain unexecuted from her belief that it would operate in its present form; but from the want of having made up her mind to the disposition. The intention was to execute a will, but with alterations of some sort. Her declarations were not—that she would execute this will in its present form, but that she should finally settle her will in a few days. It was natural she should alter it: she had sold the leaseholds, which were bequeathed by it, for an annuity for her own life; which consequently afforded no substitute.

The ninth article pleads her sudden death. In the first place, there had been sufficient time to execute it: some months at least had elapsed since it was written—three weeks since the enrolment of the bond: had the deceased not intended to make alterations, the execution would speedily have been accomplished; no act, however, was done; but, secondly, what was proposed to be done?—not to sign this instrument and get it attested, but to "settle her will." The Court has neither authority nor discretion to give effect to a paper in respect to which the deceased had not finally made up her mind. On these grounds it is impossible, unless all principles are broken down, to establish this instrument—an instrument which is unfinished—which the deceased neither intended to operate in its present form, nor intended, if not prevented by the act of God, to execute. Her intention was, [212] after the disposal of the leaseholds, not to execute but to "settle her will."

I reject this allegation, but I allow the expences out of the estate.

M'DONNELL v. PRENDERGAST. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, 2nd Session, 1830.

—An executor who has renounced may, any time before administration has passed the seal, retract.

On petition.

William Prendergast died in June, 1820, having made his will, and thereof appointed John Bushell, Miles M'Donnell, and John M'Donnell executors and residuary legatees in trust. Probate was taken out by Mr. Bushell in December, 1821, power being reserved to the other two executors to be joined. Mr. Bushell died in November, 1828, leaving goods of the testator's unadministered. On the 31st of March, 1829, John M'Donnell was sworn as executor, but before probate passed the seal he changed his mind and wished to renounce: on the 14th of May following, John, and on the 23d of June, Miles, M'Donnell (who resided in Spain, and to whom his brother John was agent), severally executed proxies of renunciation, which on the 2d of September being exhibited, administration was prayed by the widow, the residuary legatee for life of a moiety: and a requisition to swear the widow (then resident in France) issued. She was accordingly sworn; but before the administration passed the seal, John M'Donnell, being advised that inconvenience [213] might follow if he abandoned the executorship, and yet be liable to the trusteeship, executed a proxy retracting his renunciation and desiring probate. This was objected to on behalf of the widow, not only on the facts of the case, but also submitting that, "by the law and practice of the Court, it was not competent to an executor to retract a renunciation at any time previous to a grant of administration being made, if such retractation be opposed by the party next entitled to the administration upon such renunciation."

Dodson for the executor. John M'Donnell has been sworn as executor. An executor cannot renounce after he is sworn. Anon., Ventris, 335, which case is not distinguishable from the present.

Lushington contrà. The subsequent cases and dicta of Lord Mansfield do not accord with the case in Ventris. It is there said that, "an executor having taken the oath, could not be admitted to refuse;" but this does not accord with modern practice. Jackson and Wallington v. Whitehead (3 Phill. 577).

Per Curiam. The Court has made no grant upon the renunciation; for the grant is only made by passing under the seal. Can you shew a case where a party has renounced and has not been allowed [214] to retract before an actual grant? for I have always understood the rule to be, that an executor is at liberty to retract at any time before the Court has acted by its seal. Till then the renunciation is not binding on the party; and might, under circumstances, be disallowed by the Court, as if the executor had in any way intermeddled; for then he would not be at liberty to renounce. After the grant of administration a different rule prevails. "If an executor renounce, and the ordinary commit administration to another, the executor is excluded." Hensloe's case (9 Coke, 37); Robinson v. Pett (3 P. Wms. 251).

Lushington in continuation. In several cases where the Court has allowed an executor (who renounced for the purpose of being examined as a witness) to retract, it has always been said that such permission to retract is not to be considered as a matter of course. In Rex v. Sir Edward Simpson (1 W. Black. 456; S. C. 3 Burr. 1463) Lord Mansfield, as reported by Blackstone, asked this question: "Is there any case where the Ecclesiastical Court has granted, or this Court has compelled it to grant, a new probate to an executor who has formally renounced?" (d)

The Anonymous case in Ventris is not now to be considered as binding. If so, then the circumstances must be gone into to shew that, in this particular case, the Court will not allow the retractation.

[215] Per Curiam. I have a note of a case which I will read.

"Crucifer v. Reynolds. Prerog. 14th April, 1741.

"John Fernsley made his will: John Mace and T. Jameson executors: one shilling to his son: the residue to his two daughters. Mace renounced probate. Reynolds, attorney of Jameson, by an antient letter of attorney 1728, prayed administration. Mary Crucifer, the daughter, takes out a citation against Jameson to accept or refuse: he being in the Fleet in the Mediterranean, Mace, prior to the return, goes before a surrogate, and retracts his renunciation and is sworn. At the sitting of the Court he prays this retractation to be admitted. This is objected against by Crucifer, and that he is going to the West Indies. It being res integra, no probate or administration granted, it is rather a matter of right than discretionary. His retractation is admitted and probate decreed." (a)

Lushington. That could hardly, it would seem, be considered as settled law, because the point was solemnly argued in Rex v. Sir Edward Simpson, before Lord

(d) Mr. Elsey, the editor of the new edition of Sir W. Blackstone's Reports, observes in a note that the passage in the former edition was "who has formerly renounced."

(a) In Yorke v. Manlove, Prerog. 2d Sess. Hil. Term, 1717, renunciation of administration retracted before it passed under the seal, though decreed. Prerog. 1756, Dec. 3, Hayward v. Dale (cited in Rex v. Sir Edward Simpson), an executor may revoke his renunciation at any time until grant of administration with will annexed.

Mansfield in 1764; he ordered that, prior to an administration being granted by consent to a third party, the cestui que trusts should have notice of the pro-[216]-posal, and, as well as the executors, give their answer to it.

Dodson in reply. In Rex v. Simpson Dr. Collier admits that in some cases, for good consideration, renunciation might be retracted; and the Attorney General said, "An executor who has renounced has a right to be considered as an executor whenever he thinks proper, provided probate has not been granted." So in the case cited from Peere Williams. The King v. Simpson was settled; so that case did not overrule the case in Ventris.

Per Curiam. The swearing is not an intermeddling. I confess that the admission of an executor's retractation of a renunciation, in order to become a witness, has always presented difficulties to my mind: he is allowed to renounce for the purpose of being examined as a witness to forward the ends of justice, and then is allowed to retract for the benefit of the estate: but this is not done without the consent of all parties in Court. However, the whole tenor of the authorities go to the distinction before mentioned, that, before the grant, the Court must allow the retractation. I think, therefore, that I am bound to decree probate to the executor and residuary legatee in trust.

Lushington asked the Court to order the costs to be paid out of the estate.

The Court made the order.

[217] IN THE GOODS OF J. WILLIAMS. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, 3rd Session, 1830.—The grant of administration to the widow is discretionary; and the next of kin may be preferred, sufficient cause—in this case the lunacy of the widow—being shewn: but the Court called for an inventory, and directed the securities to justify.

[Followed, In the Goods of Anderson, 1864, 3 Sw. & Tr. 489.]

The deceased died intestate, leaving a widow, a lunatic, and two grandchildren his next of kin.

Addams moved for an administration to the two grandchildren, the next of kin, for the use and benefit of the widow: observing that he understood this was the constant practice.

Per Curiam. The widow is stated to be of the age of 85 and imbecile. It is quite discretionary in the Court to grant an administration to the widow or to the next of kin (21 Hen. 8, c. 5, s. 3). Much expence, in this instance, will be saved by a direct grant to the next of kin in their own right, and not for the widow's use and benefit. The Court can feel no difficulty in making this grant, since it has been always held that the widow, upon good cause, may be set aside.(b) I decree administration to the two grandchildren jointly, upon their exhibiting an inventory, and the securities justifying.

[218] THE KING'S PROCTOR v. DAINES. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, 3rd Session, 1830.—The party setting up, as a will, a paper not on its face testamentary, must shew testamentary intention; and as the law in such cases lends its aid only to effect intention, the question is whether such a paper, if treated as testamentary, will, in truth, give effect to the deceased's intention, though the Court cannot look at the effect of an instrument clearly testamentary on its face. An administration with a paper having the character of a donatio inter vivos

---

(b) Prerogative, February 6, 1807.—In Fleming (late Worsley) v. Pelham Sir William Wynne granted administration to the husband of a daughter, next of kin, for her use and benefit, in exclusion of the widow, who had, in 1781, eloped from her husband, and cohabited with other men till his death in 1805, when she married the man with whom she was then cohabiting. The Court cited the cases of Lewis v. Lewis before Dr. Bettesworth, in 1727, where there were a widow and five minor children, and administration was granted to the brother as guardian of the children in exclusion of the widow—of Voss v. Cotton, before Sir George Hay in 1770, where the Court, not thinking the objection sufficiently strong, granted the administration to the widow, but said he should have granted it to the guardian if the objection had been sufficient.

Sir John Nicholl and Dr. W. Swabey for the husband of the next of kin.

Dr. Arnold and Dr. W. Adams for the relict.

annexed, revoked, since, if treated as testamentary, the deceased's intention would be defeated.—If there is proof, either in the paper itself, or from clear evidence dehors, 1st, that the writer intended to convey the benefits by it which will be conveyed if the paper be considered testamentary; 2dly, that death was the event to give it effect, an instrument, whatever be its form, may be admitted to probate.

[Referred to, Jones v. Nicolay, 1850, 2 Rob. Ecc. 294. Applied, In the Goods of English, 1864, 3 Sw. & Tr. 586.]

The question in this case arose upon a paper propounded as the will of Robert Spink Newson: the instrument, probate of which was opposed on the part of the Crown, is recited in the judgment.

Phillimore and Dodson for Mrs. Daines, in support of the paper propounded.

The King's advocate and Lushington contrà.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is a question respecting an instrument propounded as the will of Robert Spink Newson, deceased, who died so long ago as the 23rd of August, 1815, at the age of nineteen, a bachelor, and illegitimate. The instrument is dated upon the 29th of June, 1815; and is set up by Mrs. Mary Daines as the universal legatee appointed by it, in which character she took out administration, with this paper annexed, in June, 1828; that is about thirteen years after the death of the alleged testator. That administration has since been called in, and she has been put on the proof of the instrument as the will of the deceased: and if it be not valid as a will, the legal property will belong to the Crown; though the real party in the cause is the brother of the deceased. The main question, therefore, for the consideration of the Court is whether the paper propounded is a testamentary instrument.

[219] It seems material and convenient in the first instance to consider the contents of the paper itself, whether it imports a present gift, or a testamentary bequest to take effect on the death of the deceased, and to be ambulatory till that event consummates it.

The instrument is in these terms:—

"June 29th, 1815.

"I, Robert Spink, in the presence of the two undermentioned witnesses, Thomas Whitmore, of the parish of Stratford St. Mary, in the county of Suffolk, esquire, and Sarah Chapman, of the parish of Peasenhall in the said county, spinster, do give all my goods and chattels unto Mary Daines, of the parish of Peasenhall aforesaid, spinster.

"Signed the day and year above written, "ROBERT SPINK.

"Witnesses, Thomas Whitmore and Sarah Chapman."

These are the words of the instrument. What then does the person do in the presence of these witnesses? What is the import of the words which he makes use of? "I do give all my goods and chattels unto Mary Daines." It is hardly possible to use words more directly and strongly importing a present gift. Here is no ambiguity respecting the intention: he declares, per verba de præsenti, that he gives those things to Mary Daines. Whether the instrument could be considered valid as a gift, or as evidence of a gift, is not what I am now considering; but the import of the words contained in the instrument itself; and there can be no difficulty, I think, upon their construction.

[220] Is the import of these words "I do give" varied by any thing else contained in the instrument leading to a different understanding, or tending to shew it was future and prospective, more especially that it was something to take place after his death—that his death was to consummate and give effect to the gift? By any thing, in short, rendering it testamentary? There is not one word that has any such tendency. It is not entitled a will; nor a codicil: it has no reference to any legacy; nor to any executor; nor to the death of the party writing it: he does not use the words "I give and bequeath:" he does not use the words "I leave:" there are no solemn words of inception, such as "In the name of God, Amen;" nor any of those expressions which are usually, or frequently at least, found in a testamentary instrument. It then seems to me that no instrument could be more anxiously or ingeniously devised, and more carefully drawn up, to import a present gift—"do give," and to exclude an appearance of, or reference to, an act of a testamentary nature—to any thing at all prospective.

Such, in my judgment, is the import of the instrument itself, looking simply and solely to the words and form in which it is conceived: and in that case it lies on the parties setting it up as a will to prove that it was made with a testamentary intention; that it was to be consummated by, and to operate upon, death.

It is true that if, in point of form, it is drawn up as a deed, yet if it appears, from something in the instrument itself, that it was intended to convey a benefit upon and after death, it may, notwithstanding the apparent form, operate as [221] a will; or if it is equivocal or silent, it may be proved by extrinsic circumstances to have been intended to operate as a testamentary disposition. Most of the cases upon the subject are to be found referred to in Thorold and Thorold (1 Phill. 1), and in the subsequent case of Masterman and Maberly (2 Hagg. Ecc. 225). One or two additional cases have been referred to in the course of the discussion; but they do not appear to me either to carry further, or to alter, the principle which is laid down in those cases—that the form of the instrument is not conclusive against its testamentary effect; that although it may not be valid in the form in which it was drawn up as a deed of gift, yet that it may operate as a will. But no case has gone the length of deciding that because an instrument cannot operate in the form given to it, it must operate as a will; it may operate as a will if shewn to have been written with a testamentary intention.

If there is any proof, either in the paper itself, or from clear evidence dehors; first, that it was the intention of the writer of the paper to convey the benefits by the instrument which would be conveyed by it, if considered as a will; and secondly, that death was the event that was to give effect to it, then, whatever be its form, it may be admitted to probate as testamentary. But the present instrument goes far in the contrary direction; it not only contains nothing that refers to death or to a testamentary disposition, but it rather seems carefully to confine itself to a donatio inter vivos per verba de præsenti—"I do give." To give it effect as a will, then, it would require [222] clear evidence that the deceased intended it should operate as such: and perhaps it would require something more; namely, evidence that it was the intention of the deceased to do that which the instrument, as a testamentary act, might possibly effect from supervening circumstances.

It appears that the deceased was the illegitimate son of Robert Spink. The father afterwards married the mother and had another son, nearly ten years younger than the deceased in the cause. This other son, as I have before intimated, through the Crown, is to be considered the party principally interested in the present question; rather than the Crown itself, because, in cases of this description, the Crown very liberally grants the principal part of its interest to a person standing in the situation of John Spink.

Mrs. Daines was many years ago employed, not as a servant, but as a sempstress, by Mr. and Mrs. Spink: she became a great favourite of Mrs. Spink; and after her death she retained the confidence of Robert Spink, the father. The father, by his will, has disposed of his property in the following manner:—First, he appoints Mr. White and Mr. Man his executors. He then bequeaths "unto Robert Spink Newson, his natural son, the sum of 500l. of lawful British money, when he attains the age of twenty-one years, hoping that he will superintend and take upon himself the care and guardianship of his brother John Exeter Edward's education." In a further part, where he disposes of the residue, he says: "All the rest and residue of my real and personal estate, corn tithes in Sibton and Peasenhall [223] aforesaid, goods, chattels and effects whatsoever, with all my ready money, book debts and other debts, securities for money, whether in the public stocks or elsewhere, I devise, give and bequeath unto the said Robert Spink Newson and John Exeter Edward, my sons by Anne, my late wife, or the survivor of them, and to their heirs and assigns for ever, as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants, to be equally divided between them, share and share alike, when the youngest of them shall be of the age of twenty-one years." In a further part respecting the care of those children he says: "I particularly request my said executors to pay due attention to the education of my said children, and they will cause them to be piously educated and instructed in their moral and religious duties. And, as it was their mother's particular desire, I request that Mary Daines of Sibton aforesaid, spinster, her intimate friend, will take upon her the care and guardianship of my said children during their childhood, so far as to select any part of my goods, linen, or any other thing or things that she shall or may think will be convenient and useful for them, and to keep and reserve the same for them, and that she will buy, procure, and make up and mend, or see to the buying, making up and mending, such linen and clothing and apparel as my said children may want during their minority, as she shall judge necessary and proper for them, according to the instructions she received from their mother my late wife for that purpose; and that the said Mary Daines do from time to time make her own charge on my said executors for all costs, [224] trouble, labour, care and attention in buying, procuring, making up and mending such articles for their use, and that my said executors do from time to time pay and discharge all such demands out of my annual income."

"In case the children shall both die before they or either of them shall attain the age of twenty-one years, without leaving a wife or lawful issue," then the property is devised over, among several persons.

This will is dated the 26th of April, 1810.(a)

In September, 1812, he made a codicil to his will; and by that codicil he recites that, "Whereas I have purchased the house at Peasenhall-street, now in the tenure and occupation of Henry Oldring; and I do order and direct my executors to settle and pay the purchase money of the same, if not settled for as aforesaid, before my decease; and I will the same as a dwelling-place for Mary Daines, who has undertaken, and it is my will she should superintend, the care and clothing of my two children, Robert and John Spink; [225] and I will that her said dwelling-house be considered as their home during their minority; and I will and direct my executors to pay all reasonable expenses the said Mary Daines may be put to on their account: and I do further desire she may be allowed to select what furniture she may want from my dwelling-house, to furnish the same; and also I will she shall have all the wines and other liquors that are in my house after my funeral, to her's and the said children's use. And it is my will and desire, that she shall have the dwelling, and use of the furniture, free from any rent and charge, during the term of her natural life, without any molestation from any one; and also shall be paid, yearly and every year, the sum of 20l. of lawful money also during her natural life, for a compensation of her care and trouble as aforesaid." Thus, though the executors are to have the general superintendence of the education and pious instruction of these youths, yet the care of their persons is more particularly devolved upon Mrs. Mary Daines; she is to live at this house, and to have whatever furniture of the deceased's she shall think fit to select.

Accordingly, upon the death of Mr. Robert Spink, Mrs. Mary Daines occupied the house at Peasenhall-street: she selected certain articles of furniture for the purpose of furnishing that house; the eldest son continued at school; and afterwards was removed to the University of Cambridge. The other son was at school; but they both spent their vacations with Mrs. Daines at this house, which was intended by the father as a home for them during their mi-[226]-nority. The eldest son, when about nineteen, having fallen into a decline, quitted the university and came to Peasenhall-street, and there died on the 23rd of August, 1815.

There is no reason whatever to doubt that Mrs. Mary Daines faithfully discharged the duty thus committed to her; nor that Robert Spink Newson had a great affection and regard for her. The letters which have been exhibited, as well as the parol evidence, I think, fully establish that he had that attachment which would naturally flow from the relation existing between him and Mrs. Mary Daines; from her maternal kindness at all times; and more particularly from the care and attention she shewed during his illness. But this goes a very short way towards the real question in the cause: it tends as much to support the instrument as evidence of a gift inter vivos of those little personal articles which he possessed, as to prove that he intended it as a disposition of his property by will. In all this correspondence I do not observe one single word shewing any testamentary intention; nothing indicating a wish to increase that provision which his father had made for Mrs. Daines; not one expression tending to shew a desire of making any will; not a word of dissatisfaction or disaffection towards his younger brother; not a hint that he should himself decline to do, when he came of age, that which his father had, in his will, expressed a hope he would do, namely, "superintend and take the guardianship of his brother John." These letters, then, of which there are between forty and fifty, establish a great affection for Mrs. Daines, but no testamentary intention whatever [227]—nothing to give the instrument a character different from that which the words of it import.

(a) It was pleaded by the Crown that, on the younger son attaining the age of 21 years, the executors of the father's will paid over to him, as the person entitled to the [whole] residuary estate of his father, 25,000l., and also delivered to him the title deeds of the real estate, of the value of 2200l.

On the other side it was pleaded that from the deceased's death Mary Daines retained, in virtue of the will (the paper propounded), possession of the deceased's effects, of which he died possessed at Peasenhall-street, not exceeding 30l. in value; and (as a reason why she did not sooner take probate of the paper) that John Exeter Edward Spink did not attain, till 3rd of February, 1827, the age of twenty-one, at which time he was unmarried, and that Mary Daines was not aware that a moiety of the residuary property of the father vested in the said deceased, so as to be transmissible to his representatives.

Under the powers given to Mrs. Daines by the will of the father she exercised the right of selecting furniture and other articles. The executors required that she should furnish them with an inventory of what she had taken: this she refused to do, and a quarrel ensued between her and the executors, more particularly between her and Mr. White; and in this quarrel, naturally enough considering his situation, the deceased took part with Mrs. Daines. The account of this part of the transaction is given by Mr. Man and Mr. White, the executors of the father, who have been examined as witnesses in this cause. Mr. White was the acting executor. Mr. Man is very advanced in life, and complains of his memory being feeble; still, however, his evidence, as far as it goes, tends to confirm the testimony of Mr. White. Mr. White in his deposition on the 6th article of the allegation gives this account of the quarrel: "The deponent, as the acting executor, paid all Mary Daines' accounts for the necessary expenses of the house at Peasenhall for some time after she and the children had removed thither. He forgets when it was that he ceased to make such payments, but it was in consequence of the circumstances of which he is about to depose: he made several applications to Mary Daines for a regular inventory of the furniture and effects which she had removed to Peasenhall from Sibton, but she refused to give, and declared that she never would give, an inventory. Upon one occasion she gave the deponent an inventory of some [228] of such effects; but not of the plate, linen, and many other things that had been removed: he mentioned those omissions to her, and asked her for a more complete inventory, but she declared that she never would, nor did she ever, give him any other. Mr. Man was with the deponent when he asked her for the inventory the last time, and so was her brother John Daines, but when that was the deponent does not remember. He has lost the memorandum he made of the circumstances. Mary Daines, on the deponent's applying to her as aforesaid, claimed the effects of which she refused to give an inventory as her own; she said Mr. Robert Spink had given them to her in his lifetime. The deponent observed that he might as well say that Mr. Robert Spink had given them to him, and asked her if she had any paper to shew, or any witness to prove, that they had been so given to her, and she acknowledged that she had not. In consequence of Mary Daines' conduct as deposed, the deponent and she very much disagreed, but he endeavoured to avoid dispute with her as much as possible; whenever he had anything to say to her he used to get Mr. Man to go to her. When she refused to give the inventory the last time the deponent told her that he would not pay her any further accounts she might send to him until she had furnished him with a correct and proper inventory: she threatened to go to law with him, but he persisted in refusing to pay her accounts, and in consequence thereof she, in May, 1814, brought an action against him and Mr. Man, as executors, for the recovery of her demands. They were served with a [229] copy of a writ, but on an appearance being entered by them the action was abandoned. In Hilary Term, 1816, Mary Daines filed a bill in Chancery against the deponent and Mr. Man to enforce the payment of her annuity under the codicil to the deceased's father's will, and of certain monies expended by her for the use of the said two children of Mr. Robert Spink. The deponent does not recollect any thing that was set forth in the bill in Chancery; but he remembers that it stated that John Exeter Edward Spink would, on coming of age, be entitled to the whole of his father's property; his brother Robert being then dead; and he also remembers that the bill did not state any thing about the said Robert Spink Newson having made or executed any will, or any paper of a testamentary description, disposing of his property after his death. The deponent and Mr. Man put in their answer, and the same was then dismissed with costs against Mary Daines. The deponent gave R. S. Newson money to pay his own bills with, and also paid himself all bills incurred by the brother."

This is the account which Mr. White gives of the dispute between him and Mrs. Mary Daines. It is not at all necessary for the Court to decide whether any blame was imputable to Mrs. Daines on this occasion or not, but several of those facts are important; particularly that passage where the executor states that he asked her whether she had any paper to shew, or any witness to prove, that the testator, Mr. Robert Spink, had given those articles to her in his lifetime; for this part of the evidence does seem [230] to furnish a pretty tolerable clue to the instrument now produced. Mrs. Daines communicated her quarrel with the executors to the deceased, and the deceased took part with her: he had a few things of a personal nature, but the bulk of the furniture, and the other things, not his, but in the house, were left by the father for the use of Mrs. Daines and his sons, and for her use even after they became of age, during the remainder of her life. Robert Spink Newson, then, had nothing but those few articles which a young man coming home from the university would carry with him. The term "goods and chattels," in the legal acceptation of the words, certainly is of great extent; but is often used as a sort of cant term to designate personal articles of little value. Thus, in this instrument the deceased probably used the words "all my goods and chattels" in the common acceptation of them, as applying to all his "personal articles," rather than in the sense which they would have in a formal legal instrument.

What, then, is the import of this paper more than to meet the sort of suspicion thrown upon Mrs. Daines, and the demand that was made upon her by the executors? She avers that Mr. Spink gave her certain articles: his executors doubt it; they ask her, Have you "any paper to shew" that he gave you those articles? Have you any witness to prove it? A quarrel ensues: she will not give any account of the articles; and they will not pay her her demand till she renders that account. She complains to the deceased; and he says, Well, "I will give you all these 'my goods and chat-[231]-tels,' and here is a paper for you signed by myself, shewing that 'I do give' them to you, and it is a paper written in the presence of witnesses, therefore, there can be no dispute." Is this the true construction of the paper? or is the Court to consider it as a will, constituting Mrs. Daines his universal legatee—giving to her every thing which he possessed at that time, and every thing he might ever become entitled to, in total exclusion of his younger brother, the legitimate son of his father—the source of the whole of the property which either he or his brother might possess. Was it the intention of the deceased to make this inofficious disposition? Was it his intention at this time to do a testamentary act, or to shew Mrs. Daines a kindness, by simply making this gift of those few personal articles which he had at the time?

The onus probandi—that it is a will, as I have already said—lies upon the party setting up, as testamentary, this instrument, which upon its face has no such import, but bears the character of a present gift. In such a case the aid of the law is extended only to give effect to the intention of the party: surely, then, the Court should be satisfied that it looks at the whole intention of the deceased: it must take into its consideration even the effect the deceased intended the instrument to have. If an instrument upon the face of it is manifestly executed as a will, the Court cannot look at its effect; it must have legal operation without regard to the intention as to effect: but if the Court of Probate is called upon to assist in carrying into effect the [232] intention of a deceased party, by pronouncing an instrument to be a will when, upon the face of it, it is a deed of gift, the Court must have the clearest evidence that the instrument was intended to be a will; more especially supposing that the paper, if pronounced for as a will, would carry away half the property of the father from his legitimate son; and such might possibly, though I do not undertake to say that it would, be the effect.

Now all the circumstances satisfy me that there was no such intention on the part of Robert Spink Newson; that he never intended to dispossess his brother; that he never intended to convey all his personal property to Mrs. Daines; but that the utmost he intended was, either at that moment to give her all those little articles he possessed at the time, or to provide that she should have the use of them for her life, even if he had lived till he had become of age; for on that event he would be entitled to 500l.; and would take more especially the care and management of his younger brother, Mr. John Exeter Edward Spink.

What, then, is the evidence laid before the Court that this instrument, couched in the present tense, "I do give," was intended as a will? A maid-servant, who lived in the family, I think, for about eight months as a servant of all work, was called in for the purpose of putting her name to this instrument; and now, fourteen years subsequent, without any thing occurring at the time to impress particularly upon her attention and memory what were the words made use of by the deceased, or any thing in [233] the intermediate time, which would cause her to retain them in her memory; she is produced to prove that the deceased called it "his will:" "I want you to subscribe your name to my will." Having examined her deposition very carefully, and having considered the observations made upon it, the Court, without stating it minutely and in detail, may venture to say that it cannot rely upon her evidence as proof that the instrument was at that time intended and declared by the deceased to be a will. Whitmore, the other subscribed witness to this paper, is dead: but if his evidence is lost, that loss has arisen through Mrs. Daines' laches in not setting up this instrument as a will at the proper time; namely, when the deceased died. If Mr. Whitmore could have proved it was a will, it would have been very important that his evidence should have been produced: there is, however, just as much reason to suppose that he would have proved it was not a will, but was intended as evidence to Mrs. Daines of a gift of these few articles, for the purpose of preventing any disputes.

The fact that Mr. Whitmore was present and attested the paper, and that the deceased sent for him, is quite as consistent with the intention of drawing up a paper as a deed of gift, as with the intention of making a will. And if the deceased sent for him to assist him in making his will, really this paper is expressed in the most extraordinary terms that could possibly have been made use of. The deceased was a person who had a good deal of intelligence, and Mr. Whitmore is described as a man of business, so [234] that it might be supposed that if a will had been intended, it would have been worded differently: for, as was before stated, the very form in which it was drawn seems to shew that they were careful not to give it a testamentary form; but merely to render it a proof of a gift of these little articles. What, then, is the reasonable probability, on looking at all the circumstances? That neither the deceased, nor any of them, were aware that a minor had a power to make a will even of personalty. The Rev. Mr. Westhorp states that "he heard the deceased say he had promised his watch to the Rev. Mr. Robinson, as he had no power to leave his money." So that, apparently, he supposed he had, as a minor, power to give, by way of donation, the few personal articles that belonged to him, but not to make a will.

The evidence seems all to bear the same sort of construction. There is no person about the deceased who ever heard he had made, or had expressed any wish or intention to make, a will, or that Mr. Whitmore was to be sent for for the purpose of assisting him in making one. Mrs. Daines' own witnesses speak to that effect. His own medical attendant, Mr. Wilson, never heard him say any thing about a will. Dr. Brown never heard him say any thing about a will; nor did the Rev. Mr. Uhthoff. Even the brother, John Daines, never heard him say any thing about a will; "He was not aware, he says, that a minor could make a will." The deceased had many confidential friends and attendants about him during the latter part of his life, but there are none of them brought forward to shew [235] that the deceased had it ever in his contemplation to make a will.

If, however, he sent for Mr. Whitmore to make a will, or had any intention or inclination whatever to do such an act himself, it does seem very extraordinary, I think, that it never came to the knowledge of any person whatever; because the production of this maid-servant, fourteen years afterwards, and the pretended declaration by Mrs. Daines to her brother, I cannot admit as proof of any intention of a testamentary act in the mind of the deceased at the period in question. What was the conduct of Mrs. Daines herself? She did not on the death of the deceased produce this instrument and take probate of it; she kept possession of these articles, as she would do under a gift made to her in the lifetime of the deceased; but she never came forward at all to prove this instrument as a testamentary act; she brought an action against the executors of the father's will for her expenditure; she filed a bill against them for the same purpose; which bill, in the year 1816, was dismissed with costs; not merely upon the ground, as pleaded, that she had not funds to go on with the suit, but "because the Attorney General was not made a party to the suit, Robert Spink Newson having died a bastard and intestate." That is the reason assigned by counsel.(a) Still this instrument [236] was not produced as a will, though it would at once have removed that difficulty: for Mrs. Daines had only to obtain probate of the paper as a will, and that would have entirely removed out of the cause the necessity of the Crown being made a party, and made her the proper party to sue.

[237] In the year 1828, after the younger brother became of age, a new bill was filed in the Exchequer against the executors of the father, and against the son John, and against the Attorney General, for the annuity and account; but still in that bill there was no mention whatever of this instrument as a will; but, in consequence of some doubts raised in the course of discussion upon that bill whether John was entitled to the whole of the father's residue, then this paper was for the first time brought forward, and, in June, 1828, Mrs. Daines took probate of it as universal legatee: she did not however call on the Crown, but took it out in common form; the paper having been examined, the administration was called in.

These are material circumstances in this case. On looking to all these circumstances—looking first to the circumstance that the paper upon the face of it is not testamentary, but rather that it is a declaration of a donatio inter vivos per verba de præsenti, that it lies upon the party setting up such a paper to prove that it was intended to be testamentary, to take effect after death, and to be consummated by that event: considering that this burthen of proof is not lessened by its being the act of a minor, nor by the circumstance that it might have the effect (if it be considered as a testamentary paper) of depriving the legitimate son of the father of this property, and that it would act quite contrary to the intention of any of the parties, I am of opinion that Mrs. Daines has not only failed in proving that this was intended to be a will, but I think that the inference from the evidence is that the instrument was drawn up to be that [238] which on its face it purports to be, namely, a declaration of a gift inter vivos made in consequence of the dispute between Mrs. Daines and the executors of the deceased's father respecting the gift alleged to have been made by him to Mrs. Daines in his lifetime, but in proof of which Mrs. Daines had neither paper nor witnesses to produce. The deceased and his friend Mr. Whitmore therefore determined that she should have a paper of this description to shew that the deceased had given her those articles during his lifetime.

This is the result I think of the evidence upon this instrument with respect to the intention of the deceased, and therefore I am of opinion that Mrs. Daines is not entitled

---

(a) Mr. Cufaude, formerly employed as solicitor for Mrs. Mary Daines, upon the 13th interrogatory, answered: "The respondent did take the opinion of counsel through his agent, upon the bill in Chancery filed on behalf of Mary Daines, and the counsel, Mr. Wingfield, did give his opinion that the bill was defective, by reason that the Attorney General had not been made a party thereto. It appears to the deponent, from that opinion, to have been considered necessary, in order to protect the rights of the Crown in that moiety of the personal estate of Robert Spink the elder, to which his son Robert, had he lived, would have been entitled, that the Attorney General should be a party, as representing the interest of the Crown in that moiety, in consequence of Robert Spink the younger having died intestate, a bachelor and illegitimate. Mr. Wingfield also gave it as his opinion that the testator's heir at law should be a party to the bill if the plaintiff was not so; and also that the persons to whom the property would go in the event of the plaintiff, John Exeter Edward Spink, dying before he should attain twenty-one years of age, should also be parties; and that the bill should therefore be amended in those respects."

The above answer was objected to on behalf of Mrs. Daines, as being the evidence of her solicitor, and as purporting to give the effect, or the witness' opinion of the effect, of a written document without producing it.

Per Curiam. I think this evidence is admissible. It was pleaded by Mrs. Daines —and Mr. Cufaude was produced, for the purpose of proving—that the plaintiff had not funds enough to go on with the prosecution of the bill she had filed. On cross-examination, Mr. Cufaude (being examined to that particular fact) admits that it was dismissed, not for the want of funds, but parties. I think the question to the attorney being limited to that particular point, the Court cannot allow the objection to the answer (Vaillant v. Dodemead, 2 Atk. 524). If an objection were made to any part of the interrogatories that went not to the point on which he was examined in chief, the Court would sustain it.

to this property, but that the deceased, Robert Spink Newson, has died intestate, and I direct the administration, granted to Mrs. Daines, to be revoked, and decree administration to the nominees of the Crown.

On an application for costs out of the estate the King's advocate said the Court had no power to grant them; but that the Crown would not object.

Per Curiam. The party must be left to the liberality of the Crown.

[239] MORWAN v. THOMPSON. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, 4th Session, 1830. —A will of a feme covert, made during marriage under a settlement, is not revoked by her surviving the husband.

[Doubted, Willock v. Noble, 1875, L. R. 7 H. L. 580.]

On admission of an allegation.

This was a cause of proving the will of Mrs. Robinson; it was dated on the 27th of June, 1807, and was made during coverture, in virtue of certain powers vested in her under a bond executed by her husband in contemplation of marriage. The will contained no appointment of executor nor residuary legatee; and was not republished after the husband's death; it was propounded by a legatee, and opposed by a second cousin—one of the next of kin. The substance of the allegation is set forth in the judgment.

Lushington in support of the allegation.

Phillimore contrà.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This allegation pleads in substance "that Dorothy Robinson, the deceased, married in 1785 William Robinson, who died in 1819: she survived her husband about a year, and died on the 18th of February, 1820, leaving some second cousins, of whom Robert Morwan is one; that a settlement was executed before her marriage giving her the power to dispose of 700l." This settlement is in effect that "if the wife dies before the husband, the sum of 700l. is to be paid on his death to such persons as she by [240] will, notwithstanding coverture, shall direct: if she survives him then the 700l. are to be paid to her, to be disposed of at her will and pleasure:" so that there were two events contemplated—in the one of her husband surviving, she might dispose of this money by will—in the other, of her surviving him, the money would become her property absolutely. The allegation further pleads: "That the deceased intending to dispose of all property to which she was entitled under the bond of her husband, dated the 4th of April, 1785, and of all other estate and effects over which she had a power of disposition; executed a will on the 27th of June, 1807:" by that will she provided for the disposition of this money after the death of her husband: she gave him the 700l. for life; but after his death she bequeathed over certain legacies. The allegation then proceeds: "That her husband, by his will, dated in April, 1816, added to his wife's provision by directing that the annuity of 25l. secured to her by marriage settlement was to be increased to 50l. ('as she has disposed of her principal money by her will'), to be paid from the time of his decease to his daughter Alice and her husband, for the maintenance of the deceased, if she continues to reside with them: or more at the discretion of his trustees."

Here, then, the husband provides for his wife, the deceased, surviving him: he recognizes her will as having disposed of the 700l., and he seems to refer to what is pleaded to have been her then state of incapacity, for the allegation sets forth "that the deceased, for several years [241] before the death of her husband, was in a state of imbecility; and was incapable of recognizing the will after his death."

Why then is the fact that she survived her husband to revoke that will? There is no change of condition: she was testable when she made the will and when she died—both under the settlement and under her husband's will—there is no alteration of circumstances from which an intention to revoke can be presumed. She has provided for the death of her husband: it is on the event of his death that the legacies are given. In his lifetime she had the power of disposing of the 700l. notwithstanding coverture; on her surviving him, the 700l. absolutely vested in her and became her property disposeable at her pleasure: and her will having disposed of it in the event of the husband's death, I can see no reason nor principle why the will should become invalid or be revoked. There is no rule of law, of which I am aware, that holds a will validly made during coverture to become invalid merely by reason of the husband's death. The case of Stevens v. Bagwell (15 Ves. 139), cited in the argument for the next of kin, is, as far as it goes, directly the other way; for there the will was made during coverture, and the husband died before the wife, yet the will was valid. Where a will is made before marriage and the wife survives the husband, in order to render such a will valid there must be something of a republication, because there the intermediate marriage has revoked the will, and has transferred all the property. That is an intelligible princi-[242]-ple.(a)[1] So a will made during coverture where there is no power under settlement to make a will, but a mere revocable assent, on the part of the husband, to her disposing of her chattels real, or choses in action, and property acquired after his death, may require something in the nature of a republication,(b) because she was not testable when the will was made, and she could derive no power from him beyond the extent of his interest in the effects of which her will purports to dispose: but in the present case I can see no principle or presumption of law on which this will was revoked: and on the ground already stated, I am of opinion that it remained valid after the husband's death, and I therefore admit the allegation.(c)

Note.—It having been agreed between the parties that the case should be determined by the admission or rejection of the allegation, the suit here dropped; and administration (with the will annexed) limited to the property of which the deceased had a right to dispose, and had disposed of by her will.

Costs were decreed out of the estate.

[243] LORD TRIMLESTOWN v. LADY TRIMLESTOWN. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, By-Day, 1830.—An administration, with a will annexed, obtained after a caveat entered had expired, but without notice to the adverse party, and while the will was in suit in Ireland—the forum domicilii—revoked, as surreptitiously obtained, and the party condemned in the costs of a petition in support of it.

On petition.

Nicholas Baron Trimlestown, of his last will, dated the 8th of December, 1812, named John O'Shee and Henry Eustace executors, and his wife, Lady Trimlestown, residuary legatee. In June, 1813, Mr. O'Shee proved the will in the Prerogative Court of Armagh; he died in the beginning of 1815, and on the renunciation of the surviving executor Lady Trimlestown took letters of administration in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, with the will annexed, as residuary legatee.(a)[2]

On the 14th of July, 1829, a decree was directed to issue against Lady Trimlestown to bring in the administration, and shew cause why it should not be revoked. An appearance being given to that decree, an act on petition was entered into on both sides, when, on behalf of Lord Trimlestown, it was alleged: "That the deceased died on the 17th of April, 1813, aged 87, leaving a widow, and (by a former marriage) one son—the present lord—and one daughter; and that he was domiciled in and died in Ireland; that on the 9th of June, 1813, probate of [244] his will, dated 8th of December, 1812, was granted, in common form, by the Prerogative Court of Armagh, to John O'Shee, one of the executors; that in September, 1813, Lord Trimlestown commenced a suit in that court why the will should not be declared null and void." [The petition then detailed the proceedings in that cause.] "That various suits were instituted in the Court of Chancery in Ireland by Lady Trimlestown, and by the deceased's daughter, to establish the will of 1812 as to the real estates, and Lord Trimlestown also filed a bill in the same Court to set aside the will as fraudulently obtained; that the Court directed an issue to be tried in the King's Bench in Ireland

---

(a)[1] "This is a will made before marriage; and, as to that point, it is extremely clear that no will made by a feme covert can bind after marriage; because it is contrary to the nature of the instrument, which must be ambulatory during the life of the testatrix, and as by marriage she disables herself from making any other will, the instrument ceases to be of that sort, and must be void." Per Lord Thurlow in Hodsden v. Lloyd, 2 B. C. C. 544.

(b) See Miller and Ross v. Brown, 2 Hagg. Con. 209.

(c) See Dingwall v. Askew, 1 Cox, 427. Doe on demise of Collins v. Weller, 7 T. R. 478.

(a)[2] A caveat had been entered, on the part of Lord Trimlestown, in the registry of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, but an administration pendente lite having been granted by the Prerogative Court of Armagh to the nominee of Lord Trimlestown, it had not, since the 26th of November, 1825, been renewed.

whether the alleged will was in fact the will of the deceased or not; that the trial came on in June, 1818, before a special jury, and after lasting seventeen days a juror was withdrawn by consent, and there was no verdict: that in February, 1819, the same issue came on for hearing in the Common Pleas, where, after a trial of twelve days, there was a verdict against the will: that various proceedings have since been had by appeal to the House of Lords, and that the suits still remain undetermined. That, notwithstanding the opposition of Lady Trimlestown, an administration pendente lite was on 4th of September, 1819, granted to the nominee of Lord Trimlestown under condition of his not disturbing Lady Trimlestown in the possession of the family plate and furniture, and produce of the stock at Turvey, she giving an inventory and security as to the same, and that the said administration is still in force. That in 1822 [245] Lady Trimlestown filed a bill in the Court of Chancery in England against Lord Trimlestown and others claiming to be entitled under the deceased's will to a large sum of money awarded to Lord Trimlestown by the commissioners for the liquidation of the claims of British subjects for estates confiscated in France; that the said suit is now depending in that Court; that on the 25th of June, 1829, administration, with the will of December, 1812, was taken in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury by Lady Trimlestown, as residuary legatee, the surviving executor having renounced." The petition concluded with a prayer "that the administration should be declared void, and Lady Trimlestown condemned in costs."

For Lady Trimlestown, it was alleged "that in the cause depending in the Prerogative Court of Armagh, publication of the evidence having passed, an exceptive allegation, offered by Lord Trimlestown, was, on the 13th of October, 1827, rejected by the Court; that an appeal—thereupon asserted—had not been further prosecuted than by a service of the inhibition. That the Lord Chancellor of Ireland having refused to set aside the verdict of the jury in the Common Pleas, in February, 1819, an appeal was made to the House of Lords, when the decree was reversed, and the cause remitted; but that since the 14th of June, 1827, no new trial had taken place; that Lord Trimlestown had, without notice to Lady Trimlestown, though apprized of her claim, received a large dividend upon the sum awarded [246] by the commissioners, and issued a receipt for the same as executor under a will of the deceased, dated in July, 1805, but which will has not been propounded; that in August, 1822, Lady Trimlestown filed a bill in the Court of Chancery in England, praying an account of all sums of money, or rentes perpetuelles of France awarded to Lord T.: and that the right and interest of Lady T. as the widow and residuary legatee might be ascertained and secured: that an injunction issued to the commissioners, who have, in consequence thereof, paid several sums into the hands of the Accountant General, subject to the further order of the Court in the said cause; that in May, 1829, Lord T. served a notice of motion for the purpose of dissolving the injunction, and that the funds might be transferred to him; and Lady T. being advised that she could not safely proceed to a hearing without a representation to the deceased in this Court, and the caveat, entered by Lord T., not having been renewed since the 26th of November, 1825, she obtained letters of administration: that the motion made by Lord T. was refused. That if the administration were revoked, Lord T. might renew his application with success, and deprive her of all beneficial interest in the fund to which she would be entitled under the will of the 8th of December, 1812, if the same were established, and that, if established, the administration is valid;" wherefore it was prayed that the letters of administration might be retained in the registry, and not revoked.

[247] To this answer there was a rejoinder, which—after entering into some explanations respecting the several suits between the parties at law and in equity, and alleging "that they were impeded by Lady T. not delivering her case in the Delegates, nor paying certain costs ordered by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland; and that the claim upon the money awarded by the commissioners was not made in due time, and that the claim of Lord T. was preferred as the seul heritier of his late father, and not under any will, and that the receipt for the orders for the dividends had been signed by him in blank, and were without his knowledge filled up by the clerk of the commissioners, describing him as executor"—concluded with the original prayer.

Lushington for Lord Trimlestown.

The King's advocate and Addams contrà.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. In this case administration with the will annexed was taken in this Court by Lady Trimlestown, and yet it is admitted that the will was at the time in suit in various Courts in Ireland: and it cannot be denied that this administration was surreptitiously obtained. The deceased was domiciled in and a peer of Ireland. The Irish Courts then were the proper tribunals to try the validity of his will. How the proceedings have been there carried on is not a fit question for this Court. It cannot examine whether the party was right or wrong, whether he has unneces-[248]-sarily protracted the suit or not; the only question is whether the administration should be revoked. The taking of an administration with a will annexed, which will was in litigation, is, at least, practising a deception upon the Court. During the proceedings in Ireland Lady Trimlestown, it appears, had obtained an injunction from the Court of Chancery in England against the transfer of certain funds to Lord Trimlestown, and, on the suggestion that there had been on the part of Lord Trimlestown an endeavour to get the injunction dissolved, comes here for an administration, as if this Court could decide whether the injunction was proper to be dissolved or not. The administration too was obtained, after knowledge that a caveat had been entered which was never warned; and that caveat having expired, this administration was taken without giving any notice to the other party. At least then it was obtained, to use a tender expression, irregularly, and the party, when ordered to bring it in, resists that order by entering into a long petition. I am bound to revoke and declare this administration void; and, as there is no ground for defending the application, I must condemn the party in the costs of this petition.

Petition rejected.

[249] RICHARDSON AND LANG v. BARRY. Prerogative Court, Easter Term, 2nd Session, 1830.—Deceased having, under a trust deed, power to dispose of certain effects by a will attested by two witnesses, such a will is revoked by a subsequent will containing an express revocatory clause, duly executed, but attested only by one witness; the disposition intended by the deceased being thereby completely effected.

[Referred to, In the Goods of Eustace, 1874, L. R. 3 P. & D. 186.]

On petition.

This was a cause of bringing into the registry the letters of administration with the will annexed (dated the 16th of June, 1824) of William Barry, heretofore granted to the residuary legatee, the father of the deceased, and of accepting an administration with the said will, together with an asserted will, dated the 2nd of October, 1821, as together containing the will of the deceased. The cause was promoted by the executors of the will of 1821, who were also trustees under a deed of settlement dated the 10th of August, 1820.

The petition in substance alleged "that the deceased, William Barry, in 1820 invested 10,000l. navy five per cents. in trustees to pay him the dividends for life, then in trust for such person or persons as he by his last will in writing, or by any writing purporting to be or being in the nature of his last will, or any codicil or codicils thereto to be by him signed and published in the presence of and attested by two or more credible witnesses, should direct; and in default of such direction, or so far as any such appointment, if incomplete, should not extend, then in trust for such purposes as therein expressed and declared: that on the 2d of October, 1821, he made a will, appointing the trustees executors under it; and that this will was duly attested by two wit-[250]-nesses; that on the 16th of June, 1824, he made another will, but attested by one witness only, and died in July, 1824, without having altered or revoked his will of 1821 so far as related to the trust fund."

It was answered—"that in June, 1824, he executed a will, whereby, after referring to the provision of the deed of trust with respect to the 10,000l., he left the same to be disposed of by the said deed, and by his said last will bequeathed the rest of his property, and appointed his brother sole executor (who renounced); and, revoking all former wills by the said will, declared the same to be 'his only last will;' and that therefore the Court would confirm the letters of administration heretofore granted to the deceased's father."

Lushington and Addams for the executors and trustees. This Court is always anxious to enable a party to have the benefit of a construction of a testamentary paper by the Court of Chancery: and that Court, before it will decide upon an instrument, invariably requires, if in the nature of a will, that it should first be proved in the Ecclesiastical Court (Ross v. Ewer, 3 Atk. 160, 356). The question to be decided in Chancery will be, whether the property is available for the deceased's debts. Our prayer is that probate may be granted of the will of 1824 and of so much of the will of 1821 as is limited to an execution of the power, as together containing the deceased's will. That [251] seems to us the proper course: for the latter will, being only attested by one witness, cannot operate on the settled property, nor revoke the former will as far as it applies to that property.

The King's advocate and Nicholl contrà. The question is whether two inconsistent wills formally drawn up, regularly and duly executed to carry personalty, each, as far as the intention and belief of the deceased go, complete, and distinct and independent in all its parts and dispositions, can be taken together. The will of 1821 has no clause of revocation, but the latter will has. A power, created by a man in limitation of his own rights, is to be construed less strictly against him. The Courts follow a clear expression of intention when the donor and donee are the same. Supposing no prior existing operative instrument, if the latter will purported to make an appointment of trust money, equity would supply a defective execution. Sayle v. Freeland (2 Ventris, 350). A will and a paper purporting to be a will are synonymous. Longford v. Eyre (1 P. Wms. 740). If a power is to be executed by a will, or paper purporting to be a will, such paper must have all the properties of a will: inter alia, it must be revocable and by the same means as other wills; and herein differs from a power under a deed. Sugden on Powers, 315, 329-30. The settlement enjoins two requisites for an instrument to convey away the 10,000l. different from the provisions of the settlement. 1st. That the [252] disposition should be by last will: 2d. That the will should be executed in the presence of two witnesses. Here, one is the last will, but attested by one witness; the other is attested by two witnesses, but is not the last will. Neither, therefore, is a due compliance with the settlement. Then, as there is no appointment or direction by will, the money must pass under the settlement —it must pass as provided for in default of an appointment. This is the express intention of the will of 1824. "I will and direct that the same (viz. the 10,000l.) be held by my trustees for the same ends, intents, and purposes as are expressed and declared in the said indenture of the 10th of August, 1820." This is no substantive disposition, but a mere declaration that he had no intention to appoint: but it is not necessary to rely upon this; there is a positive revocation.

The same formalities are not required for revocation as for execution. Between the statutes of wills (32 Hen. 8, c. 37; 34 & 35 Hen. 8, c. 5) and the statute of frauds (29 Car. 2, c. 3) wills in writing could be revoked by parol. Cranvel v. Saunders (Cro. Jac. 497). Under sections 5 and 6 of the statute of frauds what is requisite for the execution of a will is different from what is requisite for its revocation; a writing signed in the presence of three witnesses, but not attested in the presence of the testator, might revoke, though it could not dispose. Other revocations—as cancellation, burning, tearing—are effected without any witnesses. The 12 Car. 2, c. 24, s. 8, which allows a testamentary appointment of guardians, requires two witnesses: but any paper directly [253] purporting to revoke, unless the revocation is expressly, or by implication, conditional on the completion of a new disposition, is sufficient to revoke a previous appointment of a guardian, made in conformity with the provisions of that statute. Ex parte Lord Ilchester (7 Vesey, 348). Here the paper is competent to effect all it purports; and revokes the former disposition—not by a new and substantive disposition to which it is incompetent, but by express and positive words. A Court of probate—whose object is to follow the intention of a testator—is bound to look with jealousy at an attempt to throw impediments in the way of a free disposition, and will uphold the doctrine that testamentary intentions are ambulatory. In this case the first intention of the testator was clearly departed from, and the last explicitly declared, a month before his death, in a will duly executed to carry personalty according to law, by a person capable, under ordinary circumstances, to execute a will. This is not like the case of a married woman, where the power is the foundation of the will; but here a common right is limited by the act of the party. The settlement is to be construed to restrain a disposition of that property by any instrument other than a will executed in the presence of two witnesses, but not to restrain a revocation, neither expressly nor by implication forbidden by the settlement.

This revocation is not subservient, as in Onions v. Tyrer (1 Peere Wms. 343), to a new disposition invalid by reasons either intrinsic or dehors, but to a new disposition valid in all its parts.

[254] Judgment—Sir John Nicholl [after shortly stating from the petition the facts of the case and the prayers on both sides]. The latter instrument, so far as respects personal property, is a completely valid will; and of the intention of the testator there is no doubt: it is clear that he intended the 10,000l. should pass under the deed of trust; and he has inserted in the latter will an express revocatory clause: the former paper, therefore, so far as respects this Court, is revoked and is no longer a will. How can this Court grant probate of a former paper as containing, together with a complete will revoking all former wills, the will of the deceased?

It is true that the statute of frauds (29 Car. 2, c. 3) has declared that certain formalities are necessary to revoke a will of lands; but there is no clause in this deed referring to a revocatory paper; the deceased has imposed upon himself the restriction of not altering the disposition of the deed except by a will attested by two witnesses; but he has not imposed upon himself any restriction as to revoking that will in the way in which a will of personalty may ordinarily be revoked. The will of 1824 in express terms revokes all former wills, and declares that he reverts to the disposition of the trust deed. I am of opinion that the right to do that was not taken from him; that I must consider this as his only will, and that no former will exists, and that, on the authorities stated by counsel, other Courts would hold the same principle. If, however, the former paper be [255] good as an appointment, the party must resort to other jurisdictions, but I am of opinion that, as far as this Court is concerned, the administration with the will of 1824 annexed was rightly granted.

IN THE GOODS OF LADY HATTON FINCH. Prerogative Court, Easter Term, 19th March, 1830.—On complaint against a proctor of an extortionate charge (88l. 4s. 4d.) for taking out probate in common form, the bill was referred to the registrars, who reported the proper charge to be 52l. 15s. 8d. The Court suspended the proctor for three months and condemned him in costs; it being the first time his conduct had been brought before the Court, and a medical certificate of his inability to attend to business when the bill was delivered being produced.

This was a complaint against Frederick William Pott, respecting his account for passing in common form the probate of a will. The proctor appeared in person, and, in addition to the contents of his memorials and medical certificate, stated (in the course of the observations of the Court) that, if required, he was ready to make oath that the charge complained of was not conformable to his usual habit; and that he had been in practice for twenty years, during which period only one of his bills, before the bill under consideration, had been brought to the notice of the registrar for taxation.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is a complaint laid before the Court against one of its practitioners on account of his having made an exorbitant charge for passing the probate of a will in common form. The public are peculiarly entitled to be protected against charges for business of this sort, because, being ex parte, it is less likely to come under the immediate notice of the Court than contested busi-[256]-ness: but the Court, under the authority inherent in every Court over its practitioners, is bound to examine such complaints, and to correct the proctor if the complaint be well founded.

The bill, as delivered, after deducting 480l. "cash for duty," left the proctor's charge at 88l. 4s. 4d. This bill was, upon application to the Court in the usual way, referred to the registrar for examination and report. The registrars (for as it was a matter of importance and delicacy all the registrars together took the bill into consideration) heard the proctor who delivered the bill and the proctor of the complainant, and they reported the bill at 52l. 15s. 8d.: thus from 88l. 4s. 4d. taking off 35l. 8s. 8d. as an overcharge—that is, considerably above one-third of the whole bill.

When the report was made by the registrar the proctor sent in a memorial in which he did not attempt to justify the charge; but the excuse offered was that he was ill at the time (and a medical certificate has been exhibited in proof of that fact); that the bill was made out by his clerk, and "that he never saw, read over, or was informed of a single item contained in the bill, and that it was made out totally in error and from inexperience." He afterwards delivered a further memorial, stating that in passing this business there were some circumstances attended with unusual trouble: the Court, then, in order to give the proctor every fair opportunity of exculpating himself, referred the bill back to the registrars for their reconsideration, whether the memorials contained any reasons for altering [257] their report; the answer was that they saw no ground for varying the report: the Judge inquired of the registrar whether, in proof of the bill having been drawn through the error and inexperience of the clerk, the proctor had offered to produce his books; the answer was that he had not made any such offer, and, on its being proposed to him, he had declined to produce them: the proctor now in open Court admits the correctness of that statement.

These, then, are the facts: here is an overcharge of 35l. 8s. 8d., being above one-third of the whole bill. The circumstance that the proctor was ill and never saw the bill would have been much in the proctor's favour if he could have shewn that the bill was framed entirely by the error and inexperience of the clerk—even that would be no complete exoneration of himself; for if a proctor who is ill has only an inexperienced clerk, he should not authorize such a clerk to make out and deliver a bill without submitting it to the revision of some other experienced practitioner; but the excuse fails in this case, for, as the proctor has declined the offer of producing his books, I must presume that the bill was made out, not by the inexperience of the clerk and through error, but conformably to the general charges made by this proctor.

Such being the view which the Court is compelled to take of the matter, there devolves upon the Judge the very painful duty of applying the proper correction. Strongly as the inclination of the Court may be disposed towards lenity, it is yet due to the interests of the public, and to the character of the profession, to administer [258] that degree of correction which shall be sufficient by the example to put a stop to such malpractices.

On the favorable side it must not be overlooked that this is the first complaint against the individual either of this or of any other sort: a former delinquency, even of a different description, would have called for a heavier punishment on the second offence.

The Court, upon the whole, thinks that the ends of justice will be satisfied by a suspension of three months, and by payment of the costs occasioned by the reference of the bill to the registrars.

IN THE GOODS OF ELIZABETH ADAMS. Prerogative Court, Easter Term, 4th Session, 1830.—Without the consent or citation of the next of kin the Court will not, on motion supported by affidavit of the drawer (the executor and a legatee), grant probate of a will, unsigned, dated some years before, and with an attestation clause and no witnesses, and a recent codicil with a space between the last clause and signature.

On motion.

The deceased died on the 6th of March, 1830: she left a will, dated on the 10th of July, 1822, with a formal attestation clause, but no signature nor subscribed witness: also a codicil (referring to the will) written in the summer of 1828: this was signed at the bottom, leaving a large space between the signature and the last clause of the codicil. The property was under 600l.

Curteis, upon the affidavit of the drawer of the will and codicil, who was the sole executor and a legatee in the sum of 10l., moved for probate. The affidavit stated that the deceased, at the time the will was read over to her, fully approved of it, and [259] said that she would postpone the execution of it till her return home, when she would ask two ladies with whom she resided to witness it: that the space between the last clause of the codicil and the deceased's signature was purposely left for the insertion of any further legacy.

Per Curiam. Before this grant can pass, there should either be a consent on the part of Mrs. Long, the sister, the sole next of kin, or she should be cited; for I cannot, upon the single affidavit before me, decree probate of these papers. The case must stand over.

GRINDALL v. GRINDALL AND GRINDALL. Prerogative Court, Easter Term, 4th Session, 1830.—An allegation, pleading a verdict in ejectment, and the remarks of the Judge thereon, and the names of the witnesses examined, rejected.

On admission of an allegation.

The allegation in substance pleaded—

1. That an action of ejectment was brought in pursuance of an order of the Court of Chancery by Charles E. Grindall, one of the parties in this cause, against H. E. P. Sturt Grindall, to try the validity of the last will of Thomas Grindall—being the will here propounded—as relating to his real estate; that the same came on for trial in the King's Bench on the 20th of April, 1830, and continued during two days, and that the (special) jury found a [260] verdict for the defendant, thereby establishing the validity of the will, so far as respected the realty; that thereupon the Lord Chief Justice declared "that he perfectly concurred with the jury in their verdict," or to that effect.

2. An official copy of the record of the judgment on the verdict.

3. That on the said action the following witnesses [enumerating twenty-three—among whom were the drawer of, and subscribed witnesses to, the will, and four medical men] were examined on behalf of the defendant, and submitted to cross-examination: that for the plaintiff twelve witnesses [and among them John Stone Grindall, the brother of the plaintiff, and one of the parties in the above cause] were examined; and that the whole of the said witnesses, except J. S. Grindall and two other of the plaintiff's witnesses, have been, or are intended to be, examined as witnesses in this cause.

Phillimore opposed the allegation.

Lushington and Dodson contrà. It was said that a verdict in an action of ejectment, for the purpose of trying the validity of the will as to realty, is not admissible in a suit respecting the same will in these courts. But a verdict in assumpsit was admitted in Dew v. Clark.(a) [261] The allegation is admissible to shew that the

---

(a) February 23, 1824.—The allegation in the case referred to in the text consisted of twenty-two articles, of which the 16th and 17th pleaded a verdict in substance as follows:—"That the husband of Mrs. Dew, as sole heiress at law of the deceased (in order to try the question of the deceased's sanity at the execution of the will), brought in June, 1822, an action in the King's Bench against F., the devisee in trust, for money received by him as rent of freehold property accrued since the deceased's death: that issue was joined on a plea of non-assumpsit; and on the 20th of December a verdict with costs was given for the plaintiff: that F. defended the action under the direction of the nephews [the residuary legatees under the will, and the parties to the suit in the Prerogative Court]; and in the course of the proceedings changed from his own attorney to the confidential attorney of the nephews, and that he has been since reimbursed his costs by the nephews, or that they have made themselves responsible for them."

From reference to three different notes of the argument it would seem that the main objection to the plea was that Mrs. Dew, the deceased's daughter, had, in her former allegation, only set up a case of insanity quoad hanc; and that the plea then under discussion alleged general insanity, and pleaded facts not noviter perventa; the introduction of this verdict was also objected to; and the argument on this point was, in substance, as follows:—"Verdict on action in assumpsit against a devisee in trust, not one of the parties here, is pleaded. If verdicts of this kind are to be admitted, it should be stated whether any defence or not, whether witnesses examined, but objectionable altogether."

Contrà. "Verdict not conclusive, but adminicular evidence. Dr. Lushington says, none such has been given during his time; if not so, a short time before" (probably alluding to Mill v. Mill and Leslie, in 1807, reported infra, p. 264, n.). Verdicts in matrimonial cases are inter alios acta: so in writs de lunatico inquirendo.

The Court rejected from the 3d to the 9th articles inclusive, as remote, equivocal, or sufficiently pleaded in the 1st article; and admitted the rest, saying, in the course of its observations on the plea, and on the objections thereto, that, "considering Mrs. Dew was the only child, and that her former plea was given in hastily, at the same time as the condidit, for the purpose of examining witnesses of advanced age, it was not inclined too rigidly to exclude any thing."

From this admission the nephews appealed to the Court of Delegates: Mrs. Dew did not appeal.

The arguments, which were at considerable length, were directed almost entirely to the point that the allegation set up a different case from the former, and pleaded matter not responsive, nor noviter perventa. The objection to the verdict was shortly renewed, as appears from two notes, the substance of which is as follows:—

witnesses examined in this cause have undergone an examination before a jury; and the relative weight given, at common law, to their testimony. The declaration of the Judge is [262] important as a valuable confirmation of the decision of the jury.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. It is well worth consideration whether it would be desirable to admit such verdicts. Divorce causes are under very particular and special circumstances. To this action the heir at law [263] alone was the party, and the verdict might, possibly, be by collusion. The Ecclesiastical Court must decide on its own evidence. This allegation would tend to expence and delay; if the one party is entitled to plead that the Chief Justice approved of the verdict, the other party is entitled to plead that he disapproved; and then this Court would be required to try the propriety of the verdict, and the Chief Justice might be called on to be examined as to his opinion. In Price v. Clark and Pugh (a)[1] the question was raised and decided on much consideration. I am disposed to follow that decision, unless authorities, quite in point, can be shewn of a contrary purport. Verdicts may possibly have been admitted in some instances, not as evidence on the main question, but as affecting costs, where there was an appearance of delay, and that the suit was vexatious and litigious.(b) I do not, at the present moment, recollect the circumstances under which the verdict in Dew v. Clark was admitted; possibly it was on some such grounds: but assuming that I did there, inadvertently and erroneously, admit such a verdict, I do not feel myself precluded by that circumstance from reverting to what appears to me the ancient and more correct practice. In [264] Mill v. Mill and Leslie (a)[2] a [Dr. Adams, Dr. Lushington, and John Williams in objection to the 16th and 17th articles.] Judgment went by default; it was an undefended cause; the plaintiff obtained his verdict, the defendant not appearing and making no defence; the verdict proves nothing—is not legal evidence—will lead to further pleading.

---

Hullock, Baron. The verdict can be no evidence as to capacity: but may it not affect costs?

Argument. It certainly has no bearing upon the sanity: how far it may have an effect on the question of costs we do not wish to examine.

Jenner and Phillimore contrà. These articles are pleaded as shewing the conduct of the parties: they bear on the circumstances of the case, and on costs. At law the daughter's rights could only be impeached by setting up this will. The nephews would not go to a jury. Exhibit No. 3 shews that 3l. 18s. 9d. was the sum recovered, but that the costs amounted to 376l. 1s. 3d. Such large costs prove that the parties must have been prepared to go into the whole case, and that the nephews afterwards abandoned it. It is said that this should have been pleaded before; but judgment was not obtained till February, 1823, although the verdict was obtained on the 20th of December, 1822. The former allegation was given in July, 1822: the verdict, therefore, could not have been pleaded at an earlier period.

The Court affirmed the decree of the Prerogative Court with 100l. nomine expensarum.

Note.—In Grindall v. Grindall it was not stated that the allegation in Dew v. Clark had been before the Court of Delegates.

(a)[1] See the next case.

(b) As one of the next of kin, a party to this suit, was examined, at common law, against the validity of the will, it is clear that a verdict against the will could not have been received: and as "nobody can take benefit by a verdict who had not been prejudiced by it, had it gone contrary" (1 Phillipps' Evid. p. 309, 6th edit. citing Gilb. Ev. 28), the verdict for the will was not admissible. If these verdicts were evidence in the Ecclesiastical Courts, it is conceived that legatees and others, interested in the personalty, would not be competent witnesses in the action at common law.

(a)[2] Mill v. Mill and Leslie. Prerogative, Easter Term, 1st Session, 1807.

On admission of an allegation.

Dr. Arnold and Dr. Adams in objection.

Sir John Nicholl (King's adv.), Dr. Laurence, and Dr. Burnaby contrà. [No cases in which verdicts had been admitted were cited.]

Per Curiam (Sir Wm. Wynne). Three codicils are propounded and opposed: the will is not opposed. A long allegation, in answer to the allegation propounding these papers, pleading insanity and incapacity, has been admitted. The present plea is responsive; the bulk of it, which is not objected to, goes to shew the connexion verdict was admitted principally as bearing on costs: but, besides, it was part of a long allegation otherwise admissible, and the admission might produce less expence and delay than if the allegation had been reformed. Here the verdict may be brought in at any time as an exhibit, for the purpose of affecting the question of costs: but if now admitted, it might have a very improper effect and lead to much expensive litigation.

[265] Dr. Lushington stated that though he had felt bound, in conformity with the precedent in Dew v. Clark, to offer this allegation, his own opinion was adverse to the admissibility of such verdicts.

Allegation rejected.

PRICE v. CLARK AND PUGH. Arches, 7th May, 1795.—A verdict in an action of ejectment cannot be pleaded in a testamentary cause.

An allegation, responsive to one given in the Court of Appeal,(a) pleaded in the first and second articles a verdict in an action of ejectment [266] establishing the validity of the will. These articles were objected to.

---

between the deceased and the party benefited. The 6th and 7th articles, which plead that a verdict at law has been given in favour of the earliest of these codicils, are opposed; and the question is whether they can be, in any way, relevant or of use. It is true that this Court must decide upon its own evidence, and this is not offered as decisive or conclusive; but is the verdict of any weight in this Court? Verdicts are received in divorce causes; in testamentary causes verdicts under a commission of lunacy and of a coroner's inquest are received.* If there be evidence in favor of the codicil, this verdict may possibly give it some additional weight; at least it will be satisfactory to know that another Court was of the same opinion: but what chiefly weighs with me is that it would tend to shew the conduct of the parties, and thus bear on the question of costs: there is an appearance of delay, and it may shew that the opposition is vexatious and litigious. Under these circumstances, particularly, I shall admit the allegation.

(a) Price v. Clark and Pugh. Trinity Term, 2nd Session, 1794.—On appeals from definitive sentences, matter which could have been pleaded below, and which directly contradicts the plea on which witnesses have been examined below, is not admissible: but matter more generally responsive may with caution be received, especially where the cause has not been properly conducted in the Court below.

On appeal from Hereford.

This cause respected the will of Samuel Williams: the will was dated on the 29th of August, 1791; and the party died three weeks afterwards: it was propounded in a common condidit, upon which the three subscribing witnesses were examined: the executors afterwards gave in an allegation, and examined witnesses upon it. The Court below pronounced for the will. Upon an appeal from this sentence the next of kin, who had hitherto given no plea, now offered an allegation: and, upon the admissibility of this plea, the Dean of the Arches observed:

Per Curiam (Sir Wm. Wynne). It has been said that though the Court, even in an appeal from a definitive sentence, may admit an allegation, yet that it ought to be cautious, and not allow any thing to be pleaded which could have been pleaded below, and which directly contradicts the plea on which witnesses have been examined in the Court below (Oughton, tit. 318, s. 1). This is a rule which the Court will observe as exactly as it can; but where causes come from country courts, this Court cannot always, consistently with justice, observe it: because, in the Courts below, causes are often awkwardly conducted. I have looked into the proceedings, and all that I will say is that they are such that the Court is not inclined to reject any thing which may tend to elucidate the transaction. I think there is something which requires examination.

The first article pleads, in contradiction to the condidit, incapacity at the time of the execution: it is so contrary to all rules to admit, on an appeal from a definitive sentence, witnesses to speak to a fact directly pleaded and examined to, that I must reject this article. The second, "that the deceased, though his bodily strength was

---

* See 1 Starkie on Evid. 275-8, as to the grounds on which such verdicts (which are analogous to adjudications in rem) are received in evidence.

[267] Per Curiam. I wish to know whether there is any instance where a verdict at common law has been received in a testamentary cause: if not, I shall be unwilling to break in upon the practice. I shall let the allegation stand over for inquiry.

On a subsequent day the Court delivered its opinion as follows:—

Judgment—Sir William Wynne. This is a testamentary cause; and is here by an appeal from Hereford, where, on the 10th of August, 1793, sentence was given for the will; an appeal was prosecuted on the second session of Trinity Term, 1794, an allega- was admitted in this Court on behalf of the appellant, the opponent of the will: and now an allegation is offered responsive, pleading a verdict in a cause of ejectment tried at the assizes at Shrewsbury, in which the question was whether the testator was of sound mind and capable at the time of making the will, and a verdict was given for Margaret Williams, the defendant, the real party here. The se-[268]-cond article exhibits a copy of the judgment. On debate it occurred to me that it was a new practice. I did not recollect an instance, and no case was quoted, where a verdict in ejectment had been pleaded. Counsel alluded to cases in the Consistory Court in causes of adultery where verdicts for damages against the party seducing have been admitted; and it is now the usual practice. The Court thought that even there the practice was novel; for in 1736, in the case of Dinely v. Dinely, the Court of Delegates refused to admit the verdict. Now, however, the practice to receive them is not to be controverted: but it is said by counsel that those cases are not parallel with a testamentary cause: and I think truly; for as matrimonial causes may be brought by collusion, the Court is always to proceed with extreme caution; and I think that, therefore, such cases are not parallel with a testamentary cause, where there is no reason to suppose that the parties are not sincere in their opposition to each other. Considering these circumstances, I took to this day to inquire whether, in any testamentary cause, such a verdict had been received; and after all the inquiry I have made, I cannot find an instance where an article has been admitted introducing a verdict: nor do I find any instance in which it has been attempted and rejected. The absence of all precedent proves, I think, that in practice a verdict in ejectment is not considered admissible evidence; because, without doubt, cases in which the will has been put in question, both in the ecclesiastical and common law Courts, are very frequent; and, in such cases, it generally happens, from the different [269] mode of proceeding, that the verdict will be obtained first: but still the attempt has never been made.

---

much impaired, was in his senses, notwithstanding a paralytic stroke twenty years before, and so continued till a second stroke; that he had a second stroke six weeks before his death, which rendered him incapable, and that he was so considered." It is material for the Court to know the state of the deceased's mind and body: a weakness of body makes a man liable to imposition; the first part of this article is therefore proper: but "that he was struck with a second paralytic stroke six weeks before his death," &c. this may introduce evidence contradictory to witnesses on the codicil: still, however, under the circumstances of the case, I will admit general evidence of the state of the deceased's capacity.

3. "That before this fit he made a declaration in favor of his relations; and further pleaded the importunity of his wife with great passion." This is proper to admit. It appears that there was a controversy between the deceased and his wife about the disposal of some effects. I think that this article is material to shew the deceased's intention, and the attempt of his wife.

The 4th states more than the mere disposition of the will; for it pleads a relationship of some of the legatees with the deceased's wife.

5. That the wife was violent, kept her husband in subjugation, and prevented a communication with his relations: this is material, for though it pleads not incapacity, yet it tends to shew a complete subjugation to the wife.

The 6th pleads circumstances respecting a will said to be made by the deceased two years before his death, whilst he was ill; that it was obtained by the procurement of the wife, who was violent. This regards a will not before the Court, but the article charges that it was done by the direction of the wife; that two persons, executors in this will, were present; and that the same person wrote that will who wrote the present. This is an accusation of the same nature as that charged here on the same person; and I cannot reject it: but I reject a conversation of the wife afterwards pleaded. When these articles are reformed, I admit the allegation.

I believe that what the practitioners have in general understood is, that a verdict is irrelevant and not proper to be received. If, then, it be so; if there be no precedent to guide me, the point comes to be considered on principle, and on the reason of the thing. There are many cases where the parties in both Courts are the same, where proceedings may be, and have been, introduced from one Court into another. There are also instances in which depositions from Chancery have been here introduced: as in Middleton v. Forbes,(a)[1] depositions relating to a deed of gift by the party whose will was contested (Wells v. Middleton, 1 Cox, 112): so also in Bainbridge v. Gee, Hilary Term, 1777, depositions between the same parties in the Exchequer were received. The practice in Chancery is the same. Mildmay v. Mildmay.(c) But in all these cases the very evidence itself, which was given in the other Court, was received. The Judge, therefore, had the opportunity of weighing the evidence given in another Court with the evidence of the same witnesses, or of other witnesses in his own Court: he had then before him that upon which he could form his own opinion: then the objection was taken away.

There are also other cases where a verdict is introduced into the Ecclesiastical Court, and is [270] binding; and vice versâ, where the sentence of these Courts is introduced into, and is conclusive upon, other Courts: as where a clergyman is accused of a crime indictable at common law, and for which he may be deprived in the Ecclesiastical Court, the verdict there is conclusive evidence; and the Court must admit the verdict as proof of his conviction and guilt, and must proceed thereon.(a)[2] So, in common law, where the legality and not merely the fact of marriage is in question, the Court writes to the ordinary: the ordinary tries and certifies, and the Court is bound by his certificate.(b) If an action is brought upon a contract of marriage, and before the marriage act a proceeding was had here on the same contract, and sentence against it, such sentence was held binding in a Court of Common Law. Da Costa v. Villa Real (2 Strange, 960), Hatfield v. Hatfield (5 Brown, P. C. 100). The principle is, that the Court, before which the verdict or sentence of another Court is brought, was not competent in jurisdiction to examine, or to determine upon, the facts; and the judgment introduced was therefore conclusive.(e) That is not the case in a testamentary cause; for the Ecclesiastical Court is as competent to determine on a will of personal estate as a Court of Common Law on a will of real estate: it is not suggested, indeed, [271] that the verdict is binding and conclusive, but that it is circumstantial evidence: I cannot see how the Court can pay any regard to it in that light. Suppose the Court should think that the executors fail in proof of the will, would any counsel take upon himself to argue—"I think the evidence before the Court is insufficient; but here is a verdict by which it is apparent that another Court has pronounced for the will, therefore though there is no legal evidence here you must pronounce for it, because another Court has." This cannot be said. What is the use of the verdict? If there be sufficient legal evidence here, I shall pronounce for the will; then the verdict is of no avail: but if there be not sufficient evidence I cannot, upon the ground of the verdict, pronounce against the evidence before me. Then I do not see upon what ground it is relevant.

But it does not rest here: for I think pleading a verdict is not only useless, but may be productive of great inconvenience, and of that this allegation affords a strong instance. The first article pleads that "at the trial at law the question was whether, at the time of making the will, the testator was of sound mind and capable:" but this is not the issue before me. The allegation of the next of kin here pleads "that Ralph Heartshorn wrote the will by the direction of Margaret Williams without the consent of the deceased; that it was carried into the room where the deceased lay

---

(a)[1] For the judgment and some further particulars of that case, see 1 Hagg. Ecc. 395.

(c) 1 Vernon, 53. In Taylor v. Bouchier the Master of the Rolls made a general order for reading the proceedings in the Prerogative Court. See 4 Bro. P. C. 715.

(a)[2] Searle's case, Hob. 121, and see 1 Hagg. Con. 141, in notis; also Wilkinson v. Gordon, 2 Add. 158.

(b) See Ilderton v. Ilderton, 2 H. Bl. 145; 1 Phillipps' Ev. p. 322, 6th edit.; 2 Starkie Ev. p. 217; Woolrych on Certificates, s. 2, p. 10.

(e) Cases of this class are proceedings in rem: as to which and the effect of sentences therein, see 1 Starkie Ev. p. 227, 231, 243.

groaning, and it was signed under the controul of the wife." Then here are facts to overthrow the will, though the deceased might be of sane mind. It is also pleaded "that she was of a violent temper." Dr. [272] Nicholl, her counsel, who was aware of this, has said that the plea was incautiously drawn; that it might have been more proper to plead generally that the question was upon the validity of the will, and that the verdict was for the defendant. Suppose it had been so: that would not remove the objection. If the verdict had been pleaded generally, and the allegation had been admitted; and the other party had given an allegation that the question of custody was not matter before the jury, for that there was no evidence to that fact, I do not see how the Court could reject that allegation: for if it is relevant for one party to give an allegation pleading the verdict, it is relevant for the other to say it does not apply to the facts in issue in this Court. Suppose again, after publication, the party was to say, "I will shew that the evidence before the jury differed materially from that now given, and will prove it:" could the Court properly reject an allegation for that purpose? if not, what a door to litigation and expence would be opened—an inquiry into what was done in another Court: the inconvenience would be infinite and endless: therefore if it be res integra, which I take it to be, the Court ought not to admit the plea, but ought to adhere to the ancient and established practice that you shall not be at liberty to give a judgment of another Court in proof where the Court cannot see the evidence upon which that judgment was given; but that the Court is to decide secundum allegata et probata. I will not make a precedent, thinking it will lead to inconvenience: I shall therefore reject the first and second articles of this allegation.

Allegation reformed.

[273] KEMBLE AND SMALES v. CHURCH. Prerogative Court, 8th March, 1830.—Where the attesting witnesses—disinterested medical men—speak strongly to sanity, the Court will not set aside a will on proof by interrogatories, but without plea, that the deceased, many years before, had been under an insane delusion.

Elizabeth Wilson died on the 18th of September, 1829, a widow, of the age of 70 years, leaving three daughters and a son. By her will and two codicils dated, and executed, on the 10th of September, 1829, she left, among other legacies, 400l. in specific bequests to different charities, and, to several dissenting ministers, some legacies of 50l. each, and the residue among her children. She appointed Henry Kemble, a friend of the deceased, and her cousin, Maria Smales, who had lived with the deceased and her mother for a great many years, executors, and legatees of 50l. each; and to Maria Smales she also gave an annuity of 25l. The object of the first codicil was to secure to her married daughter, Mrs. Church, her share independent of her husband; and upon her death, to her children: the second codicil—instead of increasing the annuity to Miss Smales to 50l., which the deceased, at the execution of the will, had at first contemplated—left her a small leasehold cottage. The will was in the hand-writing of Miss Smales, and was pleaded to have been prepared from a former will drawn up in 1827, and from verbal instructions from the deceased; but that she declined to execute it at that time, as she had not made up her mind as to the disposition of her property to Mrs. Church. The deceased, in the beginning of September, went to Southampton, and was [274] there seized with a severe illness. On the morning of the 10th her medical attendants pronounced her in danger, and being informed that her will was unexecuted, she was asked if she wished to execute it, and she gave an affirmative answer. Dr. Down, her physician, understanding that the will had not been prepared by a professional man, recommended that one should see it. An attorney was accordingly called in, and after some blanks were filled up, and some alterations made, Dr. Down read the will over to the deceased, in the course of which she suggested an additional annuity to Miss Smales, which ultimately ended in the making of the second codicil and the substitution of the small cottage; the will was again read a second time to the deceased, who, having approved it, was raised in bed for the execution, when a book was brought for her to rest the paper upon: but, after looking at it, she said, "I won't use that, it is the Bible." The four witnesses, viz. the two medical men, the attorney, and Mrs. Margaret Smales, the aunt of the executrix, examined upon the allegation given in on behalf of the executors deposed that they entertained no doubt of her capacity and volition.

On interrogatories it appeared that, seventeen years before her death, the deceased had been affected with insane delusions, chiefly on religious matters; and, in June, 1828, had experienced a return of the malady: and, from that time to her death, was attended by a nurse accustomed to the care of persons afflicted in that way; but there was no proof of the presence of this malady, or of any symptoms of it, [275] either at the time the will was prepared, or at the time of the execution.

Addams and Haggard for the executors. The will and codicils are opposed by the husband of Mrs. Church, who has been admitted a contradictor for this purpose, but his wife, the daughter of the deceased, has declined to join in the proxy. There is no case in which insanity has been allowed to be made out on interrogatories merely; but we have established a lucid interval; though to do it we were not bound.

Lushington and Dodson contrà. The principles applicable to this case are defined in the recent case of Groom and Evans v. Thomas (2 Hag. Ecc. 433). Here insanity is proved; the onus to rebut it is upon those who had the means of ascertaining a return to soundness. The nurse has not been examined. At the execution of these papers the deceased's particular delusions were not touched upon. If a will may not be set aside on evidence obtained upon cross-examination alone without pleading, what is the effect of calling for proof in solemn form of law? The allegation pleads soundness of mind—and the evidence negatives it. There is a failure of proof as to sanity.

Per Curiam. What do the attesting witnesses say?

[276] Argument. They put no question to the deceased, except as to her immediate illness, and her state of health.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The inclination of my opinion is strong in favour of this paper. Where there are two attesting witnesses, both being medical men, and in attendance upon the deceased; and when she herself at the execution directs an additional bequest, approves of what she is about to sign, and is shewn to manifest capacity and volition, it would be the strangest thing to pronounce against the paper, because it appeared, on interrogatory, that, about seventeen years before, the deceased had laboured under insane delusions. The witnesses are disinterested—the medical men perfectly so: they were aware that she had been under delusion, but saw no appearance of it at the time. If there had been a case to set aside the will, it should have been put in plea. It is my present impression that I must pronounce for the papers propounded.

The cause stood over till the 19th, when the Court decreed probate to the executors of the will and codicils; and recommended that the expences should be paid out of the estate.

[277] MILLER v. WASHINGTON. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 1st Session, 1830.—Where administration to a person long dead was prayed by a creditor, and there had been no personal service on the next of kin (who had no known agent in this country), the Court required full information as to the debt and the cause of the delay, and that notice should be given to the next of kin in the West Indies.

On motion.

William M'Gill died in the West Indies in 1809, intestate, leaving Mrs. Washington, his niece and next of kin, now resident at Nevis, and who has no agent in this country. In 1815 Mr. Ward, formerly Judge of the Vice Admiralty Court at Nevis, and a creditor of the deceased, died, having appointed Sarah Miller his residuary legatee; she proved the will, and thus became a creditor of M'Gill's estate. The debt amounted to more than 500l., and exceeded the effects.

On 20th of April, 1830, a decree with intimation was served upon the Royal Exchange; and Lushington now moved, on behalf of the creditrix, for an administration to M'Gill.

Per Curiam. M'Gill has been dead upwards of twenty years: when such a length of time is suffered to elapse, and when there has been no personal service on the next of kin, the Court requires a fuller account as to how the debt was incurred, and what is the proof of it: the Court must also be furnished with a fuller affidavit of the particulars of the debt, and an explanation why an earlier application has not been made. Mr. Ward, the original creditor, died in 1815, and his representative has not taken any steps towards this administration till the present year. [278] As the applicant has waited so long, and as the niece is resident in the island of Nevis, some notice should be given to her; a mere service on the Royal Exchange is not sufficient; Mrs. Washington may be ignorant of her uncle's property; and for the present I must reject the motion, but I will allow a fresh decree to issue, which may be served upon Mrs. Washington: and I wish it to be considered rather as a general rule that where a next of kin or party in distribution is as accessible as in this case, a notice should be sent to the party.(a) Motion to stand over.

[279] COPELAND v. RIVERS. Prerogative Court, Trinity Term, 2nd Session, 1830. —The residuary legatee in trust having renounced administration cum testamento annexo for the purpose of being examined as a witness, the Court, hesitatingly, but as matter of necessity, appointed a next friend guardian ad litem in order to propound, on behalf of the minors, residuary legatees, the paper which their father opposed; but required the guardian to give security for costs.

On motion.

Josiah Rivers died on 10th of March, 1830, leaving a testamentary paper, unexecuted and without date. By it he had appointed William Taylor Copeland residuary legatee in trust for the children of William Rivers, the deceased's brother. William Rivers opposed the will; and Mr. Copeland, who was willing to take administration with the will annexed, had renounced in order to be examined in support of it. The property was under 2000l.

The King's advocate moved for the appointment of William Hammersley, Esq., as guardian to the minors for the purpose of propounding the paper.

Per Curiam. The minors have not executed a proxy of election, and the eldest is of the age of seventeen. But is there any instance of this Court appointing a next friend as guardian ad litem? Who is to be liable for costs if the paper should not be established? In the Court of Chancery such an appointment is of ordinary occurrence, but here it is a novelty. The circumstances, however, seem to require it; and I shall therefore appoint Mr. Hammersley guardian ad litem: and direct him to give security in 200l. for costs.

Motion granted.

[280] HEADINGTON v. HOLLOWAY. Prerogative Court, 1st June, 1830.—The Court will not pronounce for a paper on the evidence of handwriting alone, but that proof joined with circumstances of probability is sufficient. Costs are peculiarly in the discretion of the Court; and though the general rule is, that a legatee, loco executoris, propounding and establishing a paper is entitled to his costs out of the estate, his unwise delay in producing the paper, and thus occasioning the suit, is a ground for refusing them.

[Applied, Burls v. Burls, 1868, L. R. 1 P. & D. 475.]

Elizabeth Headington, widow, died on the 25th of March, 1829, at the age of

(a) Michaelmas Term, 2nd Session, 1829.—So in David v. Rees, where the will had been proved by the attorney of the executor, who died on the 23d of July, 1829, a decree—at the suit of a legatee, calling upon the executor and residuary legatee, both resident in the West Indies, to shew cause why administration de bonis non, with the will annexed, should not be granted to him, served on the Royal Exchange—was returned into Court on the 1st Session, and an affidavit was made that neither the executor nor residuary legatee had any agent in this country; the Court directed the matter to stand over, saying, "It did not even appear that the executor was acquainted with the death of his attorney; the communication with the West Indies was so easy that some notice should be given to the executor, or, at least, sufficient time should be allowed to elapse, since the attorney's death, for the executor, on receipt of the intelligence, to take probate himself, or appoint a new attorney."

Trinity Term, By-Day, 1830.—In Norrington v. Nembhead the Court granted administration, with a will annexed, to a legatee, on a service on the Royal Exchange, and on an affidavit that there was no agent in this country; observing, "Here the party having died in Jamaica in 1823, the residuary legatee living there, and no steps having been taken to prove the will for so long a time, I will grant this administration to the grand-daughter, who is a legatee; but it is to be understood that, generally, where the parties interested are only in the West Indies, the Court will require notice to be given them by a requisition."

80 years, leaving no near relation: of her will, dated the 11th of September, 1828, she appointed Richard Clement Headington and the Reverend Henry Holloway, the parties in this cause, two of her executors. The question respected a paper propounded by Mr. Holloway as a codicil.

The King's advocate and Addams in support of the paper propounded.

Lushington and Dodson contrà.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The deceased in this cause died in 1829: her husband had died in 1819. Her property is said to be of the value of 10,700l. The paper, propounded as a codicil, is dated on the 12th of October, 1828, and is to this effect:

"I give to my dear Henry [meaning the Reverend Henry Holloway] a policy of insurance on my own life effected in the Sun Life Office for the sum of five thousand pounds, and this may act as a codicil to my last will and testament. (a)

"ELIZABETH HEADINGTON."

This paper is alleged to be in the deceased's [281] handwriting: and though the Court will not pronounce on evidence of handwriting solely,(b) yet when that proof is joined to circumstances rendering the instrument probable and natural, it is not necessary to have any thing more immediately connecting it with the deceased.

The account of this codicil given in the plea is that the deceased, having sealed the paper up in an envelope, delivered it to Mr. Holloway about a week before her death, desiring it might not be opened till after her will was read. This injunction Mr. Holloway observed, and by his concealment of the paper till after the funeral he has led to the present investigation. The deceased died on the 25th of March, and the paper was not produced till the 10th or 11th of April, when he shewed it to Mr. Parnell, the deceased's solicitor, who prepared her will: he, from the late period at which the paper was produced, could not avoid feeling some suspicion, and took up an unfavorable impression of the instrument, because he knew nothing of the paper before it was thus shewn to him; and, undoubtedly, the conduct of Mr. Holloway was extremely incautious.

The deceased, it is true, was very secret: she did not communicate her concerns even to Mr. Parnell, further than his professional assistance was absolutely necessary: and the handwriting [282] of the signature is admitted, by the executor in his answers, to be genuine. The ground of opposition, however, is, that the paper was obtained by undue influence. Mr. Parnell will not go beyond doubting the handwriting of the signature—even as to the body of the instrument his reasons are insufficient—he doubts it, because he thinks it is too well worded for the deceased. But here is also another instrument, written a few months before the will, and found in conjunction with it; this instrument—which is signed, and at the bottom has a bequest to the Reverend Mr. Holloway, the party in this cause—is extremely well written and as well worded as the paper in dispute. There is no reason, then, to suspect any forgery; but yet I do not feel surprised that suspicions should be excited. It appears however that this paper was produced, three days after the deceased's death, to a gentleman, the head clerk in the secretary's department of the Sun Fire Office; and the paper produced on that occasion is clearly identified with the codicil in question; though it was not shewn to Mr. Parnell, nor produced to Mr. Headington, till some time after the death of the deceased, and after the time had been fixed for Mr. Headington to take probate of the will.

In respect to costs, though the general rule is, that when a party propounds a paper, loco executoris (see Williams v. Goude and Bennet, 1 Hagg. Ecc. 610), and establishes it, he is entitled to his costs; yet, adverting to the imprudent and unwise conduct of Mr. Holloway; and that the [283] matter of costs is a question more peculiarly left to the discretion of the Court; and, further, that the rule as to a legatee having his costs out of the estate on establishing a codicil is not so general as in a case of a will, I do not think that his costs—occasioned, as they are, by his own delay in producing the paper—ought to fall on the residue. I direct that Mr. Holloway shall pay his own costs; but that the executors shall have theirs out of the estate.

(a) The deceased, by her will, did not make any provision for the Reverend Mr. Holloway, but she provided for his mother, and also for his two sisters, and appointed the latter residuary legatees.

(b) See Constable v. Steibel and Emanuel, 1 Hagg. Ecc. 60. Crisp and Ryder v. Walpole, 2 Hagg. Ecc. 531.

PEDDLE v. TOLLER. Prerogative Court, 24th July, 1830.—Where a bill of particulars for business done in the Court of Delegates had been recently delivered, though a general account had been rendered, settled, and paid three years before, the Court, on petition (though such petition contained impertinent matter), directed the bill to be examined by the registrar, in order 1st, that the suitor might decide as to proceeding in other Courts to recover the excess (if any); 2dly, to found a complaint against the proctor if the charges were exorbitant or fraudulent; but the Court cannot notice an asserted undertaking that disbursements only, and those not exceeding a certain sum, should be charged; nor will it make an order for the production of vouchers; which, if demanded, are produced as of course before the registrar.—On the registrar's report that the bill was just and reasonable, and on the proctor for the complainant declaring he proceeded no further, costs against the petitioner were not given, only because he was almost a pauper.—The Court will exert all its powers to restrain proctors from undertaking causes on condition of sharing in the effects, or of any benefit beyond the payment of fair costs.—The Court inclines to discountenance an agreement on the part of a proctor to accept only disbursements from his client—an appellant—as it is the policy of the law to protect both respondents and appellants from useless litigation.—When a detailed bill of costs has been delivered and long acquiesced in, and payment made after the suit was at an end and when the party was not inops concilii, the party would not be entitled to have it referred to the registrar for examination: aliter where the payment took place without a detailed bill, and application for reference to the registrar was made shortly after the delivery of the bill.

This was a petition presented by William Peddle, one of the parties in a suit entitled Peddle v. Evans (Prerog. Trin. Term, 1824. Deleg. 20th May, 1826), relative to the conduct of his proctor in that suit; his petition concluded with the following prayer:—"That this honourable Court will order that Messrs. Toller and Son shall produce for the inspection of your petitioner and his present proctor all vouchers, receipts, or other acknowledgments by them or either of them taken on making such payments [those detailed in the petition] respectively, in [284] order that your petitioner or his said proctor may inspect and examine into the correctness of such charges, and be at liberty to make copies or extracts from such vouchers, receipts, or other acknowledgments as occasion may require, or as he may be advised may be necessary; and that Messrs. Toller and Son may be directed to refund to your petitioner the excess they have received over and above the sum of 200l. for their disbursements in the said Court of Delegates, and which was paid them on my account in consequence of the aforesaid (in the petition) misrepresentations of Mr. Toller, of deductions from their bill of business done in this Court, and that in case it shall be found on investigation that their actual and lawful disbursements in the Court of Delegates do not amount to 200l., that they be ordered to refund the full amount of what it shall appear they have so received over and above their actual disbursements, and that they be condemned in the costs attendant upon this application."

The nature of the case sufficiently appears from the sentence.

Phillimore and Lee for the petition.

Addams contrà.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is an application of an unusual if not of an unprecedented nature, being a petition by a party against his former proctors respecting transactions in a certain suit begun in 1822, and [285] finished several years ago. This petition alleges that certain charges, not for business done in this Court but in the Court of Delegates, not contained in a regular bill of costs but made under an asserted special agreement—charges actually paid above three years since—were improper: and the party prays "that the proctors shall be ordered to produce vouchers of their disbursements; that copies of, or extracts from, the vouchers may be taken: that the proctors may be ordered to refund all they have received above 200l. for their disbursements in the Court of Delegates; and, if the disbursements do not amount to 200l., to refund all above their actual disbursements." Such is the substance of the prayer, which is preceded by a detail of all the circumstances happening in the suit, and is supported by the affidavits of the party and his solicitor, and by some correspondence. To this petition an answer was given by the proctors verified by affidavits and correspondence; and, in reply, a further affidavit has been made by the solicitor accompanied by some further correspondence.

The circumstances set forth in the petition and affidavits have now been referred to, and discussed by the counsel on both sides: but those facts only are material for the consideration of the Court which tend to support the prayer of the petition—all other matters are quite extraneous and irrelevant to the present enquiry. The question, however, is of some importance to the proctors, complained of, personally—to the profession in general—and to the suitors of the Court—the public at large. It may therefore be proper to examine some of [286] the points more fully than the mere decision of the prayer of the petition may appear to require.

The first consideration is whether the Court has any and what power to grant the prayer of the petition. The second, what is the proper mode of granting such relief as the Court may have the power of affording.

This Court, like all other Courts, has considerable authority over its own practitioners and officers. This authority forms a part of the jurisdiction inherent in all Courts, which they are bound to exercise for the protection of their suitors against imposition and extortion. The principle has been laid down and acted upon in various instances in the temporal Courts: it will be sufficient here to state one or two cases, though the principle will also appear in some others which will be hereafter referred to for a different purpose. In Newman v. Payne (4 Bro. C. C. 350) the marginal abstract runs thus: "An attorney cannot take from his client a bond for unliquidated costs: notwithstanding such bond and a mortgage have been given, the bills may be taxed, and upon payment the defendant to reconvey—and the bond declared void." The Lord Chancellor said, "I have had no doubt as to the relief in this case: I do not go on any particular rule of equity, but upon a principle that would operate in the same manner in any Court of law. All Courts will protect their suitors, and attornies cannot act, in respect to the parties for whom they are concerned, as other persons may do. [287] I have no doubt what a Court of law would do. The master must tax the costs and take an account of money lent." The same principle of protecting suitors against improper charges is laid down in Balme v. Paver (1 Jacob, 305). These authorities are sufficient to shew that it is the duty of the Court to go as far as it can in relieving the petitioner, if he has any claim to relief: but still that duty is limited by circumstances; it is limited, first, by the powers and jurisdiction belonging to the Court; and, secondly, by circumstances which may have previously taken place.

What are the powers and jurisdiction of this Court in respect to costs between proctor and client incurred in a contested suit? The Court has no power to decide what is due, nor to enforce payment. Even in common form business in which the proctor is acting more in the character of an officer of the Court, and for which there is an established table of fees, and which therefore is subject to a more direct control, the Court has, of its own authority, no such power: but where costs are given against a party, the Court, in order to carry its sentence into execution, is empowered to tax the costs and to enforce payment: but, as between proctor and client, the Court has no such authority: it can neither decide what shall be received nor what shall be paid, nor can it enforce payment. The proctor can only recover his charge by action at law, when he must prove the items of his bill. All that this Court can do is, upon the application of the client, to refer the bill to the [288] registrar for examination. The Court does this for one of two purposes: first, to enable the suitor to judge what he will pay or tender before bringing the matter into a Court of law by refusal of payment; but this is not properly a taxation of the bill: the registrar does not report the bill to the Court: the Judge does not tax the bill—the proctor first making oath that the amount reported has been necessarily expended: nor does the Court issue a monition for the payment of the sum taxed. It has no such authority between proctor and client. The reference to the registrar is merely in aid of justice, and for the convenience of suitors.

The other purpose is, in order to found a complaint of extortion against a proctor, if he has made out and attempted to obtain payment of an exorbitant bill, or of fraudulent charges.

Whether the temporal Courts had, without the authority of an Act of Parliament, any other or greater authority than is now possessed by this Court of proceeding in a summary mode between solicitor and client, or attorney and party, it is immaterial to enquire; but it is certain that, in order to regulate such matters, it was thought expedient to obtain an Act of Parliament under the authority of which, and under certain regulations therein specified, proceedings in the temporal Courts now take place (see 2 G. 2, c. 23, s. 23). First, it is upon the party submitting to pay the sum taxed that he is entitled to demand a taxation. Secondly, if he neglects to pay the sum taxed he is liable to an attachment, enforcing payment summarily, or the attorney may still [289] bring his action at law. Thirdly, it is the officer of the Court and not the Judge who is to tax the bill. But there is no such act applying to the Ecclesiastical Courts. Here, after the registrar has examined the bill the client is not obliged to pay the amount, nor the proctor to receive it, nor can the Court enforce payment. In the present case this Court (supposing the money had not already been paid) could not compel Peddle to pay the amount which the registrar might think to be the sum due. The Court, nevertheless, at the prayer of Peddle, is now called upon (as I have before said) to compel the proctor to refund a part of the money already paid for charges in the Court of Delegates—not upon a regular bill of costs made out as between proctor and client, but upon an alleged undertaking to charge only disbursements out of pocket, and upon a further alleged undertaking that such disbursements should not exceed 200l. The demand of producing vouchers I will consider presently. Upon the other question—whether the Court can compel the proctors to refund any and what part of the money received—Peddle has gone into the whole history of what passed either by letter or otherwise between his solicitor, Walker, and the Messrs. Toller from the commencement of the cause in 1822 to the present time: and all the supposed understandings during the course of that period, all the inferences that can be raised, and all the imputations that can be made, are brought forward. It is not, however, necessary for the Court to travel through them: they bear very little, if at all, upon the decision of the main [290] question: but it may be remarked that in the whole of this history Peddle's name very seldom occurs, till the costs are finally to be settled, and then the unfortunate client is brought prominently forward as the person upon whom the hardship is ultimately to fall. Walker, his solicitor, seems pretty much to have decided every thing for himself upon his own judgment as if he were the real party; for, as a solicitor, he was not very competent to form a proper judgment upon the expediency either of undertaking a suit, or of prosecuting an appeal in an Ecclesiastical Court. Mr. Toller in his answer states, and he has verified it upon oath, that he verily believes Mr. Walker was interested as a party. "He verily believes that Charles Houlden Walker had entered into an agreement with William Peddle that he should carry on the said suit at his own risk as to the costs, and in the event of success therein divide with him, William Peddle."

Mr. Walker, though he has made a long affidavit of several sheets of paper, very argumentative and very inferential, yet has not ventured to contradict this very important fact, and the res gestæ tend strongly to confirm its truth. This practice of an attorney "buying a cause," or participating in the property to be recovered, is most dangerous to public justice: (a) it exposes the adverse parties to the harassment of most vexatious litigation. How other Courts [291] may consider such a matter I will not stop to enquire, but if any practitioner in this Court were to undertake a cause upon condition of sharing in the effects, or of receiving any other benefit beyond the payment of his own regular fair bill, I should think it would call for the utmost powers of the Court to prevent the recurrence of such bargains, and to repress such a practice. The Court takes advantage of this opportunity to express publicly that opinion.

In respect to the imputations against the proctors: they knew nothing of Mr. Peddle, nor of his cause, except from the information of Mr. Walker, and Mr. Walker himself was a new client, introduced to them by a respectable agent's house in this town, Messrs. Adlingtons and Gregory—old clients of the Messrs. Toller. There was at the outset, therefore, no claim upon the proctors to depart from their usual course of practice. The proctors, however, do not urge their client into the cause: on the contrary, at an early stage of it they recommend a compromise in a letter to Walker on the 2nd of October, 1822, taking a very judicious and liberal view of the cause and its probable result. The compromise was prevented by the advice or decision of Walker: and a very expensive suit for a small property was the consequence. The sentence was unfavorable to Peddle, and it was unsatisfactory to his law advisers. The case was one of great intricacy—of much conflicting evidence—of considerable difficulty—of so much difficulty that it was a matter of consolation to the Judge that his sentence might be revised by a superior [292] tribunal, except that the property was but small. The Court of Delegates affirmed the sentence, but without costs; except that as to the expences arising from offering, in that Court, an exceptive allegation on behalf of Peddle, he, Peddle, was condemned in costs. The offering of that allegation however was communicated to Walker, nor could that plea have been given in without being settled and supported by counsel.

(a) See as to champerty, and the punishment thereof, Com. Dig. tit. Maintenance (A. 1 & 2), and (C. 1 & 2), 4 Bl. Com. 135. Also Wood v. Downes, 18 Ves. 120.

It is suggested that Mr. Toller excited the appeal and expressed his conviction that the sentence would be reversed, and undertook to accept his mere expences out of pocket. Here happens to be Messrs. Tollers' letter to Walker, dated 27th November, 1824, expressed in very correct terms and very far from urging on an appeal. The letter acknowledges the receipt of 200l. on account, in the cause of Peddle v. Evans, and thus concludes: "The opinion of Dr. Adams coincides with our own—that the decision of Sir John Nicholl is wrong; but neither he nor ourselves can say whether the Delegates will reverse the decision." This is quite correct: they are acting in concurrence with the opinion of their leading counsel: and they had previously, viz. on the 23rd of September, 1824, suggested the expediency of a compromise.

In respect to the agreement to accept mere disbursements, it at least shews the sincerity of the proctors in their opinion and hopes that the sentence would be reversed: but I much doubt the public policy of such undertakings, and the propriety of giving them any countenance or [293] judicial recognition. An able and experienced proctor may form a strong opinion that a sentence is erroneous and that opinion may be right; but, whatever be the condition of the party in the cause, and however strong the opinion that the sentence is erroneous, the correct course, in my judgment, is to wait the result of the appeal before undertaking to accept fees out of pocket instead of the regular charges. The proctor may then, without injury to the adverse party, exercise his liberality as extensively as he pleases: but the policy of the law is to protect both parties—respondents as well as appellants—from useless litigation: and no party should be excited to appeal without the ordinary check of the risk at least of his own costs, and possibly of those of the respondent. By these observations no blame is meant to be imputed to the proctor in this particular case for agreeing to take disbursements out of pocket: it is possible that it is not unfrequently done from very kind and liberal motives; but observe the injury to the other party, which is apparent in this very case: the respondent, though successful in both Courts, has probably expended the greater part of the stake in the litigation. Upon public grounds, therefore, I doubt the propriety of these agreements to accept mere disbursements as an inducement to an appeal.

But this is quite clear: that this Court has no power of deciding upon, and inforcing, such an agreement. The Court can only proceed in the regular and ordinary way to direct the bill of costs to be examined by the registrar, and [294] that it ought to do, unless there be some reason to bar and preclude the suitor from being assisted by that examination. Still less can the Court take any notice of another matter that has been suggested, namely, a sort of understanding that the disbursements should not exceed about 200l. This Court will not decide upon that question further than to say that the whole conduct of Mr. Walker is inconsistent with any such agreement. He would not have suggested a higher fee to the common law counsel without at least some reference to the limit of 200l.: but what seems more conclusive, he never would have agreed to pay 350l., the balance of the account in which the disbursements are distinctly charged at upwards of 300l.

In respect to what is stated in this long affidavit about the bill in the Prerogative, this Court must consider that question as completely closed. First, because no part of the prayer of the present petition applies to it: secondly, because the bill had been long ago delivered, and after certain allowances was actually paid by the solicitor, Mr. Walker: but, further, a year after payment, Walker desired to have the bill for the business in the Prerogative taxed: Mr. Toller consented, and an appointment was made with the registrars: but because Mr. Toller objected to the attendance of Mr. Walker, as Peddle's solicitor, and because the Court, after hearing the case and enquiring of the registrars as to the usage, refused to make any order to allow the attendance of Mr. Walker as solicitor, the matter was dropped (see Peddle v. Evans, 1 Hagg. Ecc. 684). Mr. Walker would [295] have had full opportunity of instructing Mr. Peddle's proctor, or of proving by his affidavits any facts in objection to the charges contained in the bill: but because his claim of right to attend as solicitor was overruled, that part of the case was abandoned, and the present petition is now brought forward with all these statements and affidavits, in order to do what?—to support a demand for the production of vouchers and for permission to take copies of them, so far as they relate to the disbursements in the Court of Delegates: and in what mode is this required? by a letter from Mr. Walker to Mr. Toller. As Peddle is nominally appearing by his proctor, the latter, whose duty it was to have written any such notice, would find it difficult to justify his conduct in allowing Mr. Walker to interpose and write that letter. If Peddle had employed his proctor to make that demand, his proctor would have known, or at least he ought to have known, that upon the bill being referred to the registrars for examination the vouchers or other proofs of payment would have been produced as a matter of course, if demanded. Why, therefore, this unusual mode was adopted it is difficult to say, unless the object be to compel this matter to proceed out of the regular course.

The question then is, whether the Court can and ought now to put the matter in a train to afford the petitioner an opportunity of being satisfied that these charges are true and proper. If a regular and detailed bill of the costs and charges in the Delegates had been sent with the account current, I should have held that the [296] payment which took place would, after such long acquiescence, have precluded the party from a taxation. But here was no detailed bill delivered till the third of July instant. Before that time it was impossible the party could ascertain whether the charges had been fairly made or not, though Walker had paid them. Even where there is actual payment, other Courts will, under some circumstances, still order a taxation: but only on strong grounds. One ground is where the client has paid the bill in the course of the proceedings—under their pressure—inops concilii—without advice—and subject to the influence of his solicitor. Such was the case of Crossley v. Parker (1 Jac. & Walker, 460), before Sir Thomas Plumer, then Master of the Rolls. But here the bill was paid long after the suit was at an end, and so far from the party being inops concilii, it was paid by his solicitor, to whom he had intrusted the whole management of the suit and of the payments. Another ground for opening and having the bill taxed after payment is where some strong and clearly improper charge is discovered and pointed out. Wilkinson v. Foster (7 Moore, 496). Plenderleath v. Fraser (ib. notis. And 3 Ves. & Beames, 174). Langford v. Nott (1 Jac. & Walker, 291). How do these cases apply to the present? Here is no improper charge of any importance even suggested. It is admitted that the disbursements in the bill delivered amount to about 329l., without any charge for the proctor's own professional assistance: and it is stated and proved that they offered to allow Mr. Peddle's [297] proctor to see their books: there was, therefore, no concealment of the items; it was rather a point of punctilio that they would not, when so called upon, deliver a bill. Now I think that in this respect the proctors were wrong. I think the party was entitled to a detailed bill from the first, and whenever required: it was impossible to ascertain the truth and fairness of the charge without such a bill: and, however affronting and insulting such a demand might be, I think it ought to have been complied with.

A bill was at length delivered on the third of July; and instead of the petitioner merely applying to the Court desiring that the bill so delivered might be referred to the proper registrar for examination, Mr. Walker, on the 5th of July, wrote a letter to Messrs. Toller and Son demanding the production of vouchers, and requesting that either he or Peddle might take copies of them. No answer being returned, this long petition and affidavits were presented, and all these transactions were gone into at no inconsiderable length: and, I must add, without much necessity or propriety.

It remains for the Court to see what can be done in order to arrive at true justice between the suitor and proctor.

The Court is bound to afford every suitor all just protection. It is no less due to the proctor: but such protection can only be afforded according to the limited powers of the Court and according to the regular course of proceeding. This Court cannot enter into, nor decide upon, special agreements for disbursements only, and that such disbursements should not exceed 200l. Those agreements, if validly made, must be set [298] up and enforced in other Courts. On the other hand, though the account was rendered and actually settled and paid above three years ago, yet as no bill of particulars was delivered until about three weeks ago, I think the Court, if still desired, is called upon to refer that bill to the proper registrar for investigation. Under that examination the various charges made will be considered and proved by proper vouchers. If any of the charges shall be found gross and fraudulent (which is in no degree probable), it may not be too late for the party to seek a remedy in other Courts, by bringing his action for the amount of any sum that he may have overpaid, or by such other means as he may be advised there to have recourse to: but this examination must take place in the regular and ordinary course: it is not a case in which the Court ought to depart from its usual forms. The charges have been incurred in the Court of Delegates; the registrar of that Court seems to be the proper officer to examine the bill. If, however, upon application to him, he declines to act, as this Court has no authority over him as registrar of the Delegates, it will then direct its own registrars to examine the bill delivered. When the Court has proceeded thus far, it will have done every thing that it has the power to do for the protection and assistance of the individual suitor; though should the charges turn out to be gross and fraudulent, which, as I have before said, is in no degree probable, the Court may still have the power to correct its own practitioner by suspension or otherwise; and thus, by the example, protect other suitors from similar misconduct.

[299] In respect to the costs of this petition, I shall reserve them until the investigation has taken place: if the charges, made in one item, shall turn out false and fraudulent, the petition, though erroneously brought in this voluminous form, will be justified by the result: but if the charges turn out fair, the petition, both in its mode and in its substance, will have been frivolous and vexatious, and will call for costs against the petitioner.

On the 1st Session of Michaelmas Term the registrar of the Court of Delegates reported that Messrs. Tollers' bill was just and reasonable.

The proctor for Peddle then applied to be heard on his petition in objection to the report, and was accordingly directed to enter into an act on petition: but on a subsequent court-day he waived his act on petition and declared that his party proceeded no further.

Addams for Toller moved that Mr. Peddle be condemned in the costs of the original petition.

Per Curiam. I shall make no order for costs, but I forbear solely on the ground that Peddle is almost a pauper, and that it cannot be worth Mr. Toller's while to attempt to inforce costs. The registrar's report, to which it is now admitted no objection can be made, has proved that there is no foundation for any imputation on [300] Mr. Toller's conduct respecting these charges. His character, therefore, stands completely cleared from the aspersions which have been attempted to be cast on it by these proceedings.

Addams said: Mr. Toller was quite satisfied with the manner in which the Court had disposed of the question.

Petition dismissed.

[301] DUINS v. DONOVAN, OTHERWISE DUINS. Consistory Court of London, Hilary Term, 3rd Session, 1830.—Lapse of time offers no bar to a suit for nullity of marriage, by licence, by reason of minority and want of consent of the father. An entry of baptism in 1820 (the marriage taking place in 1813) reciting that the party was "said to be born in 1795" is not admissible—either as proof of the non-age, or in order to prevent a suspicion of suppression of evidence. A letter from the father—two months after marriage—expressive of his anger at the marriage is admissible as part of the res gestæ; and a subsequent de facto marriage of the woman with another man is pleadable to shew that the parties did not live together as husband and wife.

On admission of the libel.

This was a cause of nullity of marriage, by reason of minority, promoted by the man. A libel, on his behalf, with five exhibits was offered to the Court: it pleaded:

1. The 26th Geo. 2, c. 33, s. 11.

2. The 3rd Geo. 4, c. 75, whereby so much of the 26th Geo. 2, c. 33 (recited in the first article), as related to any marriage to be thereafter solemnized is repealed. It then set forth the 2nd section as to marriages by licence before the passing of the act—3 Geo. 4.

3. The 4th Geo. 4, c. 76, s. 1.

4. That George Parlby Duins was, and is, the natural and lawful son of Robert (now dead) by Ann, his lawful wife, born in Stoke Damerel parish, Devon, on 16th July, 1795: "that he was at and about that time baptized at Stoke Damerel, but not according to the form of baptism of the Church of England as by law established, by reason that his parents were dissenters;" that on 4th of December, 1820, he was lawfully baptized and registered.

[302] 5. Exhibited a copy of the entry of baptism in Stoke Damerel church, "and that George Parlby Duins therein mentioned, and 'said to be born 16th July, 1795,'" is the minor aforesaid.

6. On 1st July, 1813, a marriage de facto between G. P. Duins and Mary Donovan in the parish church of Portsea, Southampton, by virtue of a licence in which Duins was described as a bachelor, aged 21 years and upwards; that at that time he was a minor—and that the marriage was had without the knowledge or consent of his father.

7. Exhibited a copy of the original affidavit (signed G. P. Duins) upon which the licence was granted.

8. A copy of the entry of marriage. Identity.

9. That Robert Duins, the father, was, previous to and at the time of the marriage, totally unacquainted with Mary Donovan and her family, and was entirely ignorant of the marriage until some time after it had taken place; that upon hearing of it he was greatly displeased thereat, and expressed the greatest surprise and regret that it had taken place.

10. That on 4th September, 1813, he wrote a letter to his daughter, Mrs. Ann Bedford, and, therein alluding to the said marriage of his son, expressed his great displeasure and concern thereat, and his disapprobation of the same, and of the conduct of the mother of Mary Donovan in relation thereto.

11. Exhibited the letter.

12. That about 12 months after the pretended marriage, G. P. Duins and Mary Donovan finally discontinued to live and cohabit together [303] as husband and wife; that Duins went to reside with his father in London and Mary Donovan in Ireland: that Duins continued to reside generally with his father until his death (which took place in 1810), and afterwards at Stoke Damerel and other places: that since they discontinued their cohabitation together as aforesaid the residence of Mary Donovan hath at times, for several years together, been wholly unknown to G. P. Duins, nor hath he from such time at all contributed, or been called upon to contribute, to her support and maintenance: and that they have never since they separated as aforesaid lived or cohabited together, or owned or acknowledged each other as husband and wife, and that they did not discontinue their cohabitation aforesaid merely for the purpose or during the pending of any proceedings touching the validity of their said pretended marriage.

13. That on 3rd of August, 1818, the said Mary Donovan intermarried in fact with R. K. L. by and under the name and description of Maria Montague, widow: that the said marriage was solemnized in the parish church of St. George, Middlesex, by virtue of banns.

14. Exhibited a copy of the entry of the marriage; and pleaded the identity.

15, 16, and 17, were formal articles, pleading jurisdiction, &c.; and praying a sentence of nullity.

The King's advocate and Haggard in objection to the libel. The exhibit annexed to the 5th article is no [304] evidence of the time of birth. In the 10th article a letter from the father in respect to this marriage is pleaded; it is dated more than two months after the marriage, and may have been written with a view to a suit of nullity. The 13th article sets forth a second marriage; but the citation is for the party to answer in a suit of nullity by reason of minority.

Phillimore and Addams contrà. The certificate is introduced merely to account for the previous non-baptism of the party: if it had not been exhibited the Court might have supposed there had been some suppression. We admit that the entry of the time of birth is no proof of the fact; but we cannot expunge the insertion: it is not pleaded as evidence of minority. The letter of the father shews his disapproba-tion and surprise; and is admissible in supply of proof. The marriage pleaded in the 13th article plainly shews that the parties were not living together as husband and wife.

Judgment—Dr. Lushington. This is a suit brought by George Parlby Duins against Mary Donovan, calling herself Duins, for the purpose of having the marriage, which took place in the year 1813, declared null and void. It is true that a very considerable time has elapsed between the period at which this marriage was contracted, and the institution of the present suit: but suits of a similar description have been brought after the lapse of at least as long a period. In Johnston [305] and Johnston (3 Phill. 39), upwards of twenty years had intervened between the solemnization of the marriage and the commencement of proceedings. Considering, therefore, that the Court has to pronounce only a declaratory sentence, and to determine whether the law has made this marriage null and void, I think the lapse of time offers no bar to the inquiry.

The sentence is prayed in this case by reason that the marriage was had during the minority of the man, and without the knowledge or consent of his father. To enable the Court to arrive at such a sentence it is first requisite for the party to plead such facts as shall bring his case within the clauses of the old marriage act, the 26 Geo. 2, c. 33, known by the name of Lord Hardwicke's Act; and to satisfy the Court that, if those facts were proved, it would be right to pronounce the sentence which it is empowered to do by the provisions of that statute. But since the passing of that act other statutes have introduced various alterations and regulations into the marriage law of this country. The 3rd Geo. 4, c. 75, s. 2 (pleaded in the libel), generally and practically speaking, may be said to render valid, with certain exceptions, all marriages of minors previously solemnized by licence without the consent of the parent or guardian, thus far restoring the general law as to the validity of such marriages which the former act declared absolute nullities. It is clear that, according to the facts alleged in the libel, the marriage would be null under the old marriage act; the question, therefore, is whether it [306] is rendered valid by the 3 Geo. 4, c. 75, s. 2, or comes within what I have just called the exceptions. The second section is only pleaded; and it enacts "that in all cases of marriage had and solemnized by licence before the passing of this act without any such consent as is required by so much of the said statute, as is hereinbefore recited, and where the parties shall have continued to live together as husband and wife till the death of one of them, or till the passing of this act, or shall only have discontinued their cohabitation for the purpose or during the pending of any proceedings touching the validity of such marriage, such marriage, if not otherwise invalid, shall be deemed to be good and valid to all intents and purposes whatsoever."

I presume that it is intended to shew the invalidity of this marriage upon this second section only; and not to rely upon the provisoes contained in the 3rd and the following sections to the 7th inclusive. Two cases only have occurred in which the construction of this second section has come under judicial consideration; and some difficulty may possibly arise in applying to that section the precise meaning intended by the legislature: but, whatever may be the eventual proof in support of this libel, there is sufficient, upon the face of it, as far as relates to the law, to call upon the Court to admit it to proof; it will, however, be necessary that I should bear this section in mind when I consider the objection to the 13th article.

The principal fact is the minority of the son, the party bringing the suit: and that is pleaded in very distinct terms; but, by way of [307] collateral proof, a copy of an entry in a registry of baptisms for the year 1820 is exhibited, it being alleged that his birth took place in 1795. It appears to me that, whatever may be the contents of that exhibit, it is utterly impossible it can have any bearing on the question: for, if I were to admit it, it is no evidence of the time at which this individual was born: the clergyman who performed the ceremony did on that occasion insert in the register that the person baptized was "said to be born on the 16th of July, 1795" (see also Rex v. Clapham, 4 C. & P. 29); but that is no evidence of the fact; it is mere hearsay and information, and cannot be adopted by the Court as any ground for the decision at which it may ultimately arrive upon the present question. For what purpose, then, can this exhibit be allowed to remain as part of these proceedings? It is very true that, where the baptism takes place, as it generally happens, soon after the birth of the child, it has been usual to plead it; not even then as evidence that the child was born at any given period, but that, in conjunction with other circumstances, it might perhaps tend to elucidate the period of the birth: here, however, where the entry of baptisms is not made until twenty-five years after the alleged birth, the admission of it can be of no assistance whatever.

It is said that this certificate was introduced to obviate, in the mind of the Court, any idea of undue concealment and suppression; but it being pleaded that the father was a dissenter, no suspicion could arise that the entry of baptism had been suppressed: and it would be the duty [308] of the Court, before it indulged in any such suspicion, to have some evidence to awaken its vigilance. The party will have all the benefit which can be derived from pleading this certificate by the circumstance that he was the child of dissenting parents. I reject this exhibit.

The next objection is to the article which pleads a letter from the father dated two months after the marriage of his son; and it is said that the father might have written this letter for the purpose of manufacturing evidence in his own cause. Certainly such a deception might, under particular circumstances, be attempted; but the Court has not the slightest reason to suppose that any such attempt has here been made. The letter is admissible, not as the declaration of the father simply, but as part of the res gestæ connected with this marriage. It will not be sufficient proof of the father's ignorance of the intended marriage, nor of his disapprobation after it had taken place: but, in conjunction with other circumstances, it may assist the Court, and may also be useful, should any question arise as to the degree of credit due to the witnesses upon this point.

In respect to the 13th article, which alleges that the party proceeded against contracted a second de facto marriage in 1818, the difficulty that occurs to the Court is that the third section of the 3 Geo. 4, c. 75, is not pleaded: by that section it is enacted "that nothing in this act contained shall extend or be construed to extend to render valid any marriage declared invalid by any Court of competent jurisdiction, before the passing of this act, nor any marriage where either of the parties [309] shall at any time afterwards, during the life of the other party, have lawfully intermarried with any other person." Now, no reference is made in the libel to this section; the Court therefore infers that, though a marriage in 1818 is pleaded, it is not the intention of those who framed this libel to rely upon it as valid, and as a substantive fact; because if it had been their intention to rely upon it, this 3rd section would, I conceive, have been set forth as well as the second. The words used are "lawfully intermarried:" in order, then, to set aside a marriage distinctly on the ground of a second marriage, it would certainly be requisite to shew that the second marriage was a legal and valid marriage.

Supposing, however, that this marriage has been introduced as a circumstance of conduct in the woman, is it evidence in illustration of her conduct, so as to bring the party within the provisions of the 2nd section? and, in that view of the case, it is, I think, admissible. The words are, "where the parties shall have continued to live together as husband and wife until the death of one of them, or until the passing of this act." Whatever may be the true construction of those words, it appears to me important to admit a circumstance which at least tends to shew the view of one of the parties in relation to the marriage in 1813; for the woman considered herself at liberty to contract a second marriage. On that ground therefore I allow that article to stand: and I am of opinion that this libel, after expunging the entry copied from the baptismal register, is admissible.

The Court directed the libel to be reformed by striking out the fifth article.

[310] Upon the evidence taken in support of the libel, the Court was clearly of opinion that all the material facts were proved; that the evidence, in respect of the 13th article, satisfactorily established, primâ facie at least, a marriage de facto; and, without hearing counsel for Mr. Duins, pronounced the sentence of nullity.

CROFT v. CROFT. Consistory Court of London, Hilary Term, 3rd Session, 1830.—Where a libel pleaded facts, 1st, to establish the adultery of the wife; 2nd, to shew that the husband had not forfeited his claim for relief by misconduct, the Court directed parts to be reformed on the several grounds of too great minuteness, hearsay, and pleading the contents of a letter not exhibited nor accounted for; and admitted the rest.—In considering the admissibility of pleas, the Court must be cautious not to exclude matter essential to a due decision, nor allow proceedings to extend to an unnecessary length; but if a serious doubt arise as to the ultimate effect of any averment it should be admitted.—Though the Court will not, on presumption and in the absence of matter strongly inculpatory, impute connivance to the husband, it will not debar him from pleading that which makes the history consistent and natural.—That the conduct of the wife, during the absence of her husband, was so indecorous as to induce a lady with whom she resided to recommend her removal to her mother, is pleadable.—On a negotiation between the husband and third parties, in the wife's absence, relative to his receiving her back, that the husband declined, as it did not appear that her conduct had changed, is not pleadable when unnecessary to his justification.—Where parties are living separate, the commencement of the acquaintance with the alleged paramour, and of the suspicions of the person under whose care the wife was, should be set forth circumstantially.—A declaration of the paramour, in the wife's absence, that she had committed adultery previous to the adultery charged in the libel, is not admissible; but a declaration, in her presence and confirmed by her, is: and the Court cannot reject it on the ground of its reflecting on third parties, nor that it does not establish adultery previous to the charges in the libel.

On admission of the libel.

This was a suit by reason of the adultery of the wife. The marriage took place on the 9th of September, 1824, the lady being a minor: of this marriage there was born one child, a daughter. The parties cohabited till April, 1828. The libel pleaded an action—judgment by default, verdict for plaintiff, damages 2500l.: and a continuance of criminal intercourse at the time of the present suit.

Dodson and Nicholl opposed the libel.

The King's advocate and Phillimore contrà.

Judgment—Dr. Lushington. To the admissibility of this libel, generally, no objection is raised. It is said, however, some parts of it are unnecessary for the pur-[311]-poses of justice, and that other parts, according to the established rules of evidence, ought not to be received.

The practice of objecting to the admissibility of pleas, in the whole or in part, is one of the most wholesome and beneficial usages which can prevail in any Court; and is a practice resorted to in these Courts more frequently, and in a more convenient manner, than in any other Court: it is attended with little expence, and it occupies but little time, except perhaps upon some occasions when the whole question, and the result of the suit, are to be determined by the rejection or admission of the plea. When the facts of the case are not disputed, but when legal questions of importance arise, on the decision of which the question at issue depends, nothing can be more advantageous or convenient to suitors than the practice of considering, in this early stage of the proceeding, the application of the law to the facts pleaded, and of thereby disposing of the case without putting parties to the expence of going into evidence. Beneficial, however, as this practice is, it often entails upon the Court the exercise of an arduous and difficult duty: on the one hand, the Court must be cautious not to exclude any matter essential to the due decision of the case, and, on the other, not to allow proceedings to extend to an unnecessary, inconvenient, and expensive length. The better and more discreet line to be adopted is—if a serious doubt arise as to the ultimate effect of any averment in a plea—to allow it to stand and come before the Court in proof: for then the utmost extent of mischief is to occasion some additional expence; [312] while, wholly to exclude the averment, might work absolute injustice.

I have thought it not unimportant to make these observations, as it is desirable that suitors should know that here they will receive at least as great advantages as they can elsewhere, in the exclusion of irrelevant or redundant matter; and in bringing a case to the narrowest and most simple issue which justice will allow.

The objects of this libel are twofold—first, to establish the adultery of the wife; secondly, to shew that the husband has not, by misconduct, forfeited his right to apply to the law for redress. In respect to the second point, the Court has occasionally remarked that it would not, on presumption, and in the absence of matter strongly inculpatory, impute to the husband the guilt of connivance; but it never meant by any such expressions to debar him from pleading circumstances that make the history natural and consistent; for the party ought not to be forced ultimately to depend, for an explanation of his conduct, on the ingenuity of counsel, or the discrimination of the Court.

Some peculiarities present themselves upon the face of this plea. The marriage appears to have been contracted at a very early period of Lady Croft's life, the courtship having commenced when she was about seventeen years of age: the cohabitation continued from September, 1824—the date of the marriage—until April, 1828, when Sir Thomas Croft, in consequence of ill health, was under the necessity of going into the country. On that occasion Lady Croft declined to accompany him; and she remained [313] in London confided to the care of Sir Thomas Croft's mother: and it is impossible to suppose she could be under safer, or better, protection. It is objected that the fourth article of the libel—which pleads "her improper and indecorous conduct during her residence with her mother-in-law, and that the latter recommended that she should be placed, during her husband's absence in the country, under the care of her own mother"—goes too much into detail; and that the opinion, or recommendation, of the husband's mother affords no legal evidence as to her conduct: but I think it desirable that the Court should be in possession of the fact that, during the necessary absence of her husband, and while under the roof of her mother-in-law, Lady Croft so comported herself as to induce that lady to advise her removal to what many persons might conceive a safer and more effectual protection—viz. the protection of her own parent.

The 5th article pleads, "That from the end of April, 1828, until October of the same year, Lady Croft frequently expressed the strongest dislike of her husband and his family, and conducted herself with unbecoming levity and indecorum; that Sir Thomas Croft expressed a wish that she should remain under the care of her mother until she manifested a proper sense of, and contrition for, her misconduct, and a permanent inclination to return to her duty to her husband and child." No objection has been raised to the admission of the first part of this article, but the remainder of it is objected to; and which pleads, "That in the beginning of September, 1828, Sir Thomas Croft, who had then somewhat recovered from [314] his illness, had a meeting with R. M. [Lady Croft's step-father] and with T. H., a friend of his wife's family, and a trustee under her marriage settlement, relative to Sir Thomas Croft taking his wife back again, but as it did not appear that her conduct and behaviour had undergone any material alteration he declined at that time to receive her." I am of opinion that this part of the article may be very easily spared; I do not think it essential to the justification of Sir Thomas Croft, and it relates to transactions which took place entirely without the knowledge of the other party.

The 6th article, after pleading "that in October, 1828, R. M., his wife, and family, accompanied by Lady Croft, took up their residence at Boulogne; that in June, 1829, they there were introduced to William Lyster, who passed and was generally known by the appellation of colonel—an unmarried man then living at Boulogne"—alleges that "on the 14th day of July, 1829, R. M., his wife, and Lady C. dined at Boulogne with Mr. and Mrs. B., and that Colonel Lyster also dined there. That on such occasion the said Lady C. and Lyster paid marked attention to each other, so as to attract the notice of her mother, who, on the next morning, mentioned what she had so observed to Lady C., who denied the truth thereof, or that Lyster had said any thing that was improper to her." Some objection was raised to the particularity with which the commencement of this acquaintance is pleaded; but it appears to me that, in this case, it should be set forth in rather more particular terms than might be requisite, had the [315] husband and wife been living together; and the Court should also be apprized of the earliest period at which the conduct of Colonel Lyster excited the observation and attention of Lady Croft's own mother, under whose protection she was at that time residing.

Objections have also been taken to the 7th article, which in substance pleads, "That on the 16th of July R. M. and his wife, accompanied by Lady C., went to a public concert at Boulogne: that at the concert L. came and sat by Lady C.: that after the concert was over Lady C. retired to her bed-room, remained there about an hour, and would not allow her servant to put away her bonnet and shawl; that R. M. was apprized thereof, and, suspecting that Lady C. had formed some plan, watched her." The objection goes principally as to the language in which the article pleads R. M.'s having been apprized of certain circumstances, and his suspicions as to what was about to follow: but the party would not be in the least benefited if a few words, as "apprized and suspected," were struck out, for the evidence would be in effect the same. It is unnecessary, therefore, that any alteration should be made in that respect. The latter part of this article is also objected to: it pleads, "That R. M., from a room above, observed Lady C. had opened her window, and kept looking up and down the street as if she expected to see some person; that Colonel L. came under the windows of her room, and entered into a conversation with her; that R. M. thereupon went into her room, and having sent her to her mother, directed the maid-servant to look out of the [316] window, when Colonel L. in a low tone of voice said to her, If the street-door makes a noise when opened, open one of the lower windows and shutters; or to that effect: that R. M. thereupon directed the maid-servant to tell Colonel L. that he knew of his being there, and to go away, which, after some hesitation, he did." Now it is said that this took place in the absence of Lady C., and cannot be admitted as an instance of her guilt, nor as auxiliary proof. It is certain, however, that a conversation ensued under the window between the maid-servant and Colonel L. after the previous facts had occurred; and this, I think, ought to be received, because it is a continuation of that which must be admitted to have been an impropriety on her part: and the transaction would be incomplete, unless the whole of it were set forth, and allowed to go to proof.

The 8th article is objected to on the ground that it states with too much particularity the cautions adopted by R. M. in order to prevent any intercourse between Lady C. and Colonel L.; and I think these are pleaded at unnecessary length; and that it would be quite sufficient to plead, generally, the measures of security and precaution to which R. M. resorted: this will shew that he adopted all those measures which he deemed requisite. With respect to the communication to Sir Thomas Croft of his wife's conduct—that appears to me to be properly stated; for I think it is desirable that the Court should be put in possession of Sir T. Croft's behaviour upon the receipt of that communication.

[317] The 9th article contains and sets forth a letter of Sir T. Croft, and also Lady Croft's answer. This latter letter is annexed to the libel; but of Sir Thomas Croft's letter the original is not produced, nor is there any draft or copy; and it is said, therefore, that the contents cannot be properly pleaded verbatim et litteratim; for that it will be impracticable to prove them. To a certain extent it may be true that it may be impracticable to prove that a letter, precisely of the same contents, was written by Sir T. Croft and delivered to Lady Croft; but supposing that there should be this failure of evidence, no use can then be made of the letter; and Lady Croft will not suffer the least injury from its admission in plea. The original letter is alleged to be in her possession; it is not possible, then, that Sir T. Croft can now obtain possession of that letter unless Lady Croft will produce it. If it were in the hands of a third party, the possession of it might possibly be obtained: but I am of opinion that, being in the wife's possession, the husband may plead either passages from or the contents of the letter, and may substantiate them as best he can, leaving it to the other party to produce the letter or not as she may deem advisable. The answer is strictly admissible as evidence against her.

The 11th article, after pleading "that after Col. Lyster had been detected in carrying on the clandestine communication with Lady C. as pleaded in the 7th article, he made complaints to various persons that she was improperly confined by the said R. M., and threatened to apply to the British Consul [318] and French authorities to interfere and protect her," goes into a considerable detail which has been objected to; and which, in the judgment of the Court, it is unnecessary to plead. It will be quite sufficient to state that, under the circumstances, R. M. thought it right to remove Lady Croft from Boulogne and to place her under the protection of her mother. The remainder of the article, pleading his embarkation with Lady C., and that, notwithstanding his precautions, Col. L. was a passenger on board the same vessel, may go to proof.

The objections to the 12th article have been argued at great length. It pleads, "That, whilst on board, Col. L. several times addressed [declared to R. M.] R. M. on the subject of the intercourse which he stated had been carried on between him and [in the presence of Lady C.] Lady C., and in her presence he declared,(a) and she admitted the same to be true, that he and Lady C. had had sexual intercourse at Boulogne on four different occasions previous to his being discovered talking to Lady C. as pleaded in the 7th article: that, on their arrival in London, M. proposed to Lady C. to go to the Bridge Street Hotel until he could consult T. H., her trustee: that L. objected, and said 'he and Lady C. intended to go to another hotel, but would meet M. at H.'s office the next morning:' that M. refused to leave Lady C. till he had first seen H.; and Lady [319] C. declared she would not see him unless L. gave his sanction.' It then pleaded that the three went to H.'s, that he was from home, that Lady C. again refused to go to the Bridge Street Hotel, but went to the Percy Hotel; and that M. remained there with her and L. till late in the evening, when H. came, and he and M. retired to confer: on returning to the room where he left Lady C. and L., that neither of them were therein, and he was then informed 'they were together in a bedroom in the said house;' upon which he instantly quitted the house, and, having been informed by H. that the husband had left England, he directed H. to apprize the husband's family of the improper intercourse between Lady C. and Colonel L."

(a) The parts in italics were struck out and the words in brackets substituted.

It is said that, admitting such a statement was made, it is not necessary for the purposes of justice; and that it reflects very seriously on the character of the paramour who is not a party to this suit. Again, that no adultery is pleaded to have taken place at any anterior period; and, therefore, that the Court could not take this conversation as evidence of the actual commission of any guilt at Boulogne with which the wife was not then nor is now charged. It is further objected that part of this conversation is not pleaded to have taken place in the presence of Lady Croft. Now the Court is of opinion that it would have been admissible if, at the commencement of this article, it had been pleaded more specifically that the conversations which did pass between Colonel Lyster and R. M. had taken place in the presence of Lady Croft: but if they did not take place in [320] her presence, then I am of opinion that the objections are thus far well founded, and that it is the duty of the Court to reject any conversations which passed in the absence of Lady Croft: but as to the objection to the other part, that which alleges the declarations of Colonel Lyster in Lady Croft's presence that sexual intercourse had taken place between himself and Lady Croft, and that she admitted that such was the fact, I am at a loss to conceive on what principle the Court would be justified in rejecting it. With respect to the consequences that may result to third parties, however much the Court may regret if any injustice or misfortune should accrue to them, yet justice must be done to suitors; so that it is impossible to exclude matter which ought to be admitted in evidence, because incidentally it may affect the character and involve the conduct of those who are not parties to the suit. The rejection of matter on any consideration of this kind would lead to great inconvenience and injustice.

But another ground of objection is that the declarations will be no evidence of the previous commission of adultery, and that deserves a little more consideration. Now suppose that the declarations were false (and it is not at all impossible from the res gestæ, and from the manner in which the conversation is set forth in this libel, that actual connexion had not taken place between these parties until after their arrival in London, but that Colonel Lyster, if he did so declare, did it for the purpose of obtaining more free and unrestrained access to Lady Croft), yet still the conversation would be the strongest proof of what the ultimate intentions of Lady [321] Croft were; and if it should turn out to be a case in which any doubt at all should arise as to the actual commission of adultery, it would be very auxiliary testimony as proving the animus and object with which she allowed any communication whatever between herself and Colonel Lyster. It is therefore my duty to admit, substantially, this article.

The Court is entitled to exercise a discretion as to what parts of a libel may or may not be unnecessary, yet it is a discretion very considerably restricted. It cannot exclude substantive facts. If twenty facts of adultery were pleaded, though one might be sufficient to entitle the husband to his remedy, the Court would hesitate before it struck out one of them. It cannot foresee to what extent the husband is in possession of evidence, nor in what particular instances the averments of the libel may be proved; and it would be extremely dangerous and, I apprehend, going beyond all precedent, if it were to strike out that which must be admitted to be a very material point towards enabling the Court to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion on the case. The few words towards the close of the article, which plead the information as to Colonel Lyster and Lady Croft being in a bed-room together, have been properly objected to as hearsay and must be expunged.

The other objections are not very material: one, however, it may be proper to notice; it arises on the 13th article, which commences by pleading, "That, on the evening of the said 7th of August, Lady Croft wrote and sent in the name of R. M., but without his privity or con-[322]-currence, to her maid-servant, directing her to come to her at the hotel." In respect to this, according to the strict principles of evidence, the contents of a note cannot be pleaded without annexing the note. As this is an important rule of evidence, though it may be of no very great consequence on the present occasion, that article must be reformed. It is extremely desirable that rules of evidence, which are acted upon by courts of a superior jurisdiction, should be here observed. When these alterations have been made, the libel may go to proof.

Allegation to be reformed.

Easter Term, 3d Session.—Note.—The case upon the evidence was fully proved; and there being nothing in the slightest degree to bar the husband of the remedy he prayed, the Court signed the sentence of separation.

DE BLAQUIERE v. DE BLAQUIERE. Consistory Court of London, Easter Term, 1st Session, 1830.—Where both parties had long abstained from applying to the Court, the one for a reduction of alimony, the other to enforce the regular payment, it will not enforce arrears, nor inquire as to the sums paid by the husband for his wife's debts incurred by reason of non-payment of that alimony; nor will it reduce alimony on account of an express waiver of a part thereof by the wife, the additional expences of the husband occasioned by the mature age of children, the failure, from the mismanagement of her trustees, of a portion of the funds set apart for the wife's alimony, or slight additions, aliunde, to her means.

[Referred to, Kerr v. Kerr, [1897] 2 Q. B. 443.]

In May, 1820, a sentence of separation, by reason of the adultery of the husband, having been signed (3 Phill. 258), the Court decreed that Lady Harriet de Blaquiere should receive for her separate maintenance, in addition to the interest [323] of 6000l. —her own fortune—then producing 300l. per annum, a further sum of 80l. per annum, being a moiety of the annual estimated value of Hill House Farm, near Cuckfield, the residence of General de Blaquiere.(a)

The present question originated in an application on his behalf for a reduction of this allotment; and in support of it a joint affidavit was made by himself and his housekeeper—who kept the accounts of, and whose husband managed, the Hill House Farm, in which both stated "that it never produced any profit." The affidavit also embodied a letter from Lady Harriet to the general's solicitor in terms following:—

"June 29, 1822.

"Sir,—As I find there is not a clear understanding with regard to the additional 80l., and that my intention of leaving the payment of it to General de Blaquiere's equity subjects me to continual family discussions, terminating in unpleasant differences, I consider it best to dispose of the contention altogether, and I beg you will from this moment understand that I entirely relinquish that specific sum of 80l. per annum, reserving the remaining annual amount of 300l. for life."

The affidavit then stated "that, till Novem-[324]-ber, 1823, Lady Harriet received 300l. per annum, when a mortgage of 4000l.—part of her settlement money—was paid off and invested in Exchequer bills at a diminution of interest of 58l. 13s. That in July, 1824, her solicitor, together with her trustees (to whose management the settlement money was intrusted) lent this 4000l. in equal moieties upon mortgage, and that he (de B.) had conceived Lady Harriet was in the receipt of 300l. per annum, but that lately he had been informed and believed that for the moiety lent to Mr. White no interest for two years and a half had been, and that none was likely soon to be, paid: that he had incurred great expence in the repairs of his farm, that his sons were wholly maintained and educated by him, and now were of an age to be advanced in

(a) General de Blaquiere was entitled for life to the interest of Lady Harriet's fortune; but, upon a private separation in 1814, he agreed that she should receive it for her support. The permanent alimony was allotted upon a joint income amounting to 1190l. per annum; and there were two sons of the respective ages of eight and six.

a profession, and that his whole income, including the interest of Lady Harriet's money, was 958l. 7s. 2d. That in 1826 Lady Harriet received—as derived under her mother's will—two separate sums of 666l."

Lady Harriet's affidavit set forth a letter from her, dated July 13, 1820, to the general, in which she proposed "that if he would allow one son to be with her altogether, she would release him from the payment of 80l. of her alimony to enable him to bestow a better education upon the other." This proposal was not acceded to, and the general declined allowing Lady Harriet to have any intercourse with her children. That in answer to several applications for the payment of the 80l. as it became due the general, in March, 1821, wrote "that he would, as soon as his estate was sold, pay the arrears and provide for the regular pay-[325]-ment of it in future." "That Lady Harriet agreed to wait his own time, but expressly refused to relinquish it; and that her letter of 29th of June, 1822, was written when her mind was greatly excited by discussions with her own family, in consequence of her having so far acceded to General de B.'s wishes as to defer receiving payment of such additional alimony; but that she was more especially induced to write it, in the hope that he would comply with her most anxious wish to see her children, and to have them occasionally with her, and in the full impression and belief that if he should persist in a refusal her declaration would not be binding. That the balance of alimony, up to 16th May, 1829, was 1265l. 4s. 8d. That on the payment of the mortgage of 4000l. the Exchequer bills were deposited in the joint names of her solicitor and the solicitor of General de B.; with whose full concurrence (a) and that of the trustee on the part of General de B.(b) the money was again lent out on mortgage: that she received in July, 1826, a legacy of 666l. 13s. 4d., but [326] neither then, nor at any other time, the whole, or any part, of a second sum of the like amount."

In reply to this affidavit General de Blaquiere made a further affidavit, stating that "since 14th February, 1829—the date of his former affidavit—he had paid upon actions by tradesmen on account of bills incurred by Lady Harriet for furnishing her house at Brighton, taken in 1824, and for other bills, 1288l. 15s. 5d., and that he was threatened with further actions for other debts to the amount of 140l.; that she has, for her life, apartments in Hampton Court Palace, and lets her house at Brighton for four guineas per week, amounting to 218l. 8s. per annum: that from June, 1822, to March, 1828, no intimation was ever made by Lady H., either to him, or, as he believes, to his solicitor, that she did not consider her letter of 29th June, 1822, binding upon her: that there now remains justly due to him, for sums paid to her or for her use, 1286l. 15s. beyond what she was entitled to as alimony: that he therefore trusts that her ladyship's income may be reduced suitably to the diminished income of the deponent, and the increased heavy claims which fall upon it."

Phillimore and Addams for General de Blaquiere.

The King's advocate and Dodson contrà.

[327] Judgment—Dr. Lushington. In 1820 Lady Harriet de Blaquiere obtained a sentence of separation by reason of General de Blaquiere's adultery; and, on a consideration of all the circumstances, there was an allotment of alimony of 80l. per annum, in addition to the interest of 6000l.—her own fortune, which, at that time, amounted to 300l. per annum. Until last year there had been no application to the Court by either party, on the one hand to reduce the allotment, or, on the other, to enforce the payment of arrears: either party might have proceeded to take the remedy afforded by the law. An application is now made by General de Blaquiere for a reduction of alimony; this is met by an affidavit of Lady Harriet's, stating a diminution of the funds which had supplied her separate maintenance; and making a counter-demand for certain arrears: in reply it is said that General de Blaquiere has incurred

---

(a) This gentleman was dead; but in Lady Harriet's solicitor's affidavit it was sworn that General de Blaquiere's solicitor had approved of the security, and that the mortgage deed was prepared by an eminent conveyancer.

(b) This was denied in the affidavit of the trustee—who said "that the sum of 6000l. and the receipt of the interest thereon for her use was entirely under the control and management of Lady Harriet's own solicitor; and that till December, 1828, he, deponent, was wholly ignorant, as he believes were also both his brother and his then solicitor (now deceased), that any part of the sum of 6000l. had been lent upon a security—doubtful or unproductive."

great expences on account of debts contracted by Lady Harriet; that she has received an increase of income from other sources; and that the defalcation in her means, if any, has proceeded from the mismanagement of her own trustees.

It is true that, should I decree the payment of arrears, General de Blaquiere would be entitled to a deduction for all sums paid on account of Lady Harriet's debts: and I should then be obliged to take into my consideration the questions that have been raised respecting the 80l. per annum, which was allotted in addition to the interest of her own fortune. I am of opinion that she did, in fact, abandon that sub-[328]-sidiary allotment; but I doubt whether in law it was competent for her, in that form, to relinquish the benefit of the decree of the Court. This is a contract between husband and wife; and though the principles applicable to such contracts are not strictly the same after a legal separation, as they may be regarded while the parties are living together, yet they are not widely different. In the one case, here is the influence arising from affection; afterwards an influence of a different sort, arising from an anxiety to communicate with her children. If it were necessary to settle this point, I should be of opinion that the whole alimony decreed to her in 1820 must be placed at her disposal, and then she will be at liberty to appropriate it as she pleases.

In respect to the mortgage for 2000l., upon which but little interest has been paid, I cannot exactly agree that it was in the power of the husband to relinquish all care and superintendence of that sum: it was his duty to see that the money was advanced upon proper security; but, upon the defalcation occurring, no application was made to this Court by Lady H. de Blaquiere: she abdicated her claim to that protection to which she might have resorted; and, in like manner, General de Blaquiere, by leaving the alimony unpaid instead of seeking his remedy here in an application for a reduction of it, has made himself subject to her debts. On the other hand, there was a species of acquiescence, in this diminution of alimony, on the part of Lady H. de Blaquiere, evidenced by her forbearing to resort to this Court, and by her allowing her husband to be sued for her [329] debts. I am not, therefore, inclined to meddle with the arrears; for though General de Blaquiere was abroad from 1821 to 1827, and consequently the process of this Court could not be enforced against him, yet, upon his return, no step was taken by Lady Harriet de Blaquiere to obtain payment of the arrears by the authority of this Court. It is clear, therefore, that Lady Harriet did not intend to call for the arrears; and if I were now to travel into that question, I should involve both parties in much intricacy of account. I shall not therefore decree for the arrears: and I come to this decision, principally upon the ground that no application was made to this Court either to enforce payment or to obtain a reduction of alimony.

Where there is a material alteration of circumstances, a change in the rate of alimony may be made. If the faculties are improved, the wife's allowance ought to be increased; and if the husband is lapsus facultatibus, the wife's allowance ought to be reduced. Applications of this sort are of rare occurrence; I only remember two instances where applications of either kind have been successful—the case of Foulkes and Foulkes for an increase (Consistory, Hil. Term, 1814); and of Cox and Cox (3 Add. 276) for a reduction: (c) and I think that, [330] under the present circumstances, Lord Stowell, if he had continued to occupy this chair, would not have made a different allotment from what he did when he originally fixed the rate of this alimony.

(c) Trinity Term, 4th Session, 1830.—In Wilson v. Wilson, upon an application by the wife to enforce a monition for the payment of alimony, six years in arrear, the Court said: "Unless the husband is absent from the country, or some particular reasons are set forth, it would be productive of great inconvenience and injustice if, after a lapse of so many years, the Court should enforce such a monition. If the wife is aggrieved, she should make her application within a reasonable time, otherwise the Court will infer she has made some more beneficial arrangement. As a general rule, therefore, the Court is not inclined to enforce arrears of many years' standing. Alimony is allotted for the maintenance of a wife from year to year. However, as there has, in this case, been no application to reduce the alimony, but the parties have gone on satisfied with some private arrangement of their own, I think I shall best consult the interests of both by decreeing alimony from one year prior to the monition, the husband being allowed all payments on account of the wife during that year; and, from the date of the present monition, I shall continue the alimony according to the original decree."

The principle point is, what is to be done in respect to Hill House Farm. There is an extraordinary affidavit from General de Blaquiere's housekeeper, whose husband manages the farm while she keeps the accounts, "that during the last fifteen years no profit has been derived from it;" but the point to be considered is, what the farm would let for. In 1820 it was estimated at 7000l. Lord Stowell put the produce of it at a low rate, and I see no reason to depart from the view he then took of it. On the ground of the alteration in General de Blaquiere's income, I am not inclined to alter the allotment of alimony. Then, as to the mature age of the children: their growing years must have been taken into consideration at the time the alimony was originally fixed; and I see no ground on that account to alter the allotment and diminish the comforts of the wife. There may, indeed, be cases where the Court would relieve the hus-[331]-band owing to heavy expences arising from children; but I do not think this a case of that sort.

Again, has the income of the wife so improved as to call for a change? There are three items: First, the house at Brighton: but there is no proof by what tenure she holds it. It is true it was furnished at the expence of the husband; for the tradesmen recovered from him the amount of their bills: but these sums have in fact been taken as part of her income, since the arrears are not enforced: the one must be set off against the other.

The second item, the sum of 140l. still due, is too trifling to cause any variation. The third item is the apartments at Hampton Court, which are estimated at 100l. per annum, and it is sworn that Lady Harriet has them for her life: I doubt whether that can be accurate. I should think they were held at the will of the King: but, even if otherwise, I should feel a great difficulty in stepping in to control, and interfere with, the munificence of the Sovereign. I will then, if called upon, enforce payment of alimony, at the rate settled by Lord Stowell, from the quarter day immediately preceding the commencement of these proceedings; but I shall make no order, on one side or the other, as to any of the previous matters. The husband will, of course, pay the costs of this application: for I cannot call that which is paid as alimony under a decree of the Court separate income of the wife.

On the 3d Session of Easter Term, upon an application on the part of Lady Harriet de [332] Blaquiere to the Court for further directions as to the precise time from which the payment of alimony should commence, the Court, referring to the date of General de Blaquiere's first affidavit, and the communication of it to Lady Harriet's proctor, directed that it should commence "from the quarter day next preceding the 16th of February, 1829."

WILTSHIRE v. PRINCE, OTHERWISE WILTSHIRE. Consistory Court of London, Trinity Term, 3rd Session, 1830.—A marriage by banns—where, by the consent of both parties, one of the Christian names of the man (a minor) was omitted for the purpose of concealment—is null and void under st. 4 Geo. 4, c. 76, ss. 7 and 22. Quære, if only one of the parties knew of the false publication.

This was a suit of nullity of marriage by reason of an undue publication of banns, and was promoted by Henry John Wiltshire against Elizabeth Prince, calling herself Wiltshire.(a)

The libel pleaded, first, st. 4 Geo. 4, c. 76, ss. 7 and 22.

2d and 3d. The birth of H. J. Wiltshire on 20th April, 1809; and his baptism in the church of St. George, Bloomsbury, on the 23d April, 1812, by the names of "Henry John."

4th. That in March, 1827, Elizabeth Prince, aged 30 years, entered, as cook, the service of Robert and Mary Wiltshire (the parents of the complainant), living in Great Russell Street.

(a) The citation was taken out on behalf of Robert Wiltshire, the natural and lawful father, and guardian of his son, a minor. On 1st of May, 1830, this citation was returned into Court; the libel was admitted on the 29th. On the 7th of June the proctor for Robert Wiltshire alleged the son to be of age; exhibited as proctor for the son, and the father, being then dismissed from the suit, was, on the 16th, examined as a witness in the cause.

5th. That Prince prevailed upon H. J. Wilt-[333]-shire to procure the publication of banns between himself and her at St. Bride's on 20th January, 1828, and two following Sundays; and it was arranged between them, with a view to concealment, that he should, in the banns, be described by the name of "John." That, in pursuance of such banns, a marriage was had on the 5th of February, 1828, without the consent or knowledge of R. Wiltshire: "and that such marriage knowingly and wilfully had without due publication of banns was and is void."

6th. Exhibited a true copy of the entry of the banns; and also of the marriage.

7th. That H. J. Wiltshire from his infancy was invariably called by the name of "Henry John," and not "John;" and that as well before as after the marriage Elizabeth Prince constantly addressed and spoke of him by the name of "Henry," and no other.

8th. That Robert Wiltshire and his family did not discover nor were apprized of this marriage till 15th May, 1828, when H. J. W. was immediately sent abroad, where he remained till the commencement of this suit; and that Prince was, on the 19th May, 1828, dismissed the service of R. and M. W.

9th. That after her dismissal Prince remained some short time in the neighbourhood, when she quitted it, and R. W. was not able to discover her place of abode until shortly before the service of the citation.

The fact of marriage was admitted: and the minority, want of consent, and that Elizabeth Prince was cognizant that the name of the promoter was "Henry John," and that the [334] banns had been published by the name of "John" only were fully proved.

The King's advocate for Mr. Wiltshire.

Dodson contrà.

Judgment—Dr. Lushington. This is the first case in which the st. 4 Geo. 4, c. 76, s. 22, has undergone any judicial investigation. The true interpretation of the section is important: it enacts "that if any persons shall knowingly and wilfully intermarry without due publication of banns, or without a licence from a person having authority to grant the same, the marriages of such persons shall be null and void to all intents and purposes whatsoever." This is the substance of this section as relating to the question for my consideration. Now, whatever might be the construction of this section when one only of the parties knew of the false publication, here there is sufficient evidence to shew that both the man and the woman were aware that the banns had been published in a manner calculated to conceal the identity of one of the parties. The omission of a Christian name may operate as a concealment as much as the omission of a surname. Looking to the whole of the evidence, I am satisfied that in the present case the publication was contrary to this section of the act of parliament, and that both parties were perfectly cognizant, before the marriage, of the violation of its provisions. I pronounce the marriage null and void.

[335] SHARPE AND SANGSTER v. HANSARD. Consistory Court of London, 17th July, 1830.—Where no substantial inconvenience was shewn by one individual, who opposed the faculty, and when the plan had been adopted at a vestry on the unanimous report of a committee, the Court will grant a faculty to level a churchyard and lay flat upright head and foot stones, with a clause that no expence shall fall on individuals.

This was an application for a faculty for the purpose of laying flat the grave-stones standing upright in the churchyard of St. Bride's, London, and for levelling the ground: and was promoted by the churchwardens against the vicar and parishioners. A decree, with intimation, having issued, Thomas Hansard—a parishioner—declared that he opposed the faculty: and, in substance, alleged: "That there is now standing upright in the churchyard a gravestone erected by him to his wife and three children, that he paid to the churchwardens a fee for the erection thereof; that no benefit can accrue to the parish by levelling the gravestones, and that, by the application, many parishioners (who object) will be put to an unnecessary expence."

On the part of the churchwardens it was alleged "that the purposes for which the faculty was prayed would be a great benefit and convenience to the parish in the judgment and belief of a very considerable majority of the parishioners; that there were now above one hundred and fifty upright head and foot stones placed in such an irregular manner that a great portion of the ground—of great value for sepulture—was rendered useless; that, if laid flat and regular, much ground would not only be gained, but the churchyard would have a more neat and decent appearance; that it might then be kept in [336] proper order, and the circulation of air—at present greatly impeded—be made freer; that the soil of the churchyard was elevated several feet above the level of the surrounding streets and foot-paths. That at a vestry on 6th of January, 1830, it was resolved to refer to a committee of fourteen the state of the burial ground, and other matters appertaining to the expence of burials, and to report thereon; that on 2d of April a report (signed by all the committee), recommending an application for the faculty in question, was unanimously adopted in vestry. That many persons who have relations buried in the churchyard, and to whose memory grave-stones have been erected, consent to the faculty, that the expence would be inconsiderable, and greatly exceeded by the benefits and convenience."

In rejoinder, some slight inconveniences were pointed out: a specific denial was given as to the soil being elevated, and as to the benefits and conveniences averred by the churchwardens; and it was asserted new stones would be required.

Affidavits on both sides were exhibited.

Addams in support of the faculty.

The King's advocate contrà.

Judgment—Dr. Lushington. This is an application for a faculty with a view to make certain alterations in the churchyard of St. Bride's. It appears that grave-stones have been there erected without resorting to this Court for a faculty; and it is not very usual in [337] such cases to make application for faculties. The leading object of the Court in granting faculties is the convenience of the parishioners: in this instance it seems that a committee, having been appointed to examine the churchyard, recommended certain alterations: their report was unanimously adopted: the vestry meetings, connected with this matter, were duly convened: every publicity requisite was afforded to the parishioners: notice of an intended application for a faculty was given, and there was no expression of dissent: the vicar of the parish offers no opposition, the Court must, therefore, consider him as consenting: the proposed alteration is sworn to be advantageous to the parish; and it is not denied that space, a most important consideration in this metropolis, would be acquired.(a) It is also stated that the appearance of the churchyard would be materially improved: this, however, does not weigh very much with the Court. Clearly, if there had been no opposition to the grant, the Court would have allowed the faculty: and in regard to the objections, the Court, looking to the affidavits before it to ascertain to what grievance any individual might be subject, does not think that the application can be effectually resisted. It is not probable that by laying the stones flat any serious inconvenience will arise, and that the general objects contemplated by [338] this measure will be advantageous, cannot, I think, be doubted. I am, therefore, of opinion that the faculty, prayed by a majority of the parishioners, must pass: but at the same time I direct that the laying the stones flat shall not subject any individual to expence.

Faculty decreed.

TURTON v. TURTON. Consistory Court of London, Trinity Term, 1st Session, 1830.

—In a suit for separation for the husband's adultery with his wife's sister, proof that the wife, after knowledge of previous adultery, allowed, under peculiar circumstances, this sister to accompany them to India and to live in the same house with them, will not bar the wife on the ground of connivance: her conduct, though imprudent, not being traced to a disregard of her own honor, nor to any motive necessarily criminal.—After publication, in a suit for separation for the husband's adultery, the Court will not, in the first instance, delay the hearing in order that the wife may counterplead her letters annexed to the husband's interrogatories, from which connivance, or a par delictum (neither pleaded), is to be inferred; but semble, that it will not ultimately allow her to be barred by reason of such letters without affording her an opportunity of explaining them. —In a suit for separation for the husband's adultery, the Court will not direct

(a) The committee reported "that the churchyard, if properly arranged, would hold about 300 graves; that owing to the lines of graves being irregular, some ground was rendered useless; that about half the ground was occupied, and that there were about 100 graves which could not at present be disturbed."

the husband to give security for costs, on a suggestion, unsupported by affidavit, that he was going abroad.—The Court will not, before the hearing, rescind the conclusion in order to admit an allegation counterpleading letters annexed to interrogatories, nor will it direct such letters to be disannexed; but semble, that if at the hearing the letters appear important, it will then allow the admissibility of the allegation to be debated.—Condonation and connivance are essentially different in their nature, though they may have the same legal consequence.—Condonation may be meritorious: connivance necessarily involves criminality; and therefore the evidence to establish it should be the more grave and conclusive.—To found legal condonation as a bar to adultery there must be a complete knowledge of all the adulterous connexion, and a condonation subsequent to such knowledge.—The Court, or the husband's counsel, may take the objection of the wife's connivance when it clearly appears on the evidence adduced by her: but quære, whether such a defence can be set up on interrogatories alone; at all events, to support such a defence so set up, the conduct and evidence to prove it must be most unequivocal and incapable of explanation.

[Discussed, Dempster v. Dempster, 1861, 2 Sw. & Tr. 438.]

This suit was promoted by the wife against her husband, on the ground of adultery with her sister. The marriage took place in November, 1812: and the cohabitation ceased in February, 1824. The libel was admitted without opposition: it consisted of twelve articles.

Five witnesses were examined. A sister of the wife deposed, upon the 4th article, "that late in October, 1821, she had reason to believe an improper, but not a criminal, attachment existed between her sister A. and Mr. Turton; that, as the elder sister, she interfered, and it was arranged that A. should not go into his house unaccompanied by some one of her family. Out of regard to the feelings of the family deponent kept it a secret. Early in January, 1822, while the wife and deponent were on a visit in the country, the wife opened a letter from A. to Turton; they both read it, and instantly ordered horses and returned home, when deponent had an interview with [339] T., and it was agreed between them, with the concurrence of A., that all further intercourse should cease, and what had taken place be carefully concealed from the family, and that he should go to India. That early in February deponent and A. went with their father to Bath, where they remained together till the 20th of July, when A. clandestinely went off. Deponent never saw T. or his wife from the time of her going to Bath, nor A. after she quitted it, previous to her proceeding to India."

In answer to interrogatories, it appeared "that in April and in November, 1821, A. was at Brighton with Mrs. T. Respondent does not believe that T. was there at such times unless merely on a Sunday. After the unequivocal terms of the letter shewn to her by Mrs. T. both T. and A. confessed (in the wife's presence) that a guilty connexion had taken place between them. Mrs. T. in October, 1821, informed respondent that in that month she had intercepted a letter from her sister A. to T. which made her acquainted that there was a warm attachment between A. and T. The elopement of A. from Bath was not discovered until nine at night; respondent and her father (who knew nothing of this criminal intercourse then, nor for years after) got to Portsmouth the next morning; were there informed that Mr. and Mrs. T. were at Cowes, at which place they were to be taken on board; that, not believing this account, they travelled to a friend's house, but not finding them at it, they returned to Portsmouth on the next morning, where, unable to learn any tidings, [340] they remained a few hours, and returned to Bath." (a) She believes "that on or about 21st July, 1822, T., his wife, and A. went over to the Isle of Wight, and that Mrs. T. consented rather than that her father should be made acquainted with the misconduct of A.: and that had she not consented she would have been left behind by her husband. Mrs. T. arrived in England from India in July, 1824: she told respondent that her husband accompanied her upon her embarkation. Since her arrival she has received valuable presents from him. Respondent swears that the conduct of Mrs. T. with reference to Mr. F. L. (a friend of T.) was such as was approved of by her and the rest of her family, that is, there was nothing to disapprove of. She never observed familiarities, or a habit of familiarity, between them, which appeared to respondent unbecoming in Mrs. T. as a married woman."

(a) In a letter written by Mrs. T. to a sister of her husband's from Andover (bearing the postmark July 22, 1822) were these passages: "We are waiting here the arrival of my sister A.; she was suffering so much from my departure that I have consented to her wish of accompanying us, unknown to my father." "I confess I do not feel quite happy about it, but I could not bear to leave her in misery."

A physician, after deposing that "in January, 1823, he was introduced to T., his wife, and A., upon their arrival in India:" went on, upon the 5th article, "that in April, 1823, he was sent for on an emergency, in the night, to the house of T., where he delivered A. of a child: until the moment of his entering the [341] room he was not informed of her pregnancy. Mrs. T. asked him 'what could be done to save appearances?' She was in great agitation: her husband came into the room: he concurred with her in urging secrecy: the child was conveyed out of the house within a few hours after its birth to be nursed. Deponent was left to his own suspicions as to who was the child's father. Upon the 6th, that on A.'s recovery, he suggested to T. the expediency of sending her to England: he repeatedly urged it: he made the remonstrances in consequence of representations by Mrs. T. and of rumours prejudicial to T. Just before T. was taken ill it was said Mrs. T. was to proceed to England in the 'Woodford:' but that, in consequence of his illness, the project was abandoned. She sailed for England in February or March, 1824."

7th and 8th. "A. continued to reside with T. till February, 1829, when deponent sailed for England. In January, 1825, he was called to attend her at T.'s residence; about two months previously he had been informed by T. that she was again with child, and that he would be wanted to attend her. Since deponent's arrival in England he has seen A. and T. at the house of T.; there was one child with them, which he believes to be the child born in January, 1825."

Upon interrogatories. "The child born on 27th of April, 1823, lived about two months. "Its birth appeared an unexpected event. The mother could not have been aware of such pregnancy on the 3d of August preceding. [342] He had many conversations with Mrs. T.: she informed him that a criminal intercourse was carried on between T. and her sister: she never gave him to understand that A. was pregnant when she quitted England, or that Mrs. T. believed her sister so to have been.(a) T. never promised in his hearing that A. should return to England. After the recovery from his illness in August, 1823, T., his wife and A. went into the country together for about a month or six weeks. In November he had a relapse. His wife and her sister indiscriminately attended on and nursed him. Respondent repeatedly found A. alone with him when Mrs. T. was from home."

Two servants deposed, "That in the autumn and close of 1829 and early in 1830 A. was considered the mistress of the house in which she was living with T.; that they associated together at meals, but occupied separate bedrooms; and that there were three children who called T. 'papa.'"

To the interrogatories several letters of the wife were annexed: those to her husband at the end of the year 1823, and two (after her arrival in England) dated respectively September, 1824, [343] and January, 1825, were written in terms of extreme affection for him. They were, with others, introduced for the purpose of shewing that she acquiesced in the arrangement for her sister to accompany her and T. to india; and that while there she resided with them; and further, that Mrs. T. had, in India, corresponded very familiarly with a young single man.

On publication of the evidence the counsel for the wife applied to the Court for leave to bring in an allegation with certain exhibits—which formed the other part of the correspondence between her and her husband—in order to explain her letters to him (annexed to his interrogatories) and to remove any inference, prejudicial to her cause, that might be drawn from her letters.

Phillimore and Dodson for the wife. No defensive plea has been given: but several of the interrogatories have been framed, and some of the letters introduced, with a view to convey insinuations against the wife: the circumstances suggested in these interrogatories should have been pleaded, and the letters annexed, to have enabled the wife to counter-plead and rebut them: they have been clandestinely imported into the suit: they are not exculpatory, but recriminatory. Our object is to meet the letters of the wife by letters in the husband's hand-writing. Pleading after publication is not frequent, but it is in the discretion of the Court: Webb v. Webb (1 Hagg. Ecc. 349). Middleton [344] v. Middleton (2 Hagg. Ecc. 134 (Supplement). See also Hamerton v. Hamerton, supra, 1). But the application stands so obviously on every principle of justice that it requires no authority in this instance to sustain it.

---

(a) It was pleaded in the 4th article that "while at Portsmouth, about to embark, T. declared to his wife that A. was pregnant by him; . . . that on his knees he solemnly promised never to renew his criminal intercourse with her, and that she should return to England as soon as recovered from her expected delivery; and that he would never see her, except in her (his wife's) presence: that she being alone, without any friend to advise with, and most anxious to protect her family and herself from the scandal and disgrace necessarily incident to such an exposure, did, upon the faith of such promise, allow A. to accompany T. and herself to India."

The King's advocate and Addams contrà. The wife could not be ignorant of these letters. Some were written during cohabitation, others after she had left her husband in India: parol evidence is not admissible for the purpose of explanation. If, at the hearing of the cause, it should appear that any part of the letters relied upon are particularly stringent, and that the wife has had no opportunity of giving an explanation, then, according to the maxim "causa nunquam concluditur contrà judicem," the Court may give her that power. In the cases cited there were facts of adultery "noviter perventa." This is an application for permission to explain.

Per Curiam. I have had no previous intimation of this motion; but, as I feel no difficulty in disposing of it, it is not necessary for me to read the letters, nor make myself any further acquainted with the cause: the contents of the documents would not affect my present decision. These letters must, I apprehend, have been annexed to the interrogatories either to substantiate a charge of connivance in the wife, or as recriminatory. Now, I am not aware of a case in which, upon answers to interrogatories, the Court has decided either that connivance or recrimination has been proved [345] so as to dismiss the suit of the wife: and on principle, I conceive it would be difficult to arrive at such a decision. If at the hearing of the cause reliance be placed upon the letters annexed to the interrogatories, and I should be of opinion that the charge against the husband is proved, and that some explanation is required on the part of the wife, I should not do justice to her, unless I afforded her a full opportunity of making a defence. Something has been said as if this explanation were a matter of strict necessity; but the Court must judge for itself, and I shall allow the cause to come on, in its present state, for argument; and unless it should then appear indispensably requisite to admit an explanation, I shall proceed to sentence, even though there be some minute matters which the wife might be anxious to explain.

Phillimore. The absence of an explanation, we are apprehensive, may prejudice the wife in case she resorts to a higher tribunal for a dissolution of her marriage.

Per Curiam. I rely on the wisdom and justice of that superior tribunal to enable the wife, if necessary, to vindicate herself. I must confine myself to what is material for the administration of justice in this Court.

The Court was then prayed—upon a suggestion that Mr. Turton was about to return immediately to India—to direct him to give security for costs and alimony.

[346] Per Curiam. I do not consider that the order (see "Orders of Court," No. 13, vol. 2, p. xvi.) in respect to a security for costs entitles the wife, in a matrimonial suit, as a matter of course, to enforce the regulation: it applies principally to testamentary causes: but still may be introduced into cases of another description. The application, in this instance, is not supported by affidavit: I decline to make any order, and I conclude the cause.

[Note.—These "orders" the Judge of the Consistory Court of London, on the 1st Session of Easter Term, 1830, had directed should operate and take effect in the Consistory Court as far as the nature of the suits would allow.]

On a subsequent day an application was made to the Court, in chambers, to rescind the conclusion of the cause for the purpose of receiving this allegation: the application was again refused; and on the 30th of June, at the hearing of the cause, the counsel for Mrs. Turton having again applied to the Court either to allow the allegation and exhibits to be brought in, or to direct Mrs. Turton's letters to be disannexed from the interrogatories, the Court observed: "I am yet in doubt to what extent it is intended, on the part of the husband, to press the letters annexed to his interrogatories, and also the answers to those interrogatories which the wife is so desirous of noticing. It is then, I repeat, necessary for me first to ascertain what use is made of these [347] documents and answers by the husband's counsel; and if, during the argument, they are insisted upon as a bar to the separation prayed by the wife, and I should consider them important, I will allow the admissibility of the plea, now tendered, to be debated: but otherwise its contents will be immaterial."

The case was then argued upon the merits. The King's advocate, with whom was Addams, admitted there was sufficient evidence of the adultery; but that the wife, having continued to cohabit with her husband after she had full knowledge of his connexion with her sister, at least six months before she consented to her accompanying them to India, was barred by her own conduct of legal relief.

Per Curiam. Is there any instance of a bar on the ground of the wife's connivance, where no defensive plea has been given? Secondly, if connivance on the part of the wife be established, will that debar her from a decree of separation in a case of incestuous adultery?

The King's advocate. In Walker v. Walker (2 Phill. 153) there was no defensive plea, and the wife was held barred: that was the effect of great length of time; so far the circumstances are not similar; but the principle is there recognized that the acquiescence of the wife, though not pleaded, yet if clearly proved in the cause, is sufficient. This is admitted in Beeby v. Beeby (1 Hagg. Ecc. 795-7). If the law does not permit a wife to acquiesce in [348] the adultery of her husband, a fortiori, not in incestuous adultery. In Denniss v. Denniss connivance at incest barred the husband.(a)

Phillimore and Dodson for the wife, in reply. The fourth article of the libel (see ante, p. 342, in notis) has not been counterpleaded: it must, therefore, be taken pro confesso. The forgiveness was conditional. There is nothing to shew that the criminal intercourse was renewed while the wife was in India; nor, even if it could be inferred that it took place, that she was cognisant of it. No instance has occurred of the wife being barred by condonation, or connivance, merely suggested on interrogatory. Durant v. Durant: (c) and, in that case, the Court said, "All authorities shew that condonation is not so readily presumed, as a bar, against the wife as against the husband. The injury is different: the for-[349]-giveness on the part of the wife is meritorious, while, on the part of the husband, it would be degrading and dishonorable." Walker v. Walker was an extreme case; it furnishes an exception to the general rule. In Beeby v. Beeby the Court held the wife's forbearance highly laudable, and condonation not established. The passages relied on were doubts dropped to guard against misrepresentation. The present case is so completely proved that we are now satisfied with the evidence, as it stands, without an explanatory allegation.

17th July.—Judgment—Dr. Lushington. This is a suit brought by Mrs. Turton against her husband for a divorce, by reason of adultery alleged to have been committed by him with her own sister. The parties were married in November, 1812, and, so far as can be collected from the peculiar circumstances of the case, the commencement of the intercourse between Mr. Turton and the sister of his wife was towards the end of the year 1821. The first question is whether the charge of adultery is substantiated; and although the evidence perhaps has not been produced in quite so satisfactory a form as the Court could have desired, yet, looking to all the circumstances of the case—to the difficulties which interposed to the completion of the proof in a better shape, and to the fact that Mr. Turton's counsel do not deny the guilt with which he is charged—I am satisfied that sufficient is proved to enable me to proceed to the consideration of the remaining parts of the case.

[350] The cohabitation of Mr. Turton and the sister of his wife appears to have

---

(a) Consistory, Hilary Term, 1808.—This was a suit for separation for the wife's adultery with the husband's brother. On the part of the wife an allegation—recriminatory and pleading connivance—had been admitted. At the final hearing of the cause the Court refused a sentence of separation, on the ground of connivance, and thus concluded its judgment: "Upon the evidence of this conduct, it is painful to pronounce that the husband is not entitled: he acted with imprudence in admitting such a brother: this was followed by the discovery of the adultery, which he severely felt; he repressed his feelings because he was under pecuniary obligations and suffered the intercourse to go on till the brother urged his demand; this the law will not permit. The husband is charged with adultery with three persons; into this it is unnecessary to enquire; for no alteration of the sentence would take place. I dismiss the suit."

(c) 1 Hagg. Ecc. 733. See also, upon the doctrine of connivance, Rogers v. Rogers (supra, 57), and the several cases appended to it.

continued up to the commencement of the cause; for I take it to be clear that, according to the doctrine of this Court, and according to all the principles in similar cases, if it can be once shewn that the parties had been cohabiting in an illicit connexion, it must be presumed, if they are still living under the same roof, that the criminal intercourse subsists, notwithstanding those, who live under the same roof, are not prepared to depose to that fact. The next point is, whether Mrs. Turton, who would thus be entitled to a separation from her husband, is barred by any misconduct of her own, or by any circumstances developed in the course of these proceedings. It must be manifest that if once the guilt of the husband be established, the onus probandi shifts; and if he seeks to deprive her of her remedy, by imputing a charge of criminality of any kind, he should make good that charge by evidence which admits of no dispute.

By way of defence to this suit, nothing has been set up in plea; but it is argued on behalf of Mr. Turton, from the answers to the interrogatories, and from certain letters attached to those interrogatories, that Mrs. Turton has so misconducted herself as to forfeit her claim to the remedy she prays. This branch of the case divides itself into two points: the first is, whether there has been any thing which can be termed condonation on the part of Mrs. Turton; and secondly, whether there has been connivance; for I apprehend these are essentially different in their nature, though either may have the same legal consequence. Condonation may take place, without imputing, either [351] in the case of a wife or of a husband, the slightest degree of blame, especially in the case of the wife, whose conduct might be more meritorious from her forgiveness of injury. But connivance necessarily involves criminality on the part of the individual who connives; and as the blame sought to be imputed is the more serious, so ought the evidence in support of such a charge to be the more grave and conclusive. As to condonation, it is impossible that any such defence can be maintained on this occasion; for I take the doctrine to be perfectly true, as laid down by the learned Dean of the Arches in the case of Durant v. Durant (1 Hagg. Ecc. 733), that in order to found a legal condonation, there must be a complete knowledge of all the adulterous connexion, and a condonation subsequent to it. Although it might be argued with a semblance of truth, that in 1822, even prior to the period when Mrs. Turton quitted England, she had pardoned the offence against her bed, yet there is not the slightest degree of evidence, or the least circumstance, to induce the Court to suppose that she ever intended to extend her condonation to the subsequent intercourse between the parties.

The attention of the Court must be confined, then, to this single point—Has Mrs. Turton connived at the injury of which she now complains? Before I proceed further I must repeat that no such averment has been given in plea. If I am called upon to decide, even in the present stage, on the charge of connivance sought to be established against Mrs. Turton, I should have to decide it on letters, which are annexed to interrogatories, and which consequently the wife [352] has had no opportunity to explain.(a) I am not aware of any previous instance in which a decision has been made on evidence thus ex parte. If I were of opinion that there was a primâ facie case against Mrs. Turton, it is manifestly clear that, according to all principles of justice, I should be bound to afford her an ample opportunity of explaining her conduct. There can be no rule of practice, in this or any other Court, so strict as to defeat the ends of justice; and I may with truth affirm that this Court possesses in common with, and to the full extent of, other Courts, the power of adapting its rules of practice to the exigency of the case; and that it will never defeat justice by adhering to technical rules. Though, indeed, the Court, or the husband's counsel, might take the objection of connivance where it clearly appeared on the face of the evidence adduced by the wife herself, it is a serious question whether it is competent to the husband to set up such a defence by interrogatory only, without giving the adverse party a full opportunity to answer: at all events, in such a case, the conduct, and the evidence to prove it, must be most unequivocal, and incapable of explanation. But it is not necessary for me to determine to what extent the answers to the interrogatories and the letters ought to be admitted, or whether they ought to be excluded altogether; for, in the present instance, taking them as part of the case, [353] I can, with satisfaction to my mind and conscience, arrive at a decision respecting which I entertain no doubt: for there is nothing in the letters which, in my apprehension, tends, in the slightest degree, to support the imputation of connivance upon the wife in the continuance of the intercourse between her husband and her sister.

(a) According to the practice of the Ecclesiastical Courts, documents annexed to the interrogatories cannot be known to the other party to have been so annexed till publication of the evidence has passed; and when, without special leave, no further plea, unless exceptive, can be admitted.

It has been said that, after her suspicions had been awakened, Mrs. Turton allowed her sister to remain under her roof at Brighton, where Mr. Turton had the means of access to her. But so far as the proof goes, such opportunities, if they existed at all, must have been extremely rare, for Mr. Turton was at that time engaged in London, and only went there occasionally for a day: but as soon as she knew the connexion had taken place, Mrs. Turton, through the medium of her eldest sister, contrived an arrangement whereby the object of Mr. Turton's attachment was removed.

Unquestionably at that period there was a condonation of the husband's offence. It is perfectly clear that during the year 1822, and for a subsequent time, Mrs. Turton made up her mind to forgive, and to cohabit with, her husband, as if no such calamitous disgrace had occurred; and if the connexion had not been renewed, however disgusting that connexion was, there would remain no question that, by admitting her husband to her bed, the condonation was complete.(a)

[354] In 1822, it would seem, in consequence of this unfortunate intercourse, Mr. Turton determined to quit England and go to India. It would appear that when Mr. Turton and his wife were on their way to the sea-coast, preparatory to embarking for Calcutta, the sister joined them, and, with the acquiescence of Mrs. Turton, sailed with them to India. Now, reviewing this transaction at the present period, it is impossible not to entertain more than a doubt as to the propriety of Mrs. Turton's conduct. I may feel it to be strange that when the insult was thus renewed she did not resent the conduct of her husband, and at once separate herself from him. But I must consider the peculiar situation in which Mrs. Turton was placed. This was no ordinary case; the circumstance is not one of frequent occurrence. If, refusing to accede to the request of her husband, she had determined upon instant separation and public exposure, she knew the consequences—which must have had some influence upon a feeling mind and an affectionate heart—the exposure of her own family, and the degradation of her own sister. Alone, without the benefit of advice and assistance, if not under the control, at least under the superintendence, and within the influence, of her husband, and with every consideration to induce her to wish for concealment and prevent disgrace, I must not judge her conduct, on this occasion, with too much severity; and I am not prepared to conclude that, in allowing her sister to accompany them to India, and there to remain for the purpose [355] of concealment, Mrs. Turton has forfeited her claim to the remedy which she now seeks. It must be recollected that Mrs. Turton has expressly averred (see ante, p. 342, in notis) that, at this period, Mr. Turton represented her sister to be pregnant, and strongly urged that circumstance as a ground of her leaving this country, and sailing with them to India, promising that when the child should have been born and the desired secrecy attained she should be sent back to England.

After arriving in India there seems to have been a rather long space of time before Mrs. Turton returned to England; but this delay is chiefly explained by the dangerous illness of Mr. Turton, and by other circumstances.(b) At all events, there is nothing to satisfy my mind that she became reconciled in the slightest degree to the continuance of the intercourse between her husband and sister: and I am of opinion, therefore, that she is not guilty of connivance. These facts appear then to me to comprehend the whole of the case.

I have read the letters with care and attention; but I can see no reason to detail

---

(a) In Denniss v. Denniss (supra, p. 348) the Court said, that though the wife was entitled to her dismissal on the ground of the husband's connivance at her incest with his brother, it did not necessarily follow that, in a suit for restitution of conjugal rights, the Court would compel the husband to return to an incestuous bed.

(b) The cabin on board the "Woodford," which Mrs. Turton had secured for her voyage to this country, and had afterwards relinquished upon the serious illness of her husband, was, at his recovery, engaged to another party; and Mrs. Turton had no subsequent opportunity of sailing that season for England.

their contents at any length, nor to doubt as to the judgment which it is my duty to pronounce. Mrs. Turton was placed in a situation of painful difficulty; and if I am of opinion that throughout the whole of this calamitous case she has not adopted that line of conduct which prudence [356] might consider best, yet I am unable to trace it to any disregard of her own honour, or ascribe it to any motive necessarily criminal. I think she is entitled to the remedy she prays; and I feel it the more especially in a case of this peculiar description, where the parties are so nearly connected in blood, and where the offence has been committed against the wife. All reasons unite to convince me that the justice of the case requires that the wife should be removed entirely from the control of a husband who has so repeatedly sinned and offended against her. I pronounce for the separation.

THE OFFICE OF THE JUDGE PROMOTED BY JARMAN v. BAGSTER. Consistory Court of London, Easter Term, 4th Session, 1830.—On debating the admissibility of articles in a suit for brawling, the question is whether they contain a substantive charge of brawling and riot in a sacred place: and no occasion nor provocation can exempt from the penalties of the law; nor can the Court listen to a suggestion that the articles do not truly detail the circumstances.—Articles for brawling, at a vestry held in a room within the church, being only proved in part, the Court monished the defendant to abstain from future misconduct, and condemned him in 20*l.* nomine expensarum.

This was a suit promoted by one of the churchwardens of St. Bartholomew the Great, London, against a parishioner for "quarrelling, chiding, and brawling, and for creating a riot and disturbance in the vestry-room."

The first and second articles pleaded, in the ordinary form, the law.

3. After alleging a select vestry, pleaded, in substance, that "on Tuesday, 6th of April, the overseers, churchwardens, and others of the select vestrymen of the parish were duly assembled in the vestry-room, which is within, and forms part of, the parish church, for the purpose of making a poor-rate: that, while there engaged in considering, and receiving for consideration, certain appeals from assess-[357]-ments, you, Samuel Bagster—not being a select vestryman of the parish—accompanied by divers other persons, in a tumultuous manner rushed forcibly into the vestry-room, and seated yourself therein; that you and such other persons were thereupon reasoned with on the impropriety of your conduct, and were informed that, upon retiring, you would be individually attended to without delay: that thereupon you, S. B., in a chiding, brawling, and quarrelsome manner, declared you would be present at the making of the rate: that in consequence of such your violent conduct the business was completely impeded and the meeting necessarily adjourned: that you, S. B., in the vestry-room, used other quarrelsome, chiding, and brawling expressions, and otherwise then conducted yourself in an outrageous manner, and created a riot and disturbance in the vestry."

4. "That, immediately after the adjournment of the meeting, you, S. B., were requested by the churchwarden to leave the vestry-room, but refused: that he expressed his surprise at seeing you in the vestry-room after a declaration which you had some time before made, viz.—'that you would be happy to see the church (of St. Bartholomew the Great) burnt to the ground.' That you, S. B., seated yourself upon the table in the vestry-room, abused Jarman, and called out to him in a loud and angry tone of voice, 'You are a liar;' and then used other brawling expressions."

Addams in objection to the articles. The [358] parish is one of the smallest in the diocese: it has hitherto been governed by a select vestry—the subject of much dissatisfaction and complaint; and upon the authority of Lord Tenterden's opinion in The King v. Woodman (4 B. & Ald. 509) the parishioners are about to apply for a mandamus respecting its validity. There is no brawling, by words, charged in the early part of the third article: it only objects to the defendant's manner: and the amount of the whole article is, that he seated himself where perhaps he had no right. In the recent case of Lee v. Mathews (supra, 169) the Court strongly animadverted upon the office being promoted without laying before it the whole transaction: there are, in this case, many facts of extenuation, if not justification, suppressed.

Dodson contrà. The constitution of the vestry has nothing to do with the question. In Lee v. Mathews the observations were not made on the admission of the articles, but when the case came on for argument upon the evidence.

Judgment—Dr. Lushington. The citation calls upon the defendant to answer to a charge clearly of ecclesiastical cognizance; and I have only to consider whether the articles contain a substantive charge of brawling and riot in a sacred place. It is much to be lamented that, notwithstanding the notoriety of the proceedings in cases of brawling, parishioners will not be convinced that, what-[359]-ever may be their own private opinions as to the matters under discussion in vestry, they must not press those opinions in an undecorous and irreverent manner. It is not rectitude of intention nor accuracy of judgment that will, if charges of disturbance arising from such conduct are proved, exempt them from the penalties of the law.

In respect to the third article, this Court has not to determine the legality of the select vestry: if the defendant thinks that, as a parishioner, any of his rights are infringed, he can have no difficulty in finding a remedy: but he must not attempt to establish one right by the infringement of another: whatever may be the occasion or whatever the provocation, consecrated ground must be respected. I am of opinion that enough is stated in the third article to render it incumbent upon the Court to admit it.

It is said that there are many circumstances immediately connected with this transaction which, if detailed to the Court, would much alter the complexion of the case; and it is urged, in reliance upon what fell from the Dean of the Arches in Lee v. Mathews, that the whole history of what occurred at the vestry should be disclosed: but the observations of that learned Judge are not applicable to this stage of the proceedings: because I cannot take, in opposition to the articles themselves, a mere statement by the defendant's counsel: if, however, such circumstances can be proved as will materially vary the case, it may be judicious for the promoter well to consider whe-[360]-ther he will persevere in the suit; but, at present, it is my duty to admit the articles to go to proof.

Articles admitted.

Michaelmas Term, 2nd Session.—Eight witnesses were examined upon these articles; and upon their depositions and the answers to the interrogatories addressed to them the cause was argued by the King's advocate and Dodson for the promoter, and Addams for the defendant: when the Court was of opinion that the articles, except the fourth article, were proved; and said that, considering that only part of the charge was legally proved, it did not therefore think it necessary to decree a suspension ab ingressu ecclesiæ, but should content itself with admonishing the defendant to refrain from any future infringement of the law, and condemning him in the payment of 20l. nomine expensarum.

THE OFFICE OF THE JUDGE PROMOTED BY JARMAN v. WISE. Consistory Court of London, Easter Term, 4th Session, 1830.—On proof of violent conduct and great personal abuse, at a vestry held in a room within the church, the Court suspended the defendant ab ingressu ecclesiæ for fourteen days; but, under the circumstances, condemned him only in 35l. nomine expensarum.—In criminal suits the Court will sometimes inquire into the motives of the promoter, but it will presume proper motives unless there be strong proof to the contrary.

This was a suit for brawling and riot: and the third article charged the defendant that, "not being a vestryman, he, accompanied by other persons, in a tumultuous manner, rushed forcibly into the vestry-room," and so forth, as laid in the preceding case, and on the same occasion.

[361] The fourth, in substance, charged "that, immediately after the adjournment, you, Richard Wise, were requested by the churchwardens to leave the vestry-room; that you refused, and expressed your determination to keep the seat you had taken therein, and, in a chiding, brawling, and quarrelsome manner, said 'that you came there expressly to provoke a breach of the peace, and would not leave the vestry-room until turned out:' that you abused Jarman—called him 'a drunken churchwarden,' and declared that 'he and his fellow churchwardens were drunk every day:' and said to Jarman, 'A pretty fellow you are for a churchwarden, only an under-clerk to a woollen draper:' and then and there used other brawling expressions."

Michaelmas Term, 2nd Session.—The articles being admitted without opposition, the cause came on upon the evidence arising from the depositions and cross-examinations of the eight witnesses who were examined in the preceding case.

The King's advocate and Dodson for the promoter.

Addams contrà. The third article is not proved. I cannot deny but that the fourth is proved: it is, however, shewn that, previous to the expressions used by the defendant, there was much of taunt and provocation. The motives of a prosecutor are always inquired into as affecting costs: if [362] the proceedings had been for the purpose of example, one suit would have been sufficient.

Judgment—Dr. Lushington. The circumstances of this case are admitted, in some degree, to correspond with the case upon which I have already expressed my opinion. The question for my present consideration is whether any distinction can be established in favor of this defendant: and it is said that, as against him, the third article is not proved: and that, in respect to the fourth, there are many circumstances of extenuation. In criminal suits, it is true, the Ecclesiastical Court will sometimes inquire into the motives of a party bringing a suit (see Bennett v. Bonaker, supra, 17); but it is always difficult to ascertain accurately the motives with which a person is actuated: frequently, no doubt, they are of a complicated nature. On the present occasion I should have great hesitation in coming to a satisfactory conclusion as to what induced the institution of these proceedings; it is, however, unnecessary: but thus much I may say, that unless I manifestly saw proof of decidedly bad intentions in a promoter, the rules of law, as well as of charity, would oblige me to suppose he was solely influenced by proper feelings, and by a right sense of what the demands of the law peremptorily required.

It appears from the evidence of the beadle, on the third article, that Wise, with several other of the parishioners, was waiting in the church to complain of his assessment: and that he was requested to walk into the vestry-room: there [363] was therefore, in his case, no forcible entry: but I am of opinion that, as soon as he had entered the room, his conduct was such as is deserving of severe reprehension, and was calculated not only to insure a breach of the peace, but was so regarded and contemplated by himself. Mr. Clarke—who describes himself as an inhabitant householder of this parish for three or four and twenty years, and who has, it seems, filled the office of both upper and under warden, and is one of the select vestry-men—was present at this meeting; and he deposes "that Wise and two others were the most active in creating the disturbance; and declared that they came there for the purpose of being present at the making of the rate, that they insisted upon being so, and refused to retire unless forcibly turned out: that all persuasion failing, and it being impossible to proceed with business, the meeting was adjourned."

The conduct of the defendant, then, after he was in the vestry-room, so far from being decorous, brings him, in my apprehension, strictly within the charge.

The fourth article is admitted to be proved: it displays conduct of a gross and offensive kind: the words used by the defendant were words of great personal abuse, and applied to the churchwardens themselves, in their individual and private character, and not in regard to any matter arising from the business then before the vestry. It only, then, remains to award a due punishment.

The statute (5 & 6 Edw. 6, c. 4) under which this proceeding has been instituted enables the Court to exercise a discretion as to the period [364] of suspension ab ingressu ecclesiæ; which, under all the circumstances, I direct to be for the space of one fortnight. Full costs should, in strict justice, accompany this sentence. The worst language was commenced by the defendant; his behaviour was indecorous and reprehensible; but bearing in mind the commotions and jarring interests in this parish in respect to the select vestry; that the meeting was for secular purposes; and remembering the object and principle upon which all punishments should proceed, and that they should not be more than commensurate with the offence, I shall not, in this instance, go beyond a condemnation in 35l. nomine expensarum. The Court is sensible that if, in the opinion of the public, it should exceed in the punishment it inflicts what is necessary for the due correction of the offender, the salutary effects, which would result from a temperate exercise of this jurisdiction, would be much diminished: upon this consideration also—though I am aware that many of the interrogatories that have been addressed were not at all justified by the answers, nor by the merits of the case—I content myself with the sentence which I have pronounced.

The Court pronounced the articles proved; directed the defendant to be suspended for one fortnight, ab ingressu ecclesiæ, and condemned him in 35l. nomine expensarum.

[365] FLETCHER v. LE BRETON. High Court of Delegates, 24th June, 1830.—On an appeal from a definitive sentence, the Court rejected an allegation pleading facts not shewn to be noviter ad notitiam perventa.

This was an appeal from a sentence of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, by which the will of a married woman, opposed by the husband, had been established. The party died on the 19th of April, 1829, and the sentence was signed on the 21st of July following.

The will had been propounded in a short allegation upon which the two attesting witnesses, in the husband's service, and Sir Thomas Harvie Farquhar, the executor, who renounced, were examined. The attesting witnesses, in opposition to their own act, deposed "that the deceased was unfit to make a will." Sir T. H. F., who was her friend and trustee, deposed to the factum of the will, and that it was drawn up, under his directions, in conformity with a paper, tantamount to instructions, signed by the deceased: he also deposed, in answer to an interrogatory, "that the deceased and her husband did not live upon very affectionate terms together, at least that he frequently occasioned great uneasiness of mind [366] and personal inconvenience to the deceased by his extravagance: he, respondent, believes so, because she on many occasions complained that her husband had left her without money, and without even the means of procuring necessaries, and continually lamented that she had married him; that, in other respects, the deceased did admit that the personal behaviour of her husband towards her was kind." The residuary legatees were two sisters, who lived much with the deceased: but it was admitted that they were not related nor connected. Under a former will—drawn up in November, 1826, a month after the marriage, but not executed till the 19th of January, 1829—the husband, in case there were no children, was left the whole property.

In the Court below the husband, the present applicant, had offered no plea: and the present question respected the admissibility of an allegation now brought in on his behalf: it pleaded—

1st and 2nd. A draft marriage settlement varying, in its provisions, from the settlement executed: and that the latter was drawn up without his being consulted.

3rd. That in November, 1826, a will, in favor of her husband, was prepared for the deceased according to her request to Sir T. H. Farquhar; that she expressed herself perfectly satisfied, and stated that she would execute it the first time she had friends visiting her who would attest it.

4th. That in January, 1829, being unwell, she expressed a wish to execute her will; and exe-[367]-cuted it in the presence of two witnesses who had called to see her; that, when executed, it was delivered, unsealed, to Sir T. H. F., and remained in his care, and open to inspection, until after the deceased's death.

5th. That Fletcher and wife lived together, until her death, upon the most affectionate terms; that he at all times used his utmost endeavours to promote her happiness and comfort; and that she invariably, when speaking to her acquaintances of him, expressed the greatest regard and affection for him, and that she was perfectly satisfied with his uniform attention and kindness.

6th. That he invested the 2000l. he received upon marriage in the purchase of a coasting vessel, which had nearly been unproductive; that his income was reduced by the payment of his life insurance; and that although the deceased received from her trustees from 250l. to 300l. per annum, yet he continued to supply her with every comfort she required, much beyond what his income would warrant, and to the injury, as she well knew, of his own property.

7th. That her health declined progressively during the last four months of her life; that her mental faculties—from the exhaustion of Nature, induced in part by habits of intemperance contracted previous to the marriage—became very much weakened; that for about a month before her death she scarcely knew her own servants; and was, during the last week of her life, quite incompetent to understand the nature of a will.

8th. That by the will propounded she had bequeathed to one of her trustees a gold repeater which she gave to her husband on the [368] day of his marriage, at the same time expressing a wish "that he might live many years to wear it:" that from that day till her death he had kept possession of it.

9th. That the residuary legatees were not related to the deceased either by consanguinity or affinity.

On this day (the 24th of June) an affidavit was sworn by the husband, in which he specified the names of certain witnesses intended to be produced in support of the 5th, 6th, and 7th articles especially: and further stated that, "acting under professional advice, he had declined to plead in an earlier stage, from a perfect conviction that the incapacity of the deceased to make the will propounded would appear from the evidence of the attesting witnesses, who, through ignorance of the nature of the paper, had been induced to attest its execution." (a)[1]

Phillimore for the respondent, opened the proceedings. The power of the Court, upon an appeal from a definitive sentence, to receive a fresh plea, cannot be disputed; (b)[1] but the present allega-[369]-tion, in every point of view, is inadmissible: it manifestly grows out of the evidence already published; the fifth article especially. Besides this, every one of its averments might have been put in plea, and offered in the Court below. No facts are alleged to be noviter ad notitiam perventa; this alone is a complete bar. The allegation must be rejected, and the sentence affirmed with costs.

Haggard contrà. The admission of the appellant's allegation is not barred by any general rule of law: appeals are favored; and one of the objects of appeal is the admission of fresh pleas, and, in this instance, the justice of the case requires it. There may be some difficulty in ascertaining the precise meaning of Oughton's words "modo non obstet publicatio testium:" it is clear, however, that publication is not universally conclusive, because it necessarily precedes a definitive sentence. In the case of Girdler v. Lamb (Prerogative, Easter Term, 2nd Session), a will—propounded by the executor, and opposed by the next of kin (a cousin-german once removed)—was established on the evidence upon a common condidit: and, on appeal, after Girdler (having asserted an allegation) (b)[2] had declared he would no further prosecute his appeal, the Court of Dele-[370]-gates (a)[2] gave him leave to retract such declaration, rescinded the conclusion of the cause, and allowed him to give in an allegation, pleading derangement, influence, and control.(b)[3]

Phillimore. Girdler was in great distress. The case stands upon its own very strong and peculiar circumstances; and can form no precedent for the application, in this instance, which has nothing entitling it to indulgence.

The Court—consisting of Mr. Justice Bayley, Mr. Baron Garrow, Sir Herbert Jenner (King's advocate), Dr. Daubeny, Dr. Gostling, Dr. Dodson, and Dr. Chapman—after hearing counsel upon the contents of the plea, rejected the allegation.

Allegation rejected. Sentence affirmed without costs.

[371] SCALES v. HOILE (Office of the Judge promoted). High Court of Delegates, 4th December, 1830.—In a criminal suit for smiting under 5 & 6 Edw. VI. c. 4, the proof must not admit of a doubt. Two concurrent sentences, pronouncing the smiting proved, reversed, and both parties left to pay their own costs.

From the sentence of the Consistory Court in this case (see 2 Hagg. Ecc. 566) an

---

(a)[1] In the evidence, one of the two witnesses had stated "that she suspected it was a will."

(b)[1] Oughton thus states the rule. "In causâ appellationis à sententiâ diffinitivâ licet tam appellanti quam parti appellatæ non allegata allegare, et non probata probare, dummodo non obstet publicatio testium in hâc parte productorum," tit. 308. Consett also says, "So as the publication of the witnesses, produced in the first instance, hinder not." Ecclesiastical Practice, p. 216. See further upon this point. Gail. lib. 1, Observationes, 108, s. 9. Also Obs. 128, n. 1. Maranta, p. 408, s. 159. Gotofred: in Cod. 7, tit. 62, s. 6, p. 1. And see Price v. Clark and Pugh, supra, 265, in notis.

(b)[2] He had also asserted an allegation in the Prerogative Court.

(a)[2] The Judges who sat under the commission were: Mr. Justice Lawrence, Mr. Justice Le Blanc, Mr. Baron Wood, Dr. Arnold, Dr. Swabey, Dr. Ogilvie, Dr. Daubeny, Dr. Dodson.

(b)[3] The allegation was admitted after being reformed: a responsive allegation was also admitted; and on the 7th of December, 1812, the sentence of the Prerogative Court was affirmed with 100l. nomine expensarum.

Adams for the appellant.

Jenner and Edwards contrà.

appeal to the Court of Arches was interposed, where the sentence was affirmed with costs; but, on an appeal to the Court of Delegates, the Judges reversed the sentences of both Courts, and left each party to pay his own costs, on the ground, it is understood, that the evidence as to the smiting was not conclusive; and that, as it was a criminal matter, the defendant (Scales) was entitled to the benefit of the doubt.(b)

[373] STANLEY v. BERNES. High Court of Delegates, Hilary Term, 1830.—A natural born British subject may acquire a foreign domicil; nor will the animus revertendi, and claim to be considered, and treatment as a British subject, preserve his original domicil, and, if domiciled abroad, he must conform in his testamentary acts to the formalities required by the lex domicilii.—The will and first two codicils of a British born subject, resident and naturalized in the Portuguese dominions (the will disposing of effects partly in Portugal and partly in England), executed and purporting to be executed according to the laws of Portugal, but inferring that he considered himself an Englishman, admitted to probate; but two later codicils, fully proved as to capacity and intention, disposing solely of money in the British funds, attested by three witnesses, but not executed, nor purporting to be executed, according to the law of Portugal, refused probate by the Delegates, reversing a sentence of the Prerogative.

[Referred to, Moore v. Budd, 1832, 4 Hagg. Ecc. 352. Applied, De Bonneval v. De Bonneval, 1838, 1 Curt. 356; Countess of Zichy Ferraris v. Marquis of Hertford, 1843, 3 Curt. 487: affirmed nomine Croker v. Marquis of Hertford, 1844, 4 Moore, P. C. 339; Anderson v. Laneuville, 1854, 9 Moore, P. C. 325; Bremer v. Freeman, 1857, 10 Moore, P. C. 358; Whicker v. Hume, 1858, 7 H. L. Cas. 165; Bloxam v. Favre, 1883, 8 P. D. 104: affirmed 9 P. D. 130.]

On appeal from the Prerogative Court of Canterbury.

The deceased, John Stanley, died at Madeira on the 15th of November, 1826, being upwards of eighty years old; Helena Stanley, his widow, since dead, and John Stanley, the party in this cause, his only child, were the only persons entitled, in distribution, if he had died intestate. The deceased also left a natural son, Joze Maria Bernes (the other party in the cause), who was married and had five children, and was with his children largely benefited under the testamentary papers propounded.

The material parts of the testamentary papers were as follows:—

"In the name of God, Amen. I, John Stanley, born in Ireland, &c. do determine, as my last will and testament, as follows:—Having been brought up in the religion of the Established Church of England, I intend to die in that religion, and request that my burial may be in the English burying ground. Having a natural son named Joze Maria Bernes, now one of my family, he living in the same house with me, whose mother, of Pernes in Portugal, died when he was but two years old, and was reared by Roza Maria Joaquina, [374] also now of my family, who, having a niece, I caused her, being reared and educated from a tender age, and that my said natural son should marry her, she having a deal of merit, which in fact he did, and they have now five children. I hereby do acknowledge the said Bernes to be my son, and that his said children are my grand-children, and that they shall be always considered as such, as also any farther children they the aforesaid may have, for inheriting the property of mine, I bequeath them, or may hereafter bequeath them, or as my grand-children they may come entitled to. That in this consequence I bequeath to my eldest grandson, Joze Joaquim Bernes, 1000l. sterling money of Great Britain for himself and his heirs, and to the other four my grand-children 2400l. sterling money of Great Britain, being 600l. for each, for themselves and their heirs, with condition, that should they or any of them die minors or unmarried, such part or parts to devolve to the succeeding, my grand-children of said Joze Maria Bernes, and in failure to them living; should the eldest son, Joze Joaquim Bernes, die a minor, and unmarried, the legacy for him is to devolve to the other children aforesaid, and in failure of all the children, then these legacies are to devolve to the father and his heirs. That being under immense obligations to the aunt of said children, say, their mother, Joaquina, for rearing and promoting the education of my said natural son, she also aiding the rearing of my son John Stanley, junior, and being also indebted for her very great care of my health, to which end she left her country, and came hither with me to take care of me in my old age, serving also as company, these are services deserving the most grateful returns: and considering that the [375] house I gave her in Lisbon for her services there does not produce sufficient for her support, I bequeath her 1000l. sterling money of Great Britain, understood, the interest arising only during her life-time, and that she continues unmarried, for in such case of marriage, or she dying, this capital and interest is to devolve to the children of said J. M. Bernes, divided between them, and in failure to him and his heirs. Some transactions with my said natural son, I hereby declare are settled, and that he owes me nothing, and do hereby prohibit and forbid my son Stanley, jun., from investigating any thing relative to said transactions, nor what may concern Joaquina, neither to inquire for any money of any description there may be in the house, which cannot be much, having disposed and invested the same already in bills I sent to England. That know my son J. Stanley, jun., the only child I have surviving of my children in matrimony, I say that know he has very good principles, and will not oppose anything determined by me in my present last will and testament, so as to affect his own character and my memory; moreover, he must have a handsome property of his own, as is learned from existing circumstances regarding him, which have become acquainted with, so as the legacies I bequeath, or may bequeath hereafter, he can well afford. However, as I wish to provide and protect my poor family here from ties of blood and gratitude, should it unfortunately happen from being led astray, and instigated by connexions inimical to my family, he has formed, or may form, in such case, as a fine, I bequeath to my said natural son, for use and benefit of his children, and to be considered their property, and this to be considered an additional legacy for them. The legacy afore-[376]-said, as a fine, is 3000l. sterling money. That from the veracity my son J. Stanley, jun., possesses, he will not deny that a writing I signed in his favour in Lisbon many years ago, making over to him a large part of my property, was purely, and only fictitious, as a kind of a temporary provisional measure, by reason of the French at the time menacing to invade Portugal, conceiving, as being born in Portugal, that it may be more respected under his my said son's name; moreover, I acquired after a great deal more property now under my name, and solely mine, and this, independant of the large share of even more than half my property, I gave him, by putting it under his name when I intended retiring from Lisbon, which part or half of my property put into his hands is to be understood and considered, and also was his mother's share of the same, according to the laws of Portugal, though no writing was made between she and me to that effect. She laboured for many years, and does yet, under a disorder of mental derangement, causing her going to Ireland, where she still remains, and a yearly income established for her support, which my said son was to provide, by my retiring out of a part I gave of my property. I had a partnership with my said son several years ago, wherein, for the advantage or profits arising to him, he has been fully and amply compensated. The income for his said mother little exceeded the interest, say, a tenth part of the interest of the property belonging to me, which I gave him as aforesaid, as the state she was and is in rendered more useless, wherefore all that property becomes his. I repeat again, that am not afraid of the want of candour, veracity, and honour of my [377] said son J. Stanley, jun., as he possesses a great deal; it is only his connexions I fear, that he may be instigated by such, so as to forget the duty and respect due to my memory, and offend his own character, in which case only the aforesaid fine is established, of 3000l. sterling money of Great Britain, and to be applied for a legacy of that sum, I hereby bequeath to my natural son, for use and benefit of his children, as an indemnification for the great vexation such an unjustifiable proceeding may occasion." [He then gives certain powers to his executors as to 2056l. 11s. 1d. Navy 5 per cents., bought for him, and in his name, by Messrs. Campbell, of London: and also 1200l. sterling, invested for him, and in his name, by Messrs. Whitmore, of London.] "I hereby provide and determine, that should I outlive my son J. Stanley, jun., I give to Joaquina, 1000l. sterling, independant, and so much more than the legacy I have already bequeathed her, and to be for herself and her heirs. To my natural son, for use and benefit of his children, three-fourths of my said property, and to devolve, in failure of them, to himself and his heirs. To my brother, William, for himself during his life only, and to devolve to the legitimate children he may have in matrimony, the remaining one-fourth part of my said property; but in case of failure, or by his death, to devolve to my natural son, for use and benefit of his children, and in case of failure of them to himself and his heirs. The residue of my property, which was acquired by my industry, and therefore solely mine at my disposal, and after payment of the legacies by this my last will and testament given, as also any farther and future ones I may give, I hereby give and bequeath to my son J. Stanley, jun., whom I name as my heir for such residue, or heir to the residue [378] of my said property, under condition for his attending to the dispositions on my part made in my present will, and that they are complied with on his part; said residue consists in money I have in the English funds, the Three per cent. Consols, Five per cent. Navy Annuities, and Four per cent. Annuities, also different sums of money in hands of correspondents abroad; also some here, in hands of Messrs. Gould and Co.; money I have under my said son's name, in the funds of the United States, and houses in Lisbon in my own name. All my furniture of my house, linen, and plate, I hereby give and bequeath to my natural son J. and R. M. Joaquina, a half for each, and to devolve to their heirs for their use and benefit. I farther give to my natural son, and R. M. Joaquina, for themselves and my family, the use of the house I reside in, up to the end of the leases to July, 1824, as also for any farther time I may rent the house for, I hereby declaring that they the aforesaid and my family are my true and only representatives. That considering the sum of 2400l. sterling I have bequeathed for use and benefit of four of the children, my grand-children, of J. M. Bernes, is not sufficient, I hereby bequeath them 600l. more, sterling money of Great Britain, thereby making the sum of 3000l. sterling money, to devolve, in case of failure of any of them, to the other children, my grand-children, of him, J. M. Bernes, as already determined and established in my present will. I hereby name my successor, my son J. Stanley, jun., for the second life, for having and receiving the yearly pension or pencao of two hundred milreis per ann. in the Royal Erazio in Lisbon, which his Majesty was so gracious to grant me; and I hereby name and empower my said son to have the arrears that may be due to me; in failure of [379] my said son before my decease, I nominate my natural son, J. M. or his eldest son, as my successor for said second life, to have said pension and the arrears." [Executors, W. N. Roope, Webster Gordon (W. Cossart, J. Anglin, substituted). Funchal, 21st of June, 1820.]

(b) The Judges who sat upon this commission were: Mr. Justice Gaselee, Mr. Justice Littledale, Mr. Baron Vaughan, Dr. Phillimore, Dr. Gostling.

(Signed) "JOHN STANLEY."

"Codicil to my last will, dated 21st of June, 1820. I hereby confirm my last will in every particular, and add, that considering I have not left a sufficiency to the children of my natural son J. M. Bernes, I, by this my last will and testament, bequeath to them 2000l. sterling money of G. B. more, making, in the whole, the sum of 5000l. sterling money aforesaid, for their use and benefit, to devolve, by decease of any of them, to the others living, and in case of their failure, to devolve to the father, my natural son, for himself and his heirs. My executors will be so good as to place this sum at interest in England, or invest it in the public funds there, as they shall think it most expedient, and to go on accumulating until the children come of age, and then to be at their disposal. Should my executors judge it a-propos to make the investment in a part of the funds I have in my name in said public funds in England, I hereby empower them, in the most legal manner, so to do, and in same manner to cause transfers from my name in the Bank of England, to the name of the father Joze Maria Bernes, should he be living, and in failure, to the trustee, a safe one, that he may nominate, or be named, if necessary, by my said executors, as it is to them I look for protecting the children: the trustee appointed, to sign a deed of trust, even the father, that said [380] investment in his name is solely for use and belonging to the said children, and the dividends arising to go on accumulating as aforesaid, for benefit of them the children." [James Gordon to be an additional executor.] Funchal, 4th July, 1820.

(Signed) "JOHN STANLEY."

"Second Codicil to my last will and testament. Reflecting I have not made a separate consideration for my natural son, as a token of my regard, as also that he is unhealthy, so as to require an aid for himself and his family ere many years passes over, I hereby, by my last will and testament, give and bequeath to him the sum of 2000l. sterling money of G. B. for himself and his heirs. As half the revenue of the house in Lisbon I give to R. M. Joaquina during her lifetime, devolves to my son J. Stanley, jun., by her decease, and but the other half devolving to J. M. Bernes, and only during his life, when wish the whole should be for himself and his heirs, whereas it returns and becomes the property of my heirs; I therefore, as an indemnification, bequeath to him, my natural son, 800l. sterling money, for himself and his heirs. Should it unhappily happen that my son J. Stanley, jun., from instigation (otherwise he will not) wish or attempt to cause my last will and testament to become subject to the laws of Portugal, so as for not being able to dispose of more than a third part of my property, I therefore hereby declare, that the different legacies I have bequeathed by my said last will, and codicils thereto, are all of them from said third part of my property, a minha terça, in the Portuguese language; as a penalty for my said son so attempting, I give the surplus arising of my third part of [381] my property, a minha terça, to him my said natural son J. M. Bernes, and R. M. Joaquina, a half for each; but this is not to take place if my son J. causes no such measure either from himself, or indirectly by means of any other person. Under the like penalty my son becomes liable for any investigations he may be instigated to make, from suppositions that I gave sums in bills of exchange or monies for purposes, to J. M. Bernes and R. M. Joaquina, as I deny such being given, on the contrary, that they were loans, and such sums only lent, the payments of which I hereby forgive them the parties, and such payments are legacies I by this my last will and testament bequeath to them, for themselves and their heirs, out of third part of my property aforesaid. As the property I gave to my son John Stanley, jun., and the part by me under his name was only verbally given, and not by any irrevocable agreement in writing, and as it is but formally and legally given by my will, it consequently becomes a part for adding to the other part of my property for forming a total, and thereof a third part at my disposal, according to the laws of Portugal.(a) As my son is in affluence, according to certain informations I have received, he by no means wants my aid, as does my natural son, and Joaquina, independent of the immense obligations I am under to her, therefore I beseech and beg leave recommending them most particularly to the protection of my executors, as [382] such may be very necessary, from the motives already alleged. Funchal, 11th July, 1820.

(Signed) "JOHN STANLEY."

The third codicil, dated Funchal, 24th, and the addition to it, dated 31st October, 1822, were only to alter the executors.

"A Fourth Codicil, made this day, to my last will and testament. Finding I have not made sufficient provisions for my grandchildren, now increased in number, I hereby confirm the provisions I already made, which are to be considered as making a part of my said last will and testament, which provisions by donations on my part from me, are in trust with James Campbell, Esq., of London, namely, one for a limited sum, a considerable time back, to two of the children as per trust-deed he passed, and two other donations, given by me in July last, say, one of 1000l. sterling to Joseph J. B. and John M. B., a half for each; the other donation I hereby bequeath to Joseph J. B., of 1200l. stock (twelve hundred pounds sterling) I have in the 4 per cents. Annuities, latterly reduced to 3½ per cent. Dividends receiving by Messrs. James Campbell and Co. to whom have advised, for being transferred to and under the name of James Campbell, Esq., in trust for him Joseph J. B. until he comes of age, for being transferred to and under his name, mean time the dividends arising and receiving are for his use and benefit; and in case of his decease, to devolve and pass to the other children, as determined in my letter of advice to that effect, and the respective trust-deed preparing by the aforenamed esteemed friend, which [383] is to be considered valid and had, as if declared herein in this my last will and testament. Finding I have not made such provision as intended and promised to my said grandson Joseph J. B., my favorite, the eldest son, I hereby bequeath to him 2159l. 7s. 7d. stock, part of 4259l. 7s. 7d. stock I have in the New 4 per cents., hereby revoking any power my son J. Stanley, jun., may claim from my will, for having and transferring that part of the said stock to and for himself, and said power is exclusively vested in them, as also for entire of that sum of 4259l. 7s. 7d. stock I have in the New 4 per cents.; it is to be understood, that the aforementioned power of transfer is exclusively vested in my executors, should I not in my lifetime make the transfer or sale. In case

(a) The Portuguese lawyers stated that if a testator in his lifetime make advances to any of his children, such advances must be brought into a calculation of his effects after his death, so as to increase the proportion of which he has a right to dispose. One or two limited the application of this rule to questions arising between children having a right to the inheritance.

Joseph J. B. should die, one-half of the sum of the 2159l. 7s. 7d. stock I now bequeath him, is to pass to John M. B., and the other half to Joaquim M. B., Antonio J. B., Vicente F. B., and Maria J. B., divided in equal parts between them; and should any of them die, his part is to pass to the surviving ones, divided between them, and should they die, then to devolve and pass to the children born after. Considering that to the three last-mentioned children no certain provision is made by me, being but casual, to John M. B. being but small, and to Joseph J. B. not so much as I wished, I hereby, by my last will and testament, bequeath to them of the 2100l. stock aforesaid in the New 4 per cents., in manner following; 525l. to Joseph J. B.: 700l. to John M. B., and in case of death of his brother Joseph, his part to pass to him John M. B.; the remaining 875l. I bequeath to Antonio, Vicente, and Maria, divided in equal parts between them; and in case of one [384] dying to pass to the other two, and should two of them die, one part to the survivor, and the other part to the next born, and in case of death to the other or others following; and should John die, his part or parts to devolve and pass to the three latter children mentioned, and in default, to the next born, divided in equal parts between them. In case I did not mention in my general will, the sum bequeathed to and for the children to be invested in the funds in England, and continue until they come of age, I hereby beg the favour of my executors to cause such to be done, and their respective parts to be only delivered to them when they come of age. Funchal, 29th October, 1825.

(Signed) "JOHN STANLEY.

"This codicil is in my hand-writing, being wrote by me.

(Signed) "J. STANLEY.

"Witnesses—(Signed) William Bellringer, merchant; Jno. Blandy, Do.; A. H. Renton, M.D.(a)

"I hereby revoke the words "donations" I made use of in my present codicil, as meant them advances or loans, which hereby I forgive and are forgiven by me, they the said advances or loans being constituted by this codicil legacies, and are to be had as such. Date as before. (Signed) "JOHN STANLEY.

"Done on recollection, after signing the witnesses."

[385] The allegation in support of the papers pleaded generally that the whole of these papers were in the deceased's hand-writing, and signed by him. The will and first two codicils the deceased declared, in the presence of a notary and five witnesses, to be his solemn will and testament, and desired they might be considered as good, firm, and valid; and requested the notary to draw up an act thereon, which, being done, the deceased approved and signed such act; the notary attested it, and the five witnesses subscribed their names thereto. That the third codicil, the addition thereto, and the fourth codicil, were each published and declared as codicils in the presence of three witnesses, who attested them. The addition to the fourth codicil was not attested. That deceased was at all times of sound mind. That he died at Madeira, and being a British subject his will and codicils were soon after his death deposited at the British Consul's office, wherein the testamentary dispositions of British subjects, resident at Madeira, are usually deposited. That the will, &c. remained there: and that paper A was a true and authentic copy of such papers.

On this allegation fourteen witnesses were examined: two at Lisbon, eleven at Madeira, and one in London.

The opposing allegation pleaded that the deceased was a native of Ireland, which he left prior to 1770 and settled at Lisbon, where, and at Madeira—an island within the dominions and subject to the laws of Portugal—he resided uninterruptedly till death. That in January, 1770, the deceased, then at Lisbon, abjured by a public act of renunciation the Protestant religion, and professed that of the Roman Catholic Church, and af-[386]-terwards, in the same month, married Helena Doran, of Irish extraction, a natural born Portuguese subject, his widow, without any marriage articles, and had by her Stanley, the party in the cause, his only surviving child, born at Lisbon in December, 1777. In 1798 the deceased, desirous of perpetuating his residence in the kingdom as a Portuguese subject, obtained an act of naturalization; and on the 6th of March, 1801, in virtue of permission duly granted on the 26th of February, 1801, signed a bond of allegiance whereby the act of naturalization came into operation, so that, from such signature, he became ipso facto naturalized in Portugal, entitled to all the privileges and liable to all the obligations of natural born subjects of Portugal. That during the occupation of Portugal by the French in 1808, on production of such act of naturalization, he was treated as a native Portuguese subject, and his property as that of a natural born subject of Portugal. That in 1823 the deceased, then at Madeira, authorized his son to take, and he accordingly took, on his father's behalf, an oath of observance of the constitution under the Portuguese monarchy; that the deceased having so renounced his own country and become permanently resident and naturalized in the kingdom of Portugal, thereby became and thenceforward was in all respects subject to the laws, &c. of Portugal. That in the absence of a will valid by the laws, &c. of Portugal, his effects, wheresoever situated, should be disposed of as if he had died intestate. That by the laws, &c. of Portugal any Portuguese subject leaving a widow not endowed by her marriage articles, and issue, cannot dispose by will of more than one sixth of his whole property, [387] the widow necessarily taking a moiety (of two thirds of which moiety the issue is necessary heir at her decease), and the issue two thirds of the other moiety, or the whole of the moiety if the father does not dispose by will of his third thereof: that any will of a Portuguese subject (leaving a widow and issue) contrary to such laws, &c. is null, and such subject is deemed to have died intestate. That the will and first two codicils in this case, though apparently made with all the legal formalities and executed according to the laws of Portugal, are in their whole substance repugnant to such laws, &c., inasmuch as he gives considerable legacies to a natural son (a spurious and adulterine offspring not legitimated by royal authority), and to others without taking account of the widow's moiety, or constituting his son heir of two thirds of the other moiety, and confining himself to legacies not exceeding one-sixth of his whole estate, as he was bound to do by the laws, &c. of Portugal. That the latter two codicils are in the same manner repugnant to the Portuguese laws, &c., and are not executed according to the forms prescribed by that law.

(a) The third codicil, and also the addition to it, were attested in the same manner by three witnesses.

In supply of proof were annexed No. 1, a copy of the act of abjuration of the Protestant religion by the deceased at Lisbon in 1770; No. 2, a copy of the act of naturalization in 1798; (a)[1] No. 3, a certificate [388] of the record of the execution of the act or bond of allegiance; (a)[2] No. 4, a copy of the recognition of the deceased, by the commander of the French forces at Lisbon in 1808, as a native Portuguese subject, releasing his property from the sequestration made by the French of English property in Portugal at that time; No. 5, a copy of the power granted by the deceased to his son, John Stanley, to appear for him, and take and subscribe the oath of observance to the constitution of the Portuguese monarchy in the year 1823; (b) and

(a)[1] The material part of this act was, in substance, as follows:—"Doña Maria, &c. We make known that John Stanley, a native of Ireland, having put himself under our immediate protection, and given satisfactory proof of his being established in this kingdom, with an intention of residing therein for life, as our subject, we naturalize him in these kingdoms, so that he may be entitled to all franchises, dignities, and privileges enjoyed by the natives of these realms, it being understood that, before he can have the benefit of this mandate, he shall first subscribe a bond, in virtue of which he shall be inscribed amongst, and as one of, our subjects, so that he may enjoy the said rights and privileges to which, in that quality, he shall become entitled." Lisbon, 2d of July, 1798.

(a)[2] The certificate was to this effect: "On the 6th of March, 1801, upon a dispatch of the 26th of February, 1801, an act and bond of allegiance was subscribed by John Stanley, a native of Ireland, upon the conditions of renouncing all the rights and privileges of his nation, subjecting himself to the laws, &c., of these kingdoms, and to the observance and payment of the several obligations, duties, and imposts to which native subjects are liable, as if he were a native, not to absent himself from this kingdom without licence from her majesty, the whole, upon the pains established by the laws of Portugal, he hereby binding himself voluntarily to the above conditions, and promising to conduct himself as a true subject of this kingdom, otherwise to incur the penalties attached to delinquents in such cases, and particularly to the forfeiture of his property, in case he should at any time claim or avail himself of the rights and privileges of the nation which he doth renounce."

(b) "I give full authority to my son, for me and in my name, to declare upon oath, that I promise to uphold and observe the political constitutions of the Portuguese of a certificate that John Stanley did, in 1823, in virtue of the said power, and as the representative of [389] his father, take such oath. Thirteen witnesses were examined at Lisbon on this allegation.

The allegation in reply pleaded that the testator was a native-born subject of the King, and from his birth resided in Ireland, until he went to Portugal to transact certain commercial affairs. That on signing the bond the deceased did not become naturalized in the kingdom of Portugal; for that by the laws of Portugal all grants or privileges granted by letters patent, or otherwise, are obliged to pass through the Chancery Court within four months from the time of the granting, and that otherwise the letters patent or decrees are absolutely null and void; that the act of naturalization was never passed through the Court of Chancery, and therefore was altogether invalid. That the French did not treat the deceased as a Portuguese subject, but as a British subject, and caused him to be imprisoned, and his property sequestered on that ground alone, until by the payment of a considerable sum of money he obtained the liberation of his person and the release of his property; and thereupon, and for no other reason, procured the recognition of his naturalization. That John Stanley (party in this cause) did not, in 1823, in the name of the deceased, take the oath to the Portuguese constitution, in consequence of the deceased being a Portuguese subject, for that no oath was at such time required from a Portuguese subject as such; that in 1823 the deceased received a pension from the Portuguese Government as a reward for having, as an English merchant, obtained a loan for the Portuguese Government, and that by the [390] then law of Portugal all persons who received pensions were obliged to take an oath to the constitution. That the deceased being a British-born subject, any will made by him in conformity to the laws of England is good and valid as to the disposition of the whole of his property wherever situated; that a will made by a Portuguese subject, leaving a widow not endowed, and child, and being contrary to the laws, customs, and usages of Portugal, is not null and void, but is, by the law of Portugal, void only as to the disposition exceeding one-sixth of the whole property. That the deceased professed the Protestant religion until his death, but that being desirous of marrying a Portuguese Roman Catholic subject, and it being contrary to the laws of Portugal for a Portuguese Roman Catholic subject to marry a Protestant, he, to enable him to marry, and for no other purpose, submitted to a form of renunciation of Protestantism, and made an open profession of the Roman Catholic religion, but did not comply with the orders, or attend to the religious services of that Church, but always conformed to the Protestant worship. That the deceased as well previously as subsequently to his will declared he was a Protestant, and that he wished to die in the Protestant faith, and, at Madeira, he frequently, and until within a short period of death, declared that, if prevented from returning to England, he wished to be buried in the English burial ground in Madeira. That whilst at Lisbon, and in Madeira, he always intended to return, and permanently reside in his native country, and frequently declared his intention so to do; that on several occasions he [391] actually took steps for, but by unforeseen occurrences was prevented from executing, such intention, though he never abandoned it.

On this allegation twenty-seven witnesses were examined; nine at Lisbon, seventeen at Madeira, and one in London.

It was proved that the deceased was a native of Ireland, that he went to Lisbon prior to 1770: that in 1809 he went to Madeira, and from the time he first left Ireland he was resident in the Portuguese dominions: that his wife, though of Irish extraction, was a native Portuguese subject and a Catholic: that the deceased in 1770 abjured the Protestant religion. That his legitimate and illegitimate children and grand-children were all brought up as Catholics, and that all the inmates of his house were Catholics; that he did once at Lisbon receive the sacrament as a Catholic. That in 1801 the deceased signed the bond of allegiance: in 1823 made a declaration of adherence to the Portuguese constitution, which was required to be taken by all Portuguese subjects who held office or received pensions.(a) That he had houses at Lisbon and money invested in the American and other funds, as well as in the English.

---

monarchy, as decreed by the extraordinary general Cortes of that nation, my said son having my authority to subscribe the act witnessing my said promise, upon oath. Madeira, 3d of January, 1823. (Signed) "JOHN STANLEY."

(a) The deceased did receive a pension.

That though the deceased, on account of his name, was at first, in 1808, thrown into prison and his property sequestered by the French, yet both he and his property were afterwards released; but, except exhibit No. 4, there was no direct evidence on what ground he was released.

On the other hand, that the deceased abjured his religion only in order to marry, since a Portuguese Roman Catholic subject and a Pro-[392]-testant could not intermarry (some of the lawyers said not even with a dispensation). That he did not at Madeira conform to the worship and ceremonies of the Church of England; that he was not treated by the Catholic curate of his parish as a Catholic; that though not of strong religious feelings he did occasionally, though rarely, attend service at the English Church; and in his last illness sent for the English Protestant clergyman. That he frequently declared himself a Protestant, and expressed abhorrence of Catholicism. It was further proved that he described himself as a British subject, that he often expressed his earnest wish and intention to return "to end his days in Ireland," or "to lay his bones in his native country." That once, about 1822, being requested to wait a little for his rent he said "he could not, because he was preparing to leave the island and go to his native country:" he would say, "God forbid I should die or be buried here." Latterly he used to say "he feared from his infirmities he should not be able to accomplish his return;" and about a year before his death, on passing the English Protestant chapel and burying-ground at Funchal, he said "he feared, notwithstanding all his hopes and intentions of returning home, that place would receive his bones." That on his death he was there buried, and his will taken possession of by the British Consul, as was usual with the wills of the subjects of England. That he invested his money principally in the British funds, and when his wife became deranged he sent her over to Ireland and made her an allowance there. That in expectation of the French invasion he had, as a precautionary measure, transferred his property [393] into the name of his son, who was born in Portugal.(a)

(a) The prominent points of evidence as to the deceased's religion and national character on both sides are set forth in the following parts of the depositions.

Henry Veitch, Esq. (examined in London), deposed: "That the deceased was a British subject was never doubted or disputed by the Portuguese authorities; deceased resided in that island as a British subject, claimed to be so considered, and was so considered, from first to last; upon his death deponent, as British Consul, attended at deceased's house, and having found the will and codicils, carried them to the British Judge Conservator, in whose presence they were opened, and the usual act thereof was recorded; the will and codicils were by their joint act deposited with deponent, and remained in his official custody in the office of the British Consul, where they were left by deponent when he quitted the island in the autumn of the last year (1828); if any of the executors had acted, the testamentary papers of deceased would have been duly registered in the office of the Consul, and then delivered back to be acted upon; but as all the executors declined to act, the papers were deposited as before deposed.

"Deceased informed deponent that he was a Protestant, but had married a Roman Catholic; deponent never understood from him that he had conformed in any degree, or at any time, to the Roman Catholic religion; he did not do so in Madeira; he paid very little or no attention to religious services, but deponent does not doubt he was a Protestant; he was buried in the Protestant ground at Madeira, which certainly would not have been allowed by the Portuguese clergy had deceased at any time, to their knowledge, conformed to the Roman Catholic Church."

Edward Porter, Esq., Acting Consul at Madeira: "He knew deceased. In the registers of the deaths of British subjects kept in the office of the British Consul in Funchal the death of deceased is entered. On the death of a British subject dying testate in the Island of Madeira, their wills are registered at the British Consulate; the will and codicils in question were registered as usual."

Andrew Forrest of Lisbon, exchange broker: "Deponent knew deceased from 1785 until he (deceased) went to Madeira in 1809; deceased was continually resident in Portugal during deponent's acquaintance with him; he was the principal of a mercantile house of eminence in Lisbon; deponent was accustomed to see him at least once every week; during the period of deponent's acquaintance with him deceased professed the Roman Catholic religion; he was married when deponent first knew

The Portuguese lawyers deposed that the carta, [394] or act of naturalization, unless passed within four months through the Chancery, would be null; but [395] that the time might be extended by the favour of the Crown. One indeed, Matta, said, that as it [396] was for a naturalized permanent residence, it would take effect without passing through Chancery. There was no proof that it had so passed; but the lawyers said it could not have been recorded unless all the necessary formalities had been observed. That on signing the bond of allegiance the carta of naturalization him; deponent knew his wife Helena, formerly Doran, and her parents, she was born in Portugal of Irish parents; deceased had, by his said wife, three children; John, party in this cause, is the only one that survived deceased; they were all educated in the Roman Catholic religion; the mother was a Roman Catholic. Deponent was in Lisbon during the occupation of Portugal by the French, and he believes that the naturalization of deceased was a protection to him, and saved his property. Of his having abjured the Protestant religion, deponent often heard his parents speak as that to which deceased had recourse for the purpose of marrying. Deponent went through the ceremony of being naturalized at the time of the French invasion: that was only an expedient on the part of deponent."

---

Dennis Connell, merchant, aged 64, a native of Lisbon, and always resided there: "Knew deceased from 1780 till 1809, when deceased left Lisbon. He never knew deceased when a Protestant; he professed the Roman Catholic religion during all the time deponent knew him, and once (in 1794) deponent was present when deceased received the blessed sacrament; all deceased's children were educated as Catholics."

The Rev. W. W. Deacon, chaplain to the British residents at Madeira: "Deponent since October, 1821, knew deceased till deceased's death; deponent had very little communication with deceased, but during his illness he sent for deponent, about three months before his death; deponent apologized for apparent inattention, saying that he had supposed him to be a Catholic; deceased replied, he held the Catholic religion in abhorrence; he had lived too long in a Catholic country to be ignorant that it was a system of delusion; he spoke of the ceremonies of that Church as mummeries, and reprobated the whole in very strong terms; he appeared a man who had been long indifferent to all religion, though awakened to an anxiety respecting it when illness and infirmity pressed; deceased wished, as he said, to put himself into deponent's hands, adding that he must make up his accounts, as he was not long for this world; deponent continued his visits to deceased to the last, and deceased received and welcomed them; deponent lent him books, of which deceased afterwards expressed his high approbation, and unless deceased were a most practised hypocrite, he died a Protestant; deponent did not communicate or pray with him, for deceased did not express any wish that he should do either, though deponent gave him the opportunity of so doing. That deceased ever conformed publicly, with the religious services of either Church, Protestant or Catholic, deponent does not know; he said, as an excuse for never attending the English chapel, that he was afraid of sitting in a draught of air, and must have something on his head, which would have excited ridicule among the younger parts of the congregation; deponent considered that but an excuse; during his illness, however, and as long as deponent visited him, which was as long as deceased was in a state to receive him, when he could speak but little, and was gradually sinking under the influence of stupor, deceased appeared to be, and was, as he believes, sincere in his declarations of adherence to the Protestant faith."

Januario da Costa of Madeira, notary public, aged 59: "Deponent (after the execution of the will) inquired of deceased, as it was his duty to do, of what Crown or kingdom he was a subject; and deceased having declared himself to be a British subject, it was so expressed in the approval."

The Rev. Joze da Costa: "He has been curate of the parish of St. Peter, Funchal, during the last ten years: deceased never during that period attended or conformed to any part of the worship service, orders, or acts of the Roman Catholic Church, public or private, to the best of deponent's knowledge or belief; deponent believes him to have been a Protestant.

"On interrogatory, respondent never saw deceased at the English Protestant chapel; all the inmates and servants of the house in which deceased resided in Funchal were Portuguese and Catholics; J. Bernes is a Roman Catholic, and his children have been baptized and educated in that faith; Joaquina was a Catholic."

comes into operation, and thenceforth is of full effect: the party becomes entitled to all the privileges, and is liable to all the obligations of natural born subjects of that kingdom; and some of the lawyers expressed an opinion that, in the absence of a will, valid by the law of Portugal, the effects of a person so naturalized must be disposed of as if he died intestate.(a)[1]

It was admitted on one side and the other that the execution of the will and first two codicils was in accordance with the formalities required by the Portuguese law for a sealed will (Ordenaçoens, [397] b. 4, t. 80 and 86).(a)[2] That to render testa-

---

The Rev. F. da Silva: "He knew deceased; he resided in the parish of St. Peter, of which deponent is vicar, from 1811 till his death; deponent has been vicar since 1815; deponent has examined the register of the parishioners, which contains the names of all persons residing in the parish, in whatever capacity, who are Catholics, and are therefore required to attend confession; that register has been regularly kept, and the name of the deceased does not appear from 1811, when he became a resident, till his death; deceased was never known by deponent to attend confession, or the public service of the church, or to conform in any way to the religious services or acts thereof at any time, in public or in private; deponent does not know that deceased conformed to the worship or service of the Protestant Church, but on two or three occasions deceased told deponent he was a Protestant and not a Catholic, because it would interfere with his commercial concerns; deponent believed deceased to be a Protestant, and therefore allowed him to be buried in the ground belonging to the English Protestants at Funchal, which deponent could not otherwise have suffered to be done."

The Rev. C. Salgado, head vicar of the parish of the Sé, in the Cathedral of Funchal, aged 63: "Deponent knew deceased from the time of his arrival at Funchal, in 1809; the first parish in which he resided was that of the Sé. In the parish registers of the Sé for 1810-11 the house of deceased is registered, and the names of the persons being Catholics therein are registered, but in that list the name of deceased does not occur, he is mentioned only as the occupier of the house; hence deponent saith it clearly appears that deceased did not at that time profess the Catholic faith, or conform to the discipline, service, or orders of that Church."

(a)[1] The lawyers were all of Lisbon, LL.DD., advocates in the Casa da Supplicaçao, the first tribunal of justice; and to which causes concerning wills are brought by ultimate appeal. Four were examined on each side; viz.

FOR STANLEY.		FOR BERNES.
Felipe de Medeiro .	Aged 62	Adriano Barreto .	Aged 27
Joaquim Simas . .	„ 24	Antonio da Silva .	„ 40
Inacio de Matta . .	„ 81	Manoel Verdades .	„ 45
Joao Ferreira . .	„ 78	Joze da Veiga . .	„ 34

(a)[2] Extracts (translated at Lisbon) from the Ordenaçõens, b. 4 (t. 36, s. 3). "If the leaseholder, making his will, institutes his descendants or ascendants, it will be acted as when he dies abintestated, although in the will he may bequeath his third part to any person that is not his descendant or ascendant. Sec. 4, what we say about sons and grandsons by line of descent will be observed with those of the line ascent, viz.: Father, mother, and grandfathers and mothers, when there are none in the line of descent, because, while there are descendants, the lease will not come to the ascendants; and if there is no legal descendant, although there may be a legal ascendant, his natural son, though his father was a nobleman, shall come to it, and the spurious son shall not be entitled to the lease, unless he is legitimated by us in such a manner that he may succeed abintestated, and not in any other way" (tit. 46). "All marriages in our kingdoms are understood to be done by contract of halves, except when another thing shall be agreed, what was agreed shall be fulfilled" (tit. 80). "When any person wishes to have his open will made by a notary, he must have five witnesses, free men, or reputed such, of more than fourteen years of age, so that with the notary that writes the will there may be six witnesses; the will the notary must write in his register, and shall be signed by the witnesses, and by the testator, if he can sign, and if he cannot, one of the witnesses must sign for him, near the mark declaring that he signs by order of the testator, because he cannot sign, and such will shall be valid. If the testator wants to make a sealed will, after writing or having his testament written by some person, he shall sign it if not written by himself: for if so written it will be sufficient, though it might not be signed by him: and not mentary papers valid by the law of that country [398] those formalities were requisite; that the third and fourth codicils were not executed with [399] those formalities, and were consequently invalid if the Portuguese law were to govern the case. [400] It was further admitted that, when a marriage takes place without marriage articles, the surviving party is entitled to a moiety of the whole property absolutely: if there be legitimate issue, such issue is in like manner entitled to two-thirds of the other moiety; and over the remaining one-sixth of the whole the deceased has a disposing power: (Ordenaçoens, b. 4, t. 46 and 82). Thus far all the lawyers were agreed; but on knowing how to sign, it must be signed by the person that has written it, sealed and sewed, and the testator shall deliver it to the notary before five witnesses, free men, or reputed as such, over fourteen years of age, and before them the notary will ask him if that is his will, and if he holds it to be good, firm, and valid, and if he says 'Yes,' the notary shall immediately, in the presence of the witnesses, make the instrument of approval on the back of the will, declaring the testator delivered it to him, and took it for his good and firm will, and the same instrument of approval all the five witnesses must sign, and the testator, if he can sign; and not being able to sign, one of the witnesses shall sign for him, declaring near the mark that he signs by order of the testator, because he is not able to sign, and in no other manner shall the will be valid; and this notwithstanding any usage to the contrary in any place; and the notary which shall make an instrument of approval to any will or codicil, without having it signed by the witnesses, and by the testator, shall lose his office, and the instrument of approval shall be null. Sec. 2. To avoid forgeries in wills, the instrument of approval is to be written on the will, or if that is impossible, so annexed that the true will may not be taken from such instrument and another be put in its stead. 3d. In the absence of a notary the will may be made with five witnesses, if written or signed by the testator, or with six, if written by another person. 4th. Provides for nuncupative wills at the point of death" (tit. 82). "If a father or a mother make a will, and knowing they have children, take the third part of their moiety of the property, and dispose of it in favour of any person they may think proper, or shall order it to be distributed after their deaths according to their wishes, although in the will the children may not be positively instituted or disinherited, such will is valid, because, as he disposed of the third part of his property in the will, and knew he had children, it seems that he wanted to leave to them the other two parts, and to institute them in the same, although he did not mention them positively, and so they must be held as instituted heirs in the manner as if they had positively been instituted in the will. 1st. And the father or mother disposing in their will of all their property and goods, making no mention of the legal children, knowing he or she had one, or disinheriting him, not declaring the legal cause of so disinheriting him, such will is, by law, null, and of no validity as to what respects the institution or disinheritance in the same made, but the legacies contained in the same will shall, in all cases, be firm and valid, inasmuch as they may come within the testator's third part, so and in such manner as if the will had been good and valid by law. 2d. And the father or mother declaring in their will the reason why they disinherit their legal child, if the instituted heir in the will wishes to have the inheritance so disposed in his favour, he necessarily must prove such reason to be true as declared in the will, and that it is a legal and sufficient one for the child to be by virtue of it disinherited, and being proved, the will shall be valid, and the instituted heir shall have the inheritance so disposed in his favour, with no other impediment. And if he does not prove the cause of the disinheritance to be true and legal, the will shall become null, and the child shall inherit the whole of his father or mother's property if he wishes, but must pay the legacies contained in the will, as above stated. 3d. But if the father or mother, at the time of making their will, had a legal child, and believing him dead, did not mention him in the will, but bequeathed all their property and goods, instituting another heir, in such case the will shall be null, not only in what respects to the institution, but also to the legacies contained in the same. 4th. All that is above stated, as taking place when the father dies, leaving children, will also take place when he makes a will, and dies without children, but leaves grandsons or other descendants; and also when the son or other descendant dies, and makes a will, leaving no descendants, and has his father, mother, or other ascendants living. 5th. Also, if the father or mother, at the time of making their will, had no legal son, and afterwards he had one, or had one other points they differed. Of those examined for Stanley, Medeiro thought it was necessary expressly to institute the issue heirs of two-thirds of the moiety, and if the testator did not expressly do so, or if he left away more than one-sixth of the whole property, or left legacies to an adulterine issue, the will was void in toto. The others all agreed that it was not necessary expressly to institute his legitimate issue to two-thirds of the moiety, and that if he disposed of more than one-sixth of the whole the will was not absolutely null in toto, but only as to the excess; and that the legacies must abate in proportion: and those to the adulterine issue (if illegal) would only vitiate such legacies, and not affect the general validity of the will. Simas thought neither [401] Bernes nor his children could take legacies. Matta, that Bernes could not but that his children could. Ferreira, that both Bernes and his children could.(a) already, and did not know it, and this one is alive at the time of the death of the father or mother, this will, as also the legacies in the same, shall be null and of no effect."

---

---

(Tit. 86). "As to codicils, whether opened or made by public notary, or sealed with instrument of approval, in the back, or made and signed by the testator, or by any other private person, it is sufficient that four witnesses be present (when they are made), men or women, of more than fourteen years of age, free, or reputed as such, so that with the notary, or with the person which makes them, there are five witnesses, upon condition that the witnesses named in the instrument of approval shall all sign the same; and when any child of an ecclesiastic, or of any other connexion reproved or punishable by our laws, or by the common law, to which the father or mother cannot succeed, because he has been so born of a reproved or punishable connexion, dies abintestate, his brother, son of his mother, although he may be born of an illegal, reproved, or punishable connexion, will succeed to him, and be his heir, if there is no other impediment but the one of being the offspring of such connexion; and also he may succeed to any other relations and kindred by the mother's side and blood; so that the brothers and the other ulterior kindred may succeed between themselves abintestated, though they may descend from a condemned and illegal connexion by the mother's line and blood; and as to what respects the succession of those who are of an illegal though not of a condemned nor punishable connexion, what in our laws and the common law is determined will be executed."

(Tit. 95). "On the death of the husband the wife remains in possession and in the administration of all the property, if at the time of such death she was living and maintained as man and wife, and from her hand the heirs of her husband will receive the division of all the property remaining at the husband's death, and the legatees their legacies, insomuch that if any of the heirs or legatees, or any other person, takes possession of any thing belonging to the inheritance, after the husband's death, without the wife's consent, she may consider herself dispossessed thereof, and it must be to her restituted, and as from the moment that the marriage is consummated by copulation the wife becomes entitled to the half of all the property of both, and the husband, on the death of the wife, continues in the old possession he had before, it is just, that on the death of the husband, she should remain in possession, and with the administration of all the property."

(a) Medeiro deposes: The formalities necessary for the validity of a will or codicil are set forth in the Ordenaçao de Regno, t. 80, s. 1, and t. 86, that any will or codicil be valid depends not only on the observance of extrinsic formalities, but also on that which is intrinsic, for if the latter be wanting, the former are of no value; there may indeed be certain prohibited dispositions in wills that do not affect the validity of the whole instrument, as, for instance, by a law passed on the 9th November, 1769, not in the Book of Laws, but altering the law found under tit. 18, of the second book; and there are others of a similar kind, the bequest of some estate in favour of a convent, in which case the particular disposition is null, and the estate passes to the legal heir, but the rest of the will is good; if a legitimate child be not constituted heir of two parts of the moiety aforesaid, or if the will contain dispositions in favour of an adulterine son, one born from a condemned connection, who is by law prohibited to succeed in any thing to his father, unless legitimated by royal patent, the will or codicil is altogether void, and of no value; 4th Book of laws, t. 82, s. 1 and 3, t. 93, s. 1, and t. 36, s. 4. His opinion on the testamentary papers in question is that, the deceased having declared that he had a child of the legitimate marriage, and not

[402] Of those examined for Bernes, all agreed that the will could only be void as to the excess over [403] one-sixth. And Verdades, Da Veiga, and Barreto said generally, after a perusal of the will, that it [404] was good as far as the disposition of the one-sixth went. Da Silva more precisely said: "In his [405] opinion the legacies to Bernes were not void, for, with reference to the law found in book 2d, t. 35, s. 12, he thought that Bernes, though a spurious and illegitimate child, might inherit from his father as a legatee in his will."

---

having instituted him positively an heir to the two parts of his half of his property aforesaid, but bequeathing to him only an uncertain residue, there results therefrom an incurable nullity in the will generally, the whole of which will, together with the codicils, and every part thereof, is thereby rendered absolutely null and void, as if the same had not been written (4th Book of Laws, t. 82). It is indispensable that the father disinherit his son, or institute him positively in the said two parts, knowing that he has one, and naming him in his will; no contradiction arises in this case from what is mentioned in the Ordenaçao, book 4, t. 82, in the beginning, and 1st sect. because in that commencement the law mentions the case in which the father positively disposes of his one-third part, without speaking of the legitimate child or children, and as he only brings the said third part into the disposition, it supposes that the children are tacitly instituted in the other two parts, and, as such, the disposition of the third part is valid; but always under condition of being disposed of in favour of a person capable of being heir to such third part: in the 2d sect. the law states the case in which the father or mother makes a disposition of all the property without restricting themselves to the third part, and then the law also declares the will null, but also favours the legatees (from a pious cause), limiting them to the third part, if the legatees are proper persons to succeed to the legacies; and from this it results, in the second place, that deceased making bequests in favour of an adulterine son, and of his children, who, by the Portuguese laws, cannot be heirs to any thing of the father, if they do not appear legitimated by the Sovereign, with Royal Provisáo to allow them to succeed, either in will or by intestacy, such legacies would be null, supposing that the will itself had not been a nullity in toto; as it is, the law will in no case dispense with the extrinsic formalities which it directs to be observed; it declares that in any other form it shall not be valid; if the original will and first two codicils possess the requisite formalities, the objections to them are those only which he has mentioned; the two remaining codicils are null in toto by the want of extrinsic formalities; they have not either the approval of the notary or a sufficient number of witnesses. He leans himself also on the Roman law, which is the origin of those laws as to the rights of legitimate sons, and wills, called inofficious; the will in question, though made with all requisite formalities, is, in his opinion, null and void in all its parts and legacies.

Simas deposes: The extrinsic formalities which the laws of Portugal require for the validity of a will are mentioned in the 4th Book of Laws, t. 80, s. 1 and 3; those for a codicil in t. 86. When any of these be wanting, the instrument is void in toto; but if these be complied with, intrinsic formalities are still requisite; one of these is, that the party constitute an universal heir; the disposition of property which the law prohibits, made in a will having all extrinsic formalities, will make it void in the whole, or in part, as the case may be. According to the laws of Portugal, a spurious and adulterine son cannot be the heir of any part of his father's property, as is seen by reference to the 4th Book of Laws, t. 93; and in consequence, if the father, in a will made with all the solemnities, dispose to him any legacy, such legacy is void, though the will itself otherwise subsists; if a testator, having children, make a will, by which, without disinheriting them by virtue of any of the stated causes declared in the Book of Laws, No. 4, tit. 88, should supersede them, not mentioning them in the will, and should dispose of all his property to a stranger, such will would be null in toto, as appears from tit. 82 in the 4th Book of the Laws. If the will should contain such a disposition of property as that the issue be not disinherited, but is appointed to receive under it less than two-thirds of the moiety aforesaid, to which they are absolutely entitled, the will is not null in toto, but the legacies to others must abate in proportion, so as to make up the two-thirds for the issue; a child must either be disinherited, and be declared to be so by the will, for some cause allowed and specified by the law, or be entitled absolutely to two-thirds of the property which the parent

The cause now came on for hearing in the Prerogative Court: when the proctor for Bernes prayed the judge to pronounce for the will and four codicils, and addition; and to decree administration with these papers annexed to his party, and to condemn Stanley in costs. The proctor for Stanley prayed the judge to pronounce against the will, codicils, and addition [the will and first two codicils were, in argument, admitted]; and to decree administration of the deceased, as dying intestate, to his party.

---

had a right to dispose of by will, that is, of his own moiety of the whole, in the present alleged circumstance; as to the rest of his property, he may dispose of it as he pleases, except to such persons as are forbidden by law to inherit. In regard to the will and codicils in question, of the third part of the moiety of which deceased could dispose to strangers in blood, or generally as he pleased; he could not dispose in any hereditary manner in favour of his natural son. That it is an unanswered principle in the Portuguese law, as in the Roman law, that there is a reciprocity in the right of succession, that is, when the father cannot be an heir to the son, the son cannot be an heir to the father. Ordenaçao, book 4, t. 93, positively declares that the father cannot be an heir of a son born from reproved or repudiated connection, and in consequence the son cannot succeed to the father. It is also declared in the Ordenaçao, book 4, t. 92, s. 3, that the person which is not a piaõ, that is, has some kind of nobility, and has legitimate sons and a natural son, cannot dispose to the natural son of the whole or any part of his one-third; in Portugal, merchants of great traffic are not piaõs, and in consequence, if deceased was, when Bernes was born, a merchant of great traffic, he could not have bequeathed to him any part of his remaining third of property, although Bernes had not united in him the qualities of spurious and adulterine, but had been only illegitimate; in consequence deponent judges that, according to the laws of Portugal, the will of deceased is null in all parts where he disposes of more than one-third of the half of his property; and also null in what he disposes of in favour of Bernes and the children of Bernes, because they all participate in the same disqualification; it is null also in the point where deceased prohibits his legitimate son from inquiring into the transactions which deceased had with the natural son, not only because thereby the laws would be evaded, but because if Bernes were even a legitimate brother of Stanley, the latter would have, notwithstanding any prohibition of his father, a right to investigate what the other had received from their father in his life-time, Ordenaçao, book 4, t. 97. He thinks the will to be null also in the parts where a penalty is put upon the legitimate son, in case of his opposing himself to the dispositions made by deceased, because deceased had not the power of altering the laws, or of imposing any penalty on asking their observance, and requiring the judgment of nullity of all acts contrary to them, and such penalty being a legacy in favour of a spurious son of condemned connection, is of course as null as any other legacy given to him; the will is null also in so far as it institutes the son, Stanley, heir only conditionally; whereas he being the forced heir of deceased, the father could not in any manner restrict the institution of him as such; the will is also null, inasmuch as it disposes of the son's property, because the father was not the owner of it; these nullities do not however entirely annul the will, which must subsist in what respects the other legacies included in the one-third of deceased's moiety; Ordenaçao, book 4, t. 82, s. 1; it being a rule in Portuguese law that he who cannot be an heir by will, cannot be such by a codicil; the codicils in question are null in all that relates to the disposition in favour of Bernes and his children; in the rest they are valid if they possess all requisite formalities.

Matta says: All legacies to a spurious and adulterine son are void in toto, for such child can inherit nothing from a father; the law, at book 4, t. 93, declares that such a father cannot be heir to such a son, and, by reciprocity, the son cannot inherit any thing from a father; but the legacies to the children of Bernes are not void, they may be liable to diminution or abatement, as conflicting, if they do so, with the rights of the widow and the lawful children, but they are not necessarily invalid; the condition of their father does not attach to them, and they take as individuals, irrespective of their father's inability to inherit.

Ferreira deposes: It is not the opinion of deponent that an adulterine offspring can in no case inherit any thing from his father; he is aware that some advocates maintain a different opinion, and found it upon the 93d title of the 4th book, but that law, he considers, refers only to cases where a person has died intestate, and under an intestacy: he considers it clear that an adulterine son cannot inherit, but he is not

The King's advocate and Phillimore for Bernes.(a) Execution and capacity are not denied: the [406] question is one of law—whether, in this case, testamentary papers must be executed according to the forms of the Portuguese law. No question will arise as to the will and first two codicils. It was at first, indeed, said that the will is repugnant to the law of Portugal; but it clearly appears from the evidence that it is void so far only as the deceased has disposed of more than one sixth of his whole property; and though an adulterine issue cannot inherit, a legacy to such does not render the will void in toto. The expressions of the will and second codicil, admitted to be valid, and to have been executed when the testator was perfectly capable, shew strongly his desire to effect the disposition in favour of his natural son and his issue: the codicil of October, 1825, disposes exclusively of property in the English funds in favour of such issue. We shall contend, 1st, that the evidence does not establish that the testator, notwithstanding his long residence in Portugal, was a domiciled subject of that kingdom, for that he intended not to finish his days there, but to return to his native country, and that he frequently declared that such were his intentions; he remitted his money for investment in England, and sent his wife, who became deranged, to Ireland—his native land—and he always claimed the privileges of a British subject, which were not denied to him by the Portuguese authorities.

If the Court should have any doubt upon this point; we contend, 2dly, that by the law of England the will of a British subject, disposing of property in this country, though the testator may have been domiciled abroad, is valid in this Court, if made according to the law of England. In the present case, if the instruments are not valid [407] according to the law of Portugal, they are valid as to property in this country, and are here entitled to probate. They are executed in the presence of three witnesses, and are exclusively confined to property in England. They are not executed, and do not purport to be executed, according to the law of Portugal; whereas the will which disposes of property in Portugal is regularly executed according to the Portuguese forms.

1st, as to the domicil. The domicil of origin continues till another is acquired—Somerville v. Somerville, 5 Ves. 750. Did the deceased acquire a new domicil? The marriage in Portugal shews but little intention of changing his domicil; the lady though born in Portugal was of Irish parents. But the Court has not to judge of his intentions merely from circumstances. It has before it, in these instruments and in facts proved, that the deceased did not intend to throw off his character of a British subject: he could not divest himself of his allegiance, though he might owe a temporary allegiance to the State wherein he resided. An intimate connexion has always subsisted between the two countries. Treaties have taken away the distinctions between their respective subjects. The ports of the United Kingdom are to the Portuguese like the ports of their own kingdom; and the subjects of one kingdom are treated like the subjects of the other. Madeira is like a British factory, and the British Consul there has the custody of English wills, and, as such, has the custody of this will. His taking the oath of allegiance, his formal abjuration of the Protestant faith, his marriage, are of no weight: the only point is whether his continued residence in Portugal is sufficient to deprive him of the character of [408] a British subject, and give him the character of a person domiciled in Portugal. We submit, not; his intention to return to England, satisfied that the law referred to prevents a father from instituting an adulterine son heir by will, when there are no legitimate children, and he has seen cases adjudged to this effect, but as in this country there are no authorized reports of cases adjudged, nor even any record of them made by the courts, he is unable to refer to any such; admitting that an adulterine son cannot be instituted an heir by his father, this would not affect the right of such father to bequeath to such son any part or the whole of that third over which he had an absolute power, as to which deponent considers the legacies to deceased's natural son, though adulterine, to be undoubtedly valid, and a portion of the legacies to the children of that son are good in law, so far as the aforesaid third part of the deceased's property, over which he had absolute power, extends; they will be liable to abatement, but they are not void in law.

---

(a) The arguments both in the Prerogative Court and in the Court of Delegates are principally confined to the points of law; and in reporting the arguments in the latter Court, a repetition of those urged in the Prerogative Court has been generally avoided.

and that he considered himself a British subject, and was admitted so to be by the Portuguese authorities, being proved by incontestable evidence. To create a new domicil, two things are necessary—actual habitation, and a wish to fix it there permanently. Denisart, tit. Domicile, s. 11.

Now, assuming that the deceased was domiciled in Portugal; no doubt a native Portuguese subject is bound to adhere to the forms of the law of Portugal for testamentary purposes, and if he had not so adhered he would be considered to be dead intestate; but is the law of Portugal binding on the subject of any other country domiciled there? Though it has been laid down generally that succession to personal property ab intestato is to be governed by the law of the country where the party is domiciled, it does not follow that a British subject, domiciled in a country other than that of his origin, is bound to conform, with regard to the disposition of his property by a testamentary act, to the laws of the kingdom where he was domiciled, that property being situated in the country of his origin, and the instrument not purporting to be executed according to the formalities required by the lex domicilii. There is no decided case, even as to intestacy, in which there has been a question between a foreign domicil and a domicil of origin; all the cases are between two British domicils. And, as to wills, there is no case even that an English subject domiciled in Scotland is bound by the law of Scotland as to the disposal, by will, of his English property; or, vice versâ, that a Scotch subject domiciled in [409] England is freed from the restraints of the Scotch law as to his property in Scotland. The consideration of this point has arisen only with respect to intestacy: but testamentary questions are to some extent juris gentium, and the general result of the opinions of writers on the law of nations is, that in Europe there is nothing to restrict persons, not natives of the country in which they reside, from disposing of their personal property according to the law of their own country: nor, from the evidence of the Portuguese lawyers, does it appear that there is any thing in the law of Portugal which should prevent a British subject, established at Madeira, from making a will and disposing of his property in England according to the forms of the English law. Vattel says (liv. 2, c. 8, s. 111), "If a traveller makes his will and sends it sealed into his own country, it is the same thing as if the will was written in that country." Here the will and codicils were deposited in the archives of the British Consulate—which is equivalent to sending them home. Is there any thing in the English law to render such a will invalid? In Curling v. Thornton, 2 Add. 6, the Court decided that, under particular circumstances at least, a British subject is not bound in the disposition of his property by will to conform to the law of the country where he was domiciled. If an acquired domicil so totally destroys the character of a British subject that it operates against the distinct expressions of his testamentary intentions, it is impossible to support these papers; but, as in all countries, intention governs testamentary acts, the Court would struggle hard against a doctrine requiring it to pronounce invalid instruments so clearly and unequivocally expressing the intentions of the testator. There is no case which imposes [410] upon the Court the duty of pronouncing that a British subject, by taking up his residence in a foreign country, has divested himself of his British character so far as to render invalid, even for the purposes of probate, his will, not purporting to be executed according to the forms of a foreign country where it is asserted he was domiciled, but regularly executed and attested by three witnesses, and containing his express and deliberate intentions as to property situate in this country, to which he owed his origin. In this absence of direct authority the onus of establishing the disqualifying position rests with the other side.

Lushington and Addams contrà. We confine our opposition to the last two codicils. The Court can hardly be of opinion that the deceased was not a domiciled subject of Portugal at his death: if so domiciled, the intention of returning to his native country would not vary the case. His domicil of origin was undoubtedly Ireland; but he acquired a Portuguese domicil, which cannot be put off but by the acquisition of a new one. We contend that the law of Portugal governs this case; and that the Court can only try the validity of the instruments by the Portuguese law; and it is admitted that, by that law, the last two codicils are null and void. It is true a British subject cannot shake off his allegiance, but he can acquire a foreign domicil. 3 Inst. c. 84, pp. 177-9. 2 Dyer, 165 b. A British subject quitting England, and proceeding to the United States, can trade to India; Lord C. J. Eyre laying down in Marryatt v. Wilson, 1 B. & P. 443, that a British subject violated no law of his parent State in procuring himself to be received as a sub-[411]-ject of the United States, but could enjoy all the privileges conceded to the other subjects of the State which has adopted him. It is impossible then to contend that a British subject may not change his domicil, though that cannot destroy his allegiance. The question is, did Mr. Stanley become domiciled in Portugal; not, whether he became a subject of Portugal? A man may be domiciled in a country where he may never be admitted or deemed a subject, yet his personalty will be governed by the law of that country even when the law of the domicil shall say that personal property shall go by the law of the forum originis.

The facts of this case leave the domicil beyond the possibility of doubt: the deceased was married in Portugal; all the essential consequences of the marriage contract attached to him under the law of Portugal: he was naturalized; received a pension; took the oath of allegiance; and he resided within the Portuguese territory for fifty-seven years, without any absence, and without having returned to his native land for a single hour. In Curling v. Thornton it was not decided that the will was good because the deceased could not acquire a foreign domicil, nor, if he had acquired it, that the law of domicil would not govern the case; but that he had not acquired a domicil in France. He had been out of the country only a short time; his goods were here; he had a house here; he visited this country occasionally, and his will was not only conformable to the laws of this country, but was made in this country, and was a will in which British subjects alone were concerned. Here the legatees are all Portuguese; the deceased had been long resident in the Portu-[412]-guese territories; he had no house here; he never visited this country; his will was not made here, and was not to be carried into effect here. In The Duchess of Kingston's case (a) the will was admitted to probate here, because she was not naturalized in France; but in this case the deceased was naturalized in Portugal. The whole history of his life—all his connexions—were Portuguese; it is not even shewn that he considered himself an Englishman, or ever seriously contemplated returning to England: nor would the animus revertendi be sufficient. Bruce v. Bruce, 6 Bro. P. C. 566.(b) There, notwithstanding a clear intention to return to Scotland—his forum originis—and his remitting money to that country, in furtherance of that intention; notwithstanding that no European can possess real property in India; and that all the servants of the Company have necessarily an animus revertendi, yet Mr. Bruce, being in that service, was held to have acquired a domicil in India; and this, by a decision of the House of Lords, upon which all the law, learning, and research of the ablest men of the day were concentrated.

But it is said the relation between England and Portugal is very intimate: if so, the more nearly does it resemble the relation between England and Scotland; and the more directly do the decisions on questions of British domicils bear on the present case. It is true that residence in a factory does not change domicil; but then that must be residence in a factory as a British subject.

The Portuguese domicil, then, being established, [413] what law is to govern the decision? The ruling doctrine is—mobilia sequuntur personam. Testacy and intestacy; bankruptcy, lunacy, and all the other relations as to personal character, or personal property, are governed by the lex domicilii, in opposition to the lex loco rei sitæ—no matter where the property is—though real property is liable to the law of the country. If, between England and Scotland, in a case of intestacy, the lex domicilii governs the personal property; on the same principle the proposition, above stated, may be maintained. It is admitted to hold as to our colonies, in which French, or Dutch, or Spanish law prevails separately or mixed. But the more general proposition is also fully established. In all the cases, whatever may be the individual circumstances, they are argued upon the principle of intestacy entirely; but if a court of common law adopts the principle in cases of lunacy and bankruptcy, it may be applied to cases either of testacy or intestacy. In Balfour v. Scott, 6 Bro. P. C. 550, the House of Lords are said to have decided that the lex domicilii, and not the lex loci rei sitæ, governed the whole moveable succession of the deceased—both testate and intestate; though his personal property might be in different places and under different laws.

(a) Cited in Curling v. Thornton, 2 Add. 21.

(b) See Lord Thurlow's judgment in Bruce v. Bruce, reported in a note to Marsh v. Hutchinson, 2 B. & P. 229.

In Hog v. Lashley, 6 Bro. P. C. 577, the question arose on two interlocutors, where the Lord Ordinary in one, and the whole Court of Session in the other, found that personal effects—wherever situated—must be governed by the lex domicilii: this was affirmed by the House of Lords in 1792. In Ommaney v. Bingham (Sir Charles Douglas' case, see 5 Ves. 757, et seq.), decided by the House of Lords in 1796, and in Drummond v. [414] Drummond, 1799, 6 Bro. P. C. 601, it was admitted that it could no longer be disputed that the lex domicilii—not the lex loci rei sitæ—governed the whole question.(a) The same principle [415] governed the decision of this Court in Ryan v. Ryan, 2 Phill. 332.

(a) The decisions of the House of Lords in the cases of Ommaney v. Bingham (Sir Charles Douglas' case), and of Hog v. Lashley, are the most direct to the point, that the lex domicilii applies to cases of testacy as well as of intestacy. However, in those cases the question was not whether the deceased was testate or intestate, but, being testate, by what law his will was to be construed. Neither case expressly decides that a paper must, in order to be entitled to probate in an English Ecclesiastical Court, be executed according to the formalities required by the lex domicilii—whether that domicil be a British or a foreign domicil. The main circumstances of Sir Charles Douglas' case and a portion of Lord Loughborough's judgment in it will be found at 5 Vesey 757-9. And at 3 Vesey, 202-3, the effect of the judgment is stated by Lord Loughborough himself. See also 6 Bro. P. C. 550. From a reference to the will and codicil proved in the Prerogative Office, it appears that they were both executed according to the English forms and were attested by three witnesses. The will is dated on the 13th of May, 1788, and the codicil on the 11th of October, 1788: at neither of which times was the testator in Scotland; and one of the witnesses to the codicil is described as notary public, London, and the two others as his clerks. It probably, therefore, was executed in England. The will appoints two gentlemen described "of London" and one "of Gosport" executors and trustees: all the property disposed of was in the English funds, except 5000l. lent in 1765 on the estate of Langton in N. B. and two flats in Edinburgh purchased in 1771, which flats he directs to be sold and the money to be invested in the English funds; he leaves to his wife the use of the furniture in his dwelling house.

It does not appear by the will where this dwelling house was, but it is stated, in 5 Ves. 758, to be at Gosport—and was probably so proved to be by extrinsic evidence.

The codicil, which was the subject of question in the case of Ommaney v. Bingham, recites that one of his daughters had formed an attachment for, or been married to, a gentleman at Gosport, and directs that in case such marriage had already taken place, or should thereafter take place, she should forfeit all benefit under his will and her share should go to his other children. It was contended that this condition in restraint of marriage was void by the law of Scotland, but valid by the law of England by reason of the bequest over. The House of Lords held that the law of England—his domicil—was to prevail; the effect of which was, not only that the law under which the deceased intended to make his will governed the succession; but also that his intentions were carried into effect.

In Hog v. Lashley the instrument was executed in Scotland by a Scotsman resident there, and solely with reference to the formalities required by that law. The paper is in the form of a Scotch settlement. It describes the deceased as of Newliston, N.B.; it disposes of several real estates in Scotland; it directs all his personalty to be invested in the purchase of landed estates in Scotland; it gives to his eldest son, among other things, his household furniture (except the household furniture and plenishing of his house in London, which he had already given off to his second son); it speaks of money in the public funds, and of shares in the Bank of Scotland, and of annuities in the French funds. The deceased had, however, attempted to dispose of more than the law of Scotland permitted, and to exclude Mrs. Lashley of her legitim—a moiety of the moveables. The Court of Session, whose decree was affirmed by the House of Lords, pronounced that the lex domicilii ought to prevail even though part of the property was situate in England: but it will be observed that, though the intentions of the deceased were thus defeated, that law, under which the deceased intended to make his will, governed the succession.

Prerog. M. T. 4 Sess. 1789.—A suit respecting the claim of this paper to pro-

[416] The inconvenience of adopting the lex loci rei sitæ is manifest: e.g. if a person died possessed of [417] personal property in England, France, Russia and Holland, bate in England was instituted between the same parties in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, and thence appealed to the Delegates. An allegation propounding the instrument pleaded the execution of the paper on the 5th February, 1787, at Edinburgh: capacity—death at Alverstone, in the county of Edinburgh, in 1789—registration of the original on the 13th May, 1789, and that No. 1, the paper propounded, was an authentic copy. It then prayed probate of such copy to be granted to Mr. Hog as executor, and Mrs. Lashley to be condemned in costs. This allegation was opposed on the ground that the paper was not of a testamentary nature—but was admitted.*[1] From this admission an appeal was prosecuted to the Delegates, and Mrs. Lashley prayed the Court to reject the allegation, or to suspend the consideration of the admission thereof till the proceedings then depending in the Court of Scotland respecting the paper propounded were determined.

---

Sir William Scott, Sir John Scott, Dr. Nicholl, Mr. Adam for Mrs. Lashley.*[2] Our prayer is either to reject the allegation altogether or to suspend its admission. The paper is not testamentary; the whole language, purview, and entire contents shew this. There is by the English law a distinction between a will and a deed. A will passes no present interest; a deed does. This instrument gives a present interest both in realty and personalty; it converts the testator into a tenant for life with reversion to another. It is not then a testamentary disposition by the law of England: but the deceased was a domiciled Scotsman, and by the law of Scotland (as may be gathered from the Dictionary of Decisions, a book of perfect authority in Scotland) the mere nomination of executors and testamentary words do not make a testamentary instrument, if, upon the whole view of the instrument, it appears to be a disposition inter vivos; if, however, the character of the instrument—a Scotch instrument throughout, executed according to the forms of Scotch law by a man domiciled in Scotland—be dubious according to the ideas we possess of that law, it ought not to have been propounded in this simple manner, but as a foreign will—as a will according to the law of Scotland. In wills of Englishmen only in itinere the Court does not inquire into foreign law; but in the will of a Frenchman or a Dutchman, made in his own country, the Court engrafts its own probate on the probate transmitted from that country. So a probate here binds the Judge in the Plantations. Burn v. Cole, Ambler, 415.

---

*[1] The following expressions occur in the paper, some pointing to a conveyance inter vivos; others to a testamentary disposition:—

"Being determined after my decease that all my estates, which I have not disposed of in my lifetime, shall be entailed as Newliston, and all my personal estate shall after my decease be invested in the purchase of lands in same entail as Newliston." "With full power to my son after my decease, to intromit with the hail subjects and to sell, &c., as fully as I could in my own life." "I recommend my son to execute my intentions with all convenient dispatch after my decease." "As soon after my decease as may be, to realise the subjects hereby conveyed, after discharging all debts, legacies, donations, and burthens"—"to take effect at my death"—"this disposition, assignation, and conveyance." "I do hereby give, grant, dispose, assign, and make over to my son, in case he survive me, all land that shall belong to me at my death, and shall not at that period be otherwise disposed of by a deed under my hand duly executed, and all my real and personal estate which may happen to belong to me at the time of my death, and not otherwise disposed of." "I do hereby nominate, constitute, and appoint my son my sole executor and universal legatee and intromitter with my goods and gear, with full power to him, immediately after my decease, to meddle and intromit with the hail subject before disposed to him, and that in virtue of this present right, and without the necessity of confirmation, administration, or other form of law." "I declare that these presents, though found lying by me at the time of my decease, shall be as valid as if delivered to my son, with which delivery I dispense and consent to the registration hereof." "Provided always, as it is hereby specially provided and declared, my son is to be bound and obliged, and as by accepting thereof he shall bind and oblige himself to execute my intentions."

*[2] The argument as to the testamentary nature of the paper is omitted.

his succession would be regulated by [418] four different laws: but in the present case the testator is not only domiciled in Portugal but [419] married a Portuguese wife, and all the rights of that Portuguese wife are governed by the law of [420] Portugal. The obligations that attached to him on that marriage made his property divisible in [421] certain proportions between the husband and wife, and he could not deprive her of it. How, then, [422] can it be asserted that the lex domicilii does not govern the distribution of property? On the same principle it governs the forms on

---

It must not be forgotten that the question is not what will be the effect of the instrument propounded as a will as to its efficacy in disposing or not, but whether in its nature it is to be considered as testamentary and entitled to probate, regard being had to the domicil of the testator. If you say you will not grant probate, you do not exclude any claim to the effects that Mr. Hog may have; for, if it is a deed, to refuse probate of it as a will is no injury, since then the question would be open elsewhere as to the effect it shall have. Supposing you grant administration: if it be no disposition, a distribution as in a case of intestacy would be made: on the other hand, if it should be held a disposition by deed, the administrator would be accountable and bound to distribute according to the deed: so also, if by the law of Scotland it be a will, the deceased being a domiciled Scotsman.

It is now too late to contend that in the construction of instruments the will of a domiciled Scotsman, proved in the ecclesiastical courts in England, will have a different effect from what it would have in Scotland. The law, by the latest decisions, is that effects in intestacy are to be distributed by the lex domicilii. In Bruce v. Bruce, 6 Bro. P. C. 566, this was held to be clear law to set the Lords of Session right. Brown v. Brown, ib. 569. Pipon v. Pipon, Ambler, 26. Erskine's Institutes, i. 3, t. 9, s. 4 (6 Bro. P. C. 582). Thorne v. Watkins, 2 Ves. sen. 35. In this case the Court of Sessions have proceeded according to that law, and have held it to extend to English effects also.

By the acts which regulate the transfer of stock, stock cannot be disposed of but by a will executed in the presence of two witnesses: but if a person in Scotland or Holland make a will, valid by the law of his country, though not thus attested, it would not pass the stock, as to which he would be intestate here: yet by the principle of the law of nations the representative of the deceased must be the trustee of the legatee. If an Englishman makes a will, giving all his effects to his son or a stranger, the rest of his family will be disappointed, but a Scotsman can do no such thing. If this instrument is to be considered as a will of a Scotsman, a moiety of the effects only will pass by it as a will: as to the other moiety he is intestate. Kilpatrick v. Kilpatrick (6 Bro. P. C. 584), where Lord Kenyon sent to Scotland to inquire, and being informed that a Scotsman could only dispose by will of a moiety of his effects, made a decree in conformity to that law.

Suppose a domiciled Scotsman in Scotland makes a nuncupative will clearly against the statute, consequently not good by the English law; and suppose in Scotland it were good; the Ecclesiastical Court in England could grant no probate, yet the persons entitled under it by the law of Scotland would be authorized to come to an English court of equity, and, on proof of the law, have an account of the effects as against the administrator. This supports the argument in favour of our client, and is the application of the very principle laid down in Thorne v. Watkins. Being intestate here, the ordinary could, by statute, only grant the administration to the widow or next of kin; but the administrator would be bound to distribute according to the will valid by the law of Scotland. That is precisely the case of Thorne v. Watkins. The right accrued in Scotland, but the deceased being domiciled in England, the administrator was bound to distribute by the law of England. If to recover the effects in Scotland it had been necessary to sue as the representative of the intestate, and administration had been taken in Scotland, the administrator would still have been made to account by the law of England.

This allegation, if admitted, can lead to no decisive conclusion; nor will the rejection of it bear hardly on Mr. Hog's interests. As a deed this paper, if valid, is good without administration. By the law of England it clearly is not testamentary; but if valid by the law of Scotland (and the will of a domiciled Scotsman, wherever the property to be disposed of is situate, admits of a different consideration from the will of an Englishman), Mr. Hog can have relief in a court of equity. If, however, you which the validity of a will must be established. Suppose an individual goes abroad knowing nothing of the English law; he makes an instrument valid according to the forms of the country in which he resides—perhaps a nuncupative will—what a hardship it would be that such will should be vitiated in this country!

Per Curiam. All this argument is equally applicable to real property. The true question is whether a British subject who has acquired a foreign domicil is deprived of the right of disposing of his British property according to the forms of British law.

---

will not absolutely reject, your Lordships will at least suspend the admission of this allegation. If the instrument is to be set up as a Scotch will, Mr. Hog should have pleaded that it was a valid disposition by the law of Scotland, and should have had a probate engrafted on the Scotch probate. Your Lordships will not assume the character of foreign jurists and foreign judges. What may be the effect of your judgment, if you admit this paper to probate? You may decide that to be a testament which the proper tribunal of the country shall decide against. If the question was proper at first to have been decided in the Scotch Courts, there will be no impropriety that the case should stand over. The effects are to be governed by the Scotch law, and an actual decision has been given in Scotland that our party is not excluded from her legitim. Still, by your probate, Mr. Hog would get possessed of all the property without giving security. If the property is in a precarious state, we should have no objection to a joint nominee for administration pendente lite.

Dec. 4, 1790.—The Court, Perryn, Baron; Heath, J., and Grose, J.; Arnold and Laurence, LL.D.; without hearing Mr. Hog's counsel, affirmed the decree of the Prerogative Court, with the costs of the appeal, and retained the cause.

Feb. 8, 1793.—Witnesses having been examined by Mr. Hog, but no plea given by Mrs. Lashley, the Judges after hearing counsel for Mr. Hog only * pronounced for the will, but at Mrs. Lashley's prayer directed an act on petition to be entered into as to whether a general or limited probate should issue.

The substance of the petition was: That the deceased died at Newliston, N.B., on the 19th of March, 1789, possessed of personalty in Scotland, England, and France, very considerably exceeding his debts: he left, among several children, Thomas Hog, his eldest son, the respondent, and Rebecca (wife of Thomas) Lashley, his daughter, the appellant: he executed certain deeds of settlement, and among others a general disposition (the will in question) containing a nomination of executors, dated 5 Feb., 1787, in favour of the respondent, of lands and of all his personalty in Scotland, England, and France, burthened with debts, legacies, and provisions to younger children; the residue and interest to be employed in purchasing land to be entailed on the series of heirs in the entail of Newliston: that he had executed two bonds in favour of the appellant exclusive of her husband's jus mariti, one for 1300l. containing a declaration that it should be in full satisfaction of all portion, natural, legitim, bairns' part of gear, or other claim on his or his wife's death: and another for 200l. exclusive of the jus mariti, but without the declaration. That these bonds, being short of her legal claim, she and her husband called, before the Court of Session in Scotland, the respondent to account to them for half of the deceased's moveables as legitim, and for her third of the goods in communion at the dissolution of the marriage, to which the children were entitled as next of kin of their mother: that in defence Hog had contended that from certain letters it appeared Mr. and Mrs. Lashley were satisfied with the provisions made by her father, and were thereby barred from demanding legitim, the deceased having it in his power by a suitable and rational provision for Mrs. Lashley, calculated bonâ fide for the performance of his paternal duty, to exclude her claim of legitim: that certain renunciations by his other children operated in the deceased's favour, and Mrs. Lashley could demand no more as legitim than if these renunciations had not been made, and that in estimating her claim either for legitim or as next of kin of her mother the personalty in England or France was not to be included. That in answer, Mr. and Mrs. Lashley had contended they had never accepted these provisions; that the deceased could not exclude her by any testamentary deed from her legal claims; that as the other children were forisfamiliated, and did, in consideration of the patrimonies they received, renounce their legitim, she

---

* It is presumed Mrs. Lashley did not by counsel oppose the sentence pronouncing for the will.

Is there any decision by which, in a case of testacy, the lex domicilii has been applied so as to avoid a will executed with reference to the law of the country where the property was situate, and so as at the same time to defeat the intentions of the testator? In the present case, if the law of Portugal is to prevail, neither the law, which the deceased contemplated as governing his testamentary acts, will prevail, nor will his intentions be carried into [423] effect. Is there any decision going to that length?

Argument continued.

---

was now entitled to the whole legitim, i.e. a moiety of the whole personal estate; and that as all such questions must be regulated by the lex domicilii, the claim extended as well to the English and French as to the Scotch personalty. That the cause came on first before the Lord Ordinary, and then before the whole Court of Session, who, after several hearings, on the 7th of June, 1791, pronounced, first, that the succession of personal estate of the deceased, wheresoever situated, must be regulated by the lex domicilii, and that Mrs. Lashley's right of legitim extends to the personal effects in England, or elsewhere, as well as in Scotland; 2ndly, that the renunciation of legitim by the other younger children operated in favour of Mrs. Lashley, and had the same effect as their death; and she, the only younger child who did not renounce, was entitled to the whole legitim—one half of the free personal estate wheresoever situate. That on the 29th of November, 1791, after further petitions, the Lords adhered to this interlocutor, and on the 23rd of December further decreed that certain government annuities in England belonging to the deceased were moveable, and fell under the claim of legitim. That on the 7th of May, 1792, these decrees were affirmed by the House of Lords (see 6 Bro. P. C. 577, 591, 621); that consequently Mrs. Lashley was entitled to a moiety of the personal estate in her own right, and that any disposition thereof by her father was null, and that he had no power to appoint an executor in respect thereto: but that he must be considered in point of law to have died intestate as to the same: Mrs. Lashley therefore prayed that the probate might be limited to a moiety of the personal estate of the deceased in England, the only part over which he had any power to devise or appoint executors; and that administration of the other moiety pronounced by the decrees of the Court of Session (affirmed by the House of Lords) to be the sole property of Mrs. Lashley, and over which no executor appointed by the deceased ought to have any power, might be granted to Mr. and Mrs. Lashley on security to pay a proportionate share of such debts as might be legally chargeable thereon.

On the other side the decrees, &c., were admitted; but it was submitted that by law the respondent was entitled to a general probate as sole executor, whatever might be the effect or operation of the will in regard to the duty or office of executor so appointed.

14 June, 1796.—The Judges having heard counsel on both sides, rejected Mrs. Lashley's petition, condemned her in the costs, and decreed a general probate to Mr. Hog.

By the admission of the allegation the Court of Delegates seem to have decided, as Sir William Wynne (in the Prerogative Court) had before decided, that the instrument was by the law of England testamentary; and inasmuch as the case of Bruce v. Bruce, then so recently determined, and the doctrine of the lex domicilii was pressed by counsel, the refusal to suspend the allegation infers that in their judgment the decision of the Scotch Courts ought to make no difference in their sentence; and that the paper would be entitled to probate here whatever might be its character in Scotland. It would therefore appear that the Court of Delegates, in Hog v. Lashley, proceeded on the same principle as the Prerogative Court in Stanley v. Bernes. It is believed that there is no note extant of the arguments of counsel, as to any of the proceedings when the Court pronounced for the will, or when it subsequently rejected Mrs. Lashley's petition for a limited probate. The latter decision, it is conceived, has no bearing on the question in Stanley v. Bernes, since whichever law governed the case, Mrs. Lashley's legitim, as forming part of the deceased's estate, could only be obtained through a representation to him, and she therefore stood very much in the same situation as a next of kin entitled to an undisposed residue. The executor, as the deceased's general representative, would be trustee for her, and be compellable in a court of equity to account for the legitim.

We do not take the point as one that has received a distinct decision. It is said, whatever is the law, you may grant probate and leave the consequences to be disposed of by another Court. The question for the Court to decide is whether the deceased died testate or intestate according to law; as, in the case of the will of a married woman, you must decide whether she is testate or intestate according to the power. If the question were mixed with other questions belonging to other jurisdictions, it might be a ground for leaving it to another Court; but it is one of those questions infinitely better known to those who are familiar with the civil law and the public general law. The codicils are ipso facto null—not invalid in part: it is therefore contrary to the practice of the Court to grant probate of such papers and then send them for construction to the Court of Chancery. Here was no conflict of domicils: the deceased lares constituit exclusively in Portugal. There is no doubt in case of intestacy that his property must be distributed according to the law of Portugal; and in the absence of a paper valid by that law the deceased is intestate as to this property.(a)[1]

Per Curiam. Is there any case in which a party domiciled [424] abroad has executed an instrument for the disposal of personal property in England?

Dr. Lushington. The only case I am aware of is that of Mr. Waddington, who went to reside in France and remained there several years, and by a will executed in France disposed of property here; and the Court of Chancery applied the French law.(a)[2]

(a)[1] 1 Hale, P. C. 68. Henry's Judgment of the Court of Demerara, &c. Hunter v. Potts, 4 T. R. 192. Sill v. Worswick, 1 H. Bl. 690. Philips v. Hunter, 2 ib. 402. Brodie v. Barry, 2 V. & B. 131, were cited for Mr. Stanley.

(a)[2] Case of Mr. Waddington drawn up from a comparison of the statements furnished to the Court on either side.

Mr. Waddington—a British-born subject, previously resident in England—went to France in 1813, where he purchased an extensive farm; and also mills and premises in which he carried on the business of a cotton-spinner. In 1816 he became by letters patent a naturalized French subject, and resided in France till his death in 1818: he left eight children—some minors—and also real and personal property in France, and personal property in England: he made, in January, 1818, at the same time, two wills; one in the English form, by which he gave all his property in England, and also a claim he had upon the French Government (and which he had lodged with the commissioners in England for receiving such claims), to six of his children equally. The other will was in the French language, and by that he gave his manufactory to two sons, being the two not named in the English will; but he directed certain debts and money in France to be paid to his other children, "in order to establish amongst them a perfect equality in conformity to the will, which I have made in the English language and forms:" the French will concluded; "As my will of the 19th of this month has only for its object to provide for a prudent administration and equal distribution of my property and funds which I possess in England, I declare, as far as may be needful, that I make all my children my heirs in equal portions of all my property (except my real property with the appurtenances) acquired by me in France, which it is hereby understood that I dispose of by the present will, subject to the charges and conditions which are contained therein."

Thomas and William, named in the French will, were naturalized French subjects: the other children were not. The executors, in the English will, proved both wills in the Prerogative Court, and a bill was filed in the Court of Chancery in the name of five of the children (minors) named in the English will against the executors and Thomas and William, and also against Charles, the eighth child (alleged to be out of the jurisdiction of the Court), praying an account of the English property, also of the French property, and that the rights of the parties might be declared.

Thomas and William in their answers claimed, as the only children resident and domiciled in France, to be entitled by the laws of France "to become the only heirs of the testator's real property there, either under his will or as being such his heirs." They also stated their belief "that by the laws of France all the personal estate in that country which the testator was possessed of or entitled to at his death—other than the said debt owing to him from the French government—on his death devolved to all his children then living, as well those residing in that kingdom as those residing out of France; and that the plaintiffs and all the other children of the testator did,

[425] In reply. No case has been adduced, and we can find none, where it has been held that a British sub-[426]-ject can so far throw off his British character as to deprive himself of the rights he possessed under it; still less that, under whatever circumstances a British subject might take up his residence in a foreign country, he becomes domiciled so as to render it incompetent for him to dispose of his property according to the forms of the country of his birth. The facts, it is said, shewing an adoption of the Portuguese character, constitute a body of evidence not to be overthrown by any cursory intention: but intention is to govern such a case; and here is proof of an intention of preserving his British character. It is clear from the writers on the law of nations that, in order to constitute a complete change of domicil, there must be not only a primary change, but a wish to fix for ever: that there must be no intention to resort to the former country, but an intention to renounce it for ever. Bruce v. Bruce is said to establish the contrary; but there the party had abandoned Scotland by going to India expressly to make his fortune: he returned to England and resided there [427] for two years without once visiting Scotland, and he then returned to India, and died. The question in Bruce's case was between two British domicils: here the point is whether the deceased threw off his British character and all the rights belonging to it so far as to have adopted the law of the foreign country where he was domiciled. In such a case a more complete abandonment of his forum originis must be established. Had however the evidence of such abandonment been far more decisive, it is admitted that none of the cases cited are exactly in point; none establish that a British subject can so far change his domicil to a foreign country as to deprive himself of the privileges of a British subject, and render his property liable to the laws of the country in which he is domiciled. If such be the law, it is extraordinary that, notwithstanding the extended relations of England with foreign countries, no case can be found to that precise effect: those cited are only used as furnishing analogous principles. In Marryatt v. Wilson it was held that a British subject might, from a foreign country, trade with the East Indies, which as a British subject resident in England he could not do. All that the case amounts to is, that on his death, become entitled to his personal estate in France (other than the debt owing to him from the French government) in equal shares and proportions, and that the testator could not by those laws make any valid bequest of the same from his children, or of only some small portion thereof;" and submitted "that, by virtue of the testator's will, they, together with the testator's other children, became and are entitled in equal shares and proportions, as tenants in common, to his personal estate in England and the debt owing to him by the French government."

---

The Vice Chancellor referred it to the Master, to inquire whether, by the law of France, the testator could dispose of all, or any, and what part, of his real estate there, by his will, and to whom? and whether by the law of France the testator could dispose of all, or any, and what part, of his personal estate there, by his will, and to whom?

Proceedings were also instituted in France: and, on the 28th of December, 1818, the Civil Tribunal at Dreux (all the children being made parties) made an order, setting forth the two wills, and directing that the accounts, liquidations, settlements, and distribution of the testator's estate should be made as required by the wills and testaments therein before described, in order to establish the equality directed by the testator.

On a petition to the Court of Chancery stating the proceedings in France, and praying that the Master upon the ground of such proceedings might divide the whole of the testator's estate, real and personal, amongst his eight children, a reference to the Master being ordered, he reported, on the 12th of February, 1822, all the proceedings in the French Court; "that it was a court of competent jurisdiction; and that the effect would be to make an equal distribution of the estate and effects, real and personal, of the testator, as well in England as in France, between the eight children of the testator."

It was an amicable suit, and was not argued; but by mutual arrangement Sir Anthony Hart and Mr. Bell, counsel on either side, settled the minutes; and thereupon the Vice Chancellor made a final decree in conformity with the Master's report, "and declared that, regard being had to the laws of England and France, the testator's property, both real and personal, both in England and France, was divisible in equal shares between the children."

while so resident he is not liable to penalties and forfeitures as if he were resident in England. So a British subject may reside in a neutral State and trade in innocent articles with the enemy of this country. No case goes further than this: and this will hardly induce the Court to hold that, even if the domicil were changed, and the deceased had divested himself of the rights of a British subject, a will, not drawn up according to the laws of Portugal, is invalid, the deceased taking upon himself the disposition of his [428] property in England by a will not purporting to be made according to such Portuguese law, but good and valid according to the law of England.

Hunter v. Potts; Sill v. Worswick; and Philips v. Hunter, are cases of bankruptcy; and argued on special verdicts. Sill v. Worswick (1 H. Bl. 689) was a transaction in which the bankrupt and the other parties were not only British subjects, but resident in England; the bankrupt having property in St. Christopher's, where the bankrupt laws did not prevail; and Lord Loughborough said "it was a question whether a creditor resident in England, and subject to the laws of England, should avail himself of a proceeding of that law to get possession of a debt from those entitled to it for the benefit of all the creditors, and to hold that possession against those creditors:" he decided that the bankrupt law bound a British subject, and that a creditor was not entitled to hold against the assignees of a bankrupt in such a case. Lord Loughborough also said, "I do not wish it to be understood that it follows as a consequence from the opinion I am now giving—I rather think the contrary would be the consequence of the reasoning I am now using—that a creditor in that country, not subject to the bankrupt laws, nor affected by them, obtaining payment of his debt, and afterwards coming over to this country, would be liable to refund that debt." He is here arguing on the case of Solomons v. Ross: "It by no means follows that a commission of bankruptcy has an operation in another country against the laws of that country." Lord Loughborough does not say that if the law of the foreign country enabled a creditor to obtain his debt there, that the law of [429] England would compel him to refund it: "If he had received it in an adverse suit with the assignees he would clearly not be liable; but if the law of that country preferred him to the assignee, I do not think my holding a contrary opinion would revoke the determination of that country." But the argument on the other side would go to the length that there would be jurisdiction here to make even a foreign creditor refund. Hunter v. Potts is to the same effect: and in Sill v. Worswick there was no question of domicil. Brodie v. Barry and the other cases may shew that, to a certain extent, mobilia sequuntur personam, but not that in all cases and under all circumstances, contrary to the express will of the testator, the lex domicilii is to prevail. In Ryan v. Ryan the question of domicil was not material; for an individual not domiciled in, but merely passing through, a country, and marrying there, is primâ facie, as to such marriage, governed by that law every where: therefore the Danish marriage celebrated there on the dissolution, by a sentence of a Danish Court, of the former marriage, also celebrated there,(a)[1] was to be presumed valid for the mere purposes of administration, the Court carefully guarding itself from expressing any opinion that the proofs would have been sufficient in a matrimonial suit. It was also ultimately an unopposed case. To establish the position on the other side, the Court must have held that an English marriage between British subjects could be legally dissolved by a Court in Denmark, the parties having become domiciled there. The cases in 6 Bro. P. C. were only cited as shewing that those cases have been argued on [430] principles which would apply to testacy. Hog v. Lashley is principally relied on; but the Court is in the dark as to the decision in that case. It cannot, then, go the length of saying that the lex domicilii applies to testacy as well as to intestacy: and, unless it holds that such must be the rule in all cases, and under all circumstances, it could not apply to the present case, in opposition to the clear ascertained intentions of the deceased, more especially as it is specially provided by the treaty of commerce and navigation concluded between England and Portugal in 1810 that British subjects resident in Portugal shall be allowed to dispose of their property by testamentary instruments.(a)[2]

(a)[1] The original papers shew that such was the fact.

(a)[2] Sect. 7 of that treaty provides: "That the subjects of each shall have a free and unquestionable right to travel, and reside within the territories and dominions of the other; to occupy houses and warehouses, and to dispose of personal property of every sort and denomination, by sales, donation, exchange, or testament, or in any other manner whatsoever, without the smallest impediment."

As to Mr. Waddington's case, it was not contested; there was only one solicitor employed. That case, however, though cited on the other side, is much stronger the other way. The testator's object was to divide his property in England and France, by wills executed according to the forms of those countries respectively, in the same manner as Mr. Stanley has divided his property in Portugal and England.(b)

[431] Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This case involves a question of law of considerable importance; but upon the facts there is little, if any, controversy. In order to arrive at the question of law with accuracy it will be convenient to set forth the facts out of which it arises. The case respects the validity of the will and four codicils of John Stanley, or rather of two of the codicils, for it is now admitted that the will and the other two codicils are entitled to probate.

The testator, a native of Ireland, went in 1770 to Lisbon, and there engaged in business as a merchant; soon afterwards he married a lady, a Portuguese by birth, though of Irish parents, and a Roman Catholic. In order to contract that marriage he professed the Roman Catholic religion. In 1798 he obtained letters of naturalization as a Portuguese subject, and in 1808, when the French were in possession of Portugal, it is alleged that he was treated as a Portuguese subject: that is denied; and it is on the other side alleged that he was treated as a British subject. The manner, however, in which the French treated him is not very material to the decision of this case. Before their arrival he had placed a large part of his property in his son's name, who was born in Portugal; but the will recites that it was "a fictitious measure as a security against the French." The testator had four children by his wife, but only the present party survived him. His wife, having become insane, was removed from Portugal to Ireland, where the connections of both resided: she was there [432] supported by an allowance paid out of the property of the deceased, placed, as already mentioned, in the possession of the son. The deceased in 1808 removed from Lisbon to Madeira, and continued to reside in that island till his death in 1826: he had a natural son, a legatee in the will and codicil, the other party in this cause. This son was married; and at the time of the deceased's death had five children, whom, as his grand-children, the deceased has benefited by some of the testamentary instruments in question.

This is a brief history of the deceased and his family, so far as it seems necessary to mark out the question to be decided: but it may be proper also here to describe the testamentary acts of the deceased. The will and four codicils are propounded by the natural son as a legatee, the executors having renounced; and they are opposed by the legitimate son, the residuary legatee in the will. The will and first two codicils are executed in the forms required by the Portuguese law; the third and fourth codicils are not in that form.

At first Mr. Stanley opposed all the papers, for it was contended that by the Portuguese law a person marrying and making no settlement, and leaving a widow and issue of the marriage, could only dispose of one sixth of the property he left behind him, as half belonged to the widow and two thirds of the other moiety to the issue; and further, that an attempt either to dispose of more than one sixth, or to dispose of that one sixth, as by this will, in favour of adulterine issue, rendered the whole invalid. It is now admitted that the proof of the Portuguese law to the extent of rendering the papers void in toto has failed, and that the will [433] and first two codicils are valid so as to dispose of not more than one sixth of the whole property; and that of them probate must be granted. The opposition is therefore now confined to the third and fourth codicils, which are not executed in the Portuguese forms, though they are sufficiently executed according to the forms required by the law of England for an English will.

The will, dated at Funchal on the 21st June, 1820, gives to the natural son and his children legacies to a considerable amount: the first codicil, dated on the 4th of July, 1820, gives some further legacies to the grand-children, and appoints an additional executor; the second codicil is dated on the 11th of July, 1820, and gives a further legacy to the natural son and the aunt. The factum of these instruments

---

(b) Argentrie de la Coutume de Bretagne, Art. 449, 499. Dictionnaire de Droit Canonique (par Maillare), tome 2, p. 220. Judgment, &c. in Odwin v. Forbes, reported by Henry, and Appendix, p. 193. Marsh v. Hutchinson, 2 B. & P. 226, were cited in addition to the cases and authorities collected in Munroe v. Douglas, 5 Madd. 379.

being in the Portuguese form is admitted, and their validity, at least as to one sixth of the property, is not denied: they, in the strongest manner, mark the wishes and intentions of the testator, and the grounds on which those wishes and intentions were formed in favour of the natural son and the grand-children.

The two remaining codicils are those which are contested—the third, dated in October, 1820, merely relates to the substitution of some of the executors. The fourth codicil is the material instrument: its object is to make a further provision for the grand-children; it refers to certain donations made to be invested in trust in the British funds for their benefit, and then gives his property in the British funds in their favour. Both these codicils are in the deceased's own hand-writing, and are attested by three witnesses; there is no doubt of the factum nor of the intention, nor is there any doubt that they are valid, if to be con-[434]-sidered with reference to English forms. They dispose of property in the English funds and of no other, and consequently are to operate and be executed in England, but they are not executed in the form required by the Portuguese law for Portuguese testamentary acts; and the question is whether on that account they are utterly invalid so that probate of them ought not to be granted by this Court.

In opposition to their validity it is contended that the deceased was domiciled in Portugal and is to be considered as a Portuguese subject; that domicil is governed by residence; that here was a continued residence for above fifty years confirmed by change of religion, by marriage, and by naturalization; that mobilia sequuntur personam, that not only in case of intestacy is the succession to moveable property governed by the law of the country where the person is domiciled, but that such property can only be disposed of by a will made in the form required by that law—by the lex domicilii.

On the other hand, that the deceased was not at his death a domiciled Portuguese subject; that it is not residence but intention which ascertains domicil; that the domicil of origin continues so long as there is an intention of returning to it; that the deceased reverted to the Protestant religion, sent his wife to England when by her malady the consortium was broken, invested his property in England, intended to return to England, and was only prevented by infirmity and death, desired to be buried in the English burial-ground, and was during his life and at his death considered and treated as a British subject: but secondly, if he were domiciled in Portugal, still he maintained the [435] right of a British subject to dispose of his property by will made in the English form; that the succession to personal property depends upon the intention of the possessor, whether expressed or only implied; that if in cases of intestacy an intention is implied that the property shall go according to the law of the place of residence (though even that is not admitted so far as respects a natural born British subject residing in a foreign country), yet where a different intention is declared by will, that will, if validly made according to the English forms, is valid as to property in England.

Such was the general substance of the arguments on both sides, and in support of each proposition various authorities and cases were referred to.

The law of domicil, and the succession to personal property as affected by it, has been a vexata quæstio. The authorities applying to it are collected in various reports, particularly in 6 Bro. P. C. and in Lord Somerville's case, 5th Ves. 750. These authorities were not only referred to, but very elaborately discussed on both sides in the argument in the present case: for that reason, and because it is admitted that no adjudged case comes directly up to the present question, it is unnecessary again to quote and discuss them. I shall therefore content myself with stating the principles which may be deduced from them so far as they may be applicable to the point now brought before me for decision.

The general rule that mobilia sequuntur personam need not be controverted, though that rule, or rather fiction, if without exception, would in some extreme cases lead to absurdity and injustice, more especially in the modern state of so-[436]-ciety, and with reference to the nature and extent in these times of personal property, particularly funded property. The rule took its rise when "mobilia," for the most part, did accompany the person; but still recognising the rule, it is necessary to ascertain the national character of the "persona;" for it would be carrying the fiction into manifest absurdity to hold that the person and his mobilia changed their character with every place which he might enter, or pass through, or move to.

The general and primary rule is that the national character of the person is acquired from the place of birth, though some exceptions even to that rule have been framed, not by the common law, but by special acts of parliament; as, for instance, in favour of persons born abroad, but of natural born British parents. The different species of character is distinguishable; one is natural, the other local; one is temporary, the other permanent. The native national character is not only the most strongly impressed, but for some purposes cannot be changed: "nemo potest exuere patriam" is a rule of the jus gentium held by most countries, and by none more strictly than by this country. A natural born British subject cannot, at his own will and pleasure, divest himself of his native duties; nor can he be deprived of his native privileges except for crime: he may go into other countries and acquire privileges there, but still his native rights and duties adhere to him. These principles are, I apprehend, correctly laid down by Mr. Justice Blackstone: "It is a principle of universal law that the natural born subject of one prince cannot, by any act of [437] his own, no, not by swearing allegiance to another, put off or discharge his natural allegiance to the former; for his natural allegiance was intrinsic and primitive and antecedent to the other, and cannot be divested without the concurrence of that prince to whom it was first due." "This allegiance is the duty of all the King's subjects . . . their rights are also distinguishable by the same criterions of time and locality, natural born subjects having a great variety of rights, which they can never forfeit by any distance of place or time but only by their own misbehaviour" (1 Bl. Com. 370-1).

For certain purposes a man takes his character, primâ facie, from the place where he is domiciled, and, primâ facie, he is domiciled where he is resident, and the force of residence, as evidence of domicil, is increased by the length of time during which it has continued. All these principles are clear; but time alone is not conclusive; for where is the line to be drawn? Will the residence of a month, or a year, or five years, or fifty years, be conclusive? As a criterion, therefore, to ascertain domicil, another principle is laid down by the authorities quoted as well as by practice—it depends upon the intention, upon the quo animo; that is the true basis and foundation of domicil; it must be a residence sine animo revertendi, in order to change the domicilium originis: a temporary residence for the purposes of health, or travel, or business has not the effect: it must be a fixed and permanent residence, abandoning finally and for ever the domicil of origin; yet liable still to a subsequent change of intention.

"The third rule I shall extract," said the Master of the Rolls, in the case of Somerville (5 Ves. 787), "is that [438] the domicil of origin is to prevail until the party has not only acquired another, but has manifested and carried into execution an intention of abandoning his former domicil, and taking another as his sole domicil;" and that observation was made even with reference to domicil in different parts of the British dominions, when the choice was perfectly free from any restriction of conflicting duties.

In the present case there is strong evidence of acquiring a new domicil, and an intention of abandoning his former and taking another as his sole domicil (but still, it must be remembered, in a foreign State), declared not merely by long residence, but by marriage, naturalization, and investing himself with all the privileges which a new comer could acquire at his place of residence. But on the other hand here is some evidence to shew a change of intention, and of the animus revertendi, not merely that latent intention which pretty generally exists as a sort of natural feeling of "panting for his native home," but shewn by acts done and by declarations made, by sending his wife to England, by investing property in the English funds, by declaring his adherence to the English Church, by desiring, if he should chance to die at Madeira, to be buried in the English burial-ground, by making these codicils in the English forms, by declarations to several of his friends of his wish and intention to return, and of his fears that he might be prevented by infirmities.

In questions of national character it has been often decided that character acquired by mere residence ceases with the residence, and that the original character reverts and is reacquired much more readily than the change is made from an [439] original to an acquired character; the local and temporary character is by circumstances more easily presumed to be abandoned than the natural and more permanent character, which in some respects at least is inalienable: the animus revertendi actually put in motion, though the removal has not been consummated, recovers the original character. Whether the circumstances adverted to would be sufficient to shake off the Portuguese character in the deceased's case, or to exempt his property in Portugal from the operation of the laws of that country, may not be necessary to be decided: but there are circumstances tending to shew that the deceased neither wished nor intended altogether and for ever to abandon his connexion with his native country, nor to give up the rights and privileges belonging to him as a British subject. Not only in common parlance would he be still described as an Englishman and not a Portuguese, but he himself was in animo and he was in some respects de jure still an Englishman. His intention to retain his right as a British subject of disposing by will of his property in the British funds is quite obvious: and to deprive him of that right the law ought to be clear and unequivocal: and for this reason, because it will operate as a disqualification and a forfeiture of right.

That he retained some rights acquired by birth cannot be doubted: he would succeed to real property—he might purchase real property, notwithstanding all that had taken place in Portugal. Over personalty here, even a foreigner domiciled in his native country might in his life time exercise dominion as freely and as fully as a resident Englishman. So while the deceased survived, his power over and his rights regarding personal property [440] here, with some few exceptions perhaps, e.g. in case of bankruptcy, would not, at least in this country, be affected by his domicil abroad, they would be regulated by the laws of England and not by the law of Portugal. He would succeed in distribution of personal property in England as a next of kin, under whatever legal disabilities the law of Portugal might place him; he could transfer or give away personal property without regard to any restrictions which the law of Portugal might impose on such transfers or gifts: he could do this, it should seem, by instruments in the British form: the bank would probably receive no other in order to transfer stock: and he could engage in contracts to be executed in England, though such contracts might be illegal or invalid by the law of Portugal.

It comes then to the question whether a testamentary act of a British born subject, clearly intended and wished to operate upon his personal property in England, and executed according and with direct reference to the forms of the English law, which in this respect coincides with the law of nations—the jus gentium—is by the law of England invalid, solely because the deceased had long resided and was domiciled in Portugal, and because such testamentary act was not executed in the Portuguese forms. The authorities quoted all tend to prove that the jus gentium—the general law of all countries—is favourable, and inclines to give effect to testamentary dispositions. They also establish that intention is the very basis and foundation of the testamentary disposition to which effect is thus to be given. Forms are prescribed only for the sake of rendering more secure the execution of the real intention. The policy [441] of some countries may be to impose restrictions on the disposition of real property, or sometimes even on the disposition of personal property, by requiring the whole or a certain portion to descend to the wife and children, for whom every person is under a moral duty to provide: but wherever the power of disposing exists, and to whatever extent it exists, the intention and not the form, more especially as regards personal property, is the governing principle.

Assuming, then, that the deceased was a British subject, yet at the time of his death domiciled in Portugal, and that he had a clear intention to dispose of his property in the British funds by this codicil in his own handwriting, and attested by three witnesses, is it invalid because it was not attested by a notary and five witnesses as the Portuguese law requires, or is it entitled to probate here? Among the numerous authorities quoted it is admitted that there is no adjudged case in which the question has been decided either way: no case in which a will made with reference to, and in accordance with, the English forms by a British subject domiciled in a foreign country has been refused probate: no case in which the property of a British subject dying even intestate in a foreign country has been held distributable according to the law of such foreign country. All the adjudged cases have been of persons dying domiciled in some part of the British dominions, having different rules of distribution. No case has yet gone farther than to adopt the lex domicilii, when the domicil was in some part of the British dominions, and when it was a case as to the distribution of the effects, or the construction of the [442] instrument, not as to the right to the representation or the validity of the will.

The question is of too great importance, more especially in modern times and in the present state of society, to be decided on mere obiter dicta, or assumptions in argument. Great numbers of persons particularly of this country reside abroad, some for sufficient reasons, some perhaps upon less favourable grounds: they have no idea that their property would be distributable according to a foreign law, still less that they are deprived of the privilege of disposing of their property by will made in the same form as if they were resident in England. A person in the decline of life or of health going abroad to a more genial climate in hopes of prolonging life, or at least of rendering its remaining period less painful or more comfortable, without any hope or intention of ever returning, leaving the summa rerum in England—perhaps exclusively in the funds—having merely the dividends remitted to him for his subsistence; knowing that the law of England would distribute this property exactly as he would wish, and on that account, or from mere indolence, making no will, or supposing that a will in his own handwriting would be valid; how alarming would it be to a person thus circumstanced, how injurious to his family, if on establishing himself in the south of France he is to be bound by the law of that country: he may then be recommended to go farther south into Italy, then into Sicily, then perhaps to Madeira, with the intention at each place of fixing himself for the remainder of his life—"of abandoning his former domicil and taking the other as his sole [443] domicil"—at each remove a different law may govern not merely the form of the instrument, but the power of disposing—he may retain the jus disponendi over only one sixth part of his property; an undeserving wife or undutiful children may be absolute proprietors of five sixths of the personal property which he had left in England. If this lex domicilii is to be the rule not only in cases of intestacy, where there may be some presumed intention, but even in the case of a will as respects not only the form of the instrument, but even the power of disposing against the manifest and declared intention, it will be going beyond the authority of any case hitherto decided. It is true that there has been found no decision in a contested case that such a will is valid; but there have been instances where probates of such wills have passed sub silentio in common form. The case must surely have frequently happened, and if the probate was not opposed, the inference rather is that the will was supposed to be valid.

What then is the Court called upon by the opposer of the codicil to decide? That the codicil is invalid contrary to the manifest intention of the testator — that intention being expressed in an instrument duly executed according and with reference to the law of this country, in his own handwriting, and attested by three witnesses. The Court is called upon to extend disqualification and to deprive of privilege—to disqualify a British subject, because he is resident in a foreign country, from giving effect to his wishes in the disposition of his property at his death, and to deprive him of his testamentary privilege which is so highly favoured by the general law of this and of most other countries. Without some more direct authority [444] than any which has been quoted, or with which this Court is acquainted, I do not feel warranted to proceed to such a length. I am the less disposed so to do, because in one way the decision of the Court of Probate would be conclusive, in the other it would not. If the codicil be pronounced against and probate be refused, the legatee could not resort to any other jurisdiction; if pronounced for, this Court would merely decide on the factum, and the residuary legatee might resort to a Court of Equity to take its decision upon the question of construction.

There has been a recent case, not quoted in the argument, where a Court of Equity has held that in the construction of a will the lex domicilii is to rule, unless there be sufficient to shew a different intention in the testator (Anstruther v. Chalmers, 2 Simons, 1). The facts of the case were: Miss Anstruther, a native of Scotland, was domiciled in England. On a visit to Edinburgh in 1814 she made a will entirely in the Scotch form, and it was deposited with the writer at Edinburgh: she had personalty in England only, and died in England. Scotland then was the forum originis and forum contractus, but on the other hand England was the forum domicilii and the locus rei sitæ. The question was whether by the legatee's death in the life time of the testatrix a legacy lapsed according to the law of England, or survived to the legatee's representatives according to the law of Scotland. The point put in argument on both sides is the intention—what was the rule of construction the testatrix intended should be applied to the instrument. The Court decided that, being domiciled in England, it was to be presumed that she intended the law of Eng-[445]-land to be applied: there was not enough to repel that presumption. In the present case there is sufficient clearly to prove that Mr. Stanley's intention was to make these codicils in the form of the law of England. In Anstruther v. Chalmers, it is true, words might have been used which, even according to the law of England, would have prevented a lapse. The case therefore does not infer that intention could have given effect to a bequest forbidden by the law of the domicil; but it shews that in order to determine what law ought to operate on testamentary instruments, all Courts primarily and principally look to the intention of the deceased.

Another case, which has not been reported, was quoted in argument by Mr. Stanley's counsel from instructions furnished him, and a counter statement was afterwards given on the other side. The Court, without in the least doubting the intended correctness of the statements, is always cautious of relying upon an authority of that description; and in this instance the precise grounds of decision are at last left very much in the dark. The case referred to was that of Mr. Waddington, a natural-born British subject, long resident and settled in France, and domiciled there at his death: he made two wills, one in the French form, disposing of his property in France, and one in the English form, disposing of his property in England. So far the cases are parallel: there is nothing to shew that the English will was in point of form made also conformably to the French law; the contrary is to be inferred. How does the case operate further as a precedent? It should seem in favour of the validity of these codicils. Both wills receive the [446] probate of this Court: as far as that goes it is a precedent in favour of Bernes, the legatee. Both wills are considered in the Court of Chancery, and also in the French Court, and are acted upon as valid wills, for the property passes according to the disposition contained in the two wills taken together—the French will and the English will. The intention of the testator was to divide all his property equally between his children, and both Courts decide so as to give effect to that intention. Again, therefore, it is a precedent in support of the principle that intention is to govern the testamentary disposition; and how is the final decree made? Not upon the ground that the French Court, or the law of France, was on account of the deceased's domicil the sole forum having the right to decide—not excluding the law of England, nor pronouncing against the validity of the English will made in the English form, but the Vice-Chancellor is made to declare, "and declared, that, regard being had to the laws of England and France," the testator's property both real and personal, both in England and France, was divisible in equal shares between the deceased's children. He does not declare that, the deceased having been domiciled in France, the French law was exclusively to govern his will; he does not declare that, the French tribunal having so decided that both wills are valid, a Court of Equity will merely on that ground decree the property to be divided into equal shares, but both wills are proved in England and in France; both are considered valid in both countries—notwithstanding that one was in the French form, the other in the English—and regard being had to the laws of England and of France, the intention [447] of the testator, collected out of both the wills combined together, is carried into effect. Whether the Court from these statements rightly understands Mr. Waddington's case, may be doubtful; but at all events it serves so far as a precedent that probate was taken of both wills in this Court. That will be the effect of the decree about to be made by the Court, which is, to pronounce for the will and codicils, and to direct probate to be taken of them all.

Costs out of the estate.

An appeal from this decree was interposed to the High Court of Delegates.

The Judges, who sat under the commission, were: Parke, J. (K.B.); Bolland, B.; Bosanquet, J.; Burnaby, LL.D.; Daubeny, LL.D.; Chapman, LL.D.; Curteis, LL.D.

The præsertim of the appeal was: "And more especially from that part of the decree wherein the Judge pronounced for the 3d and 4th codicils, bearing date the 24th of October, 1822, and 29th of October, 1825." Accordingly the proctor for Stanley prayed the Judges to pronounce against the 3d and 4th codicils; the proctor for Bernes—to affirm the decree with costs.

July 14, 1830.—The King's advocate, Dr. Phillimore, and Mr. Alderson for the respondents. The deceased's residence in Portugal was solely as a merchant. The use of his native lan-[448]-guage, the niceties of which he had forgotten in the disposition of his property, tends to shew that he did not consider himself a Portuguese subject. Had he so considered himself, he would probably have adopted the language of his domicil. He was as much domiciled in Portugal for the last twenty as for the last six years: could he not during that period have disposed of this property by an English instrument, e.g. a power of attorney for the sale of stock? It does in fact appear from his will that he did make transfers of his stock, thus clearly exercising dominion over and dealing with it as his own. For these transfers an instrument in the Portuguese form would not have been valid. Why is death to make all the difference? In order to the validity of a testament no form is prescribed nor restraint imposed by the conventional law of Christendom. By the law of nations, intention is the governing principle of a Court of Probate. The doctrine of the law of England is that a testator may dispose of his personal property, quocunque modo velit, quocunque modo possit. The other side must shew that he is deprived of this privilege. From Mr. Veitch's evidence it appears the Portuguese authorities never doubted that these were legal codicils. If Mr. Stanley had executed these codicils in the Portuguese forms, he might be presumed to have intended that the disposition should be according to the Portuguese law; but here he in effect says, "I know it is necessary to adopt the Portuguese forms when disposing of my property in Portugal, but when I come to my English property I know I am a British subject entitled to all the privileges of a British subject, that I am so considered by the Portuguese government, that my will is deposited with the British Consul [449] and expressed in my own language, and I shall execute these codicils disposing of my property in England according to the forms of the English law."

The question is not whether the law of Portugal shall ultimately prevail or the law of England, but whether a Court of Probate in England is to look into the document for the purpose of ascertaining what law is to be applied to it—to see what is the intention of the testator, and whether that intention is conformable to the power of the testator under the law of Portugal. The construction of the will, if admitted to probate, belongs to the Court of Chancery, and it may become a question whether it is to be construed by the law of Portugal or of England; but that is a different point from the mode of execution. Cases of intestacy involve both points. Both by the law of England and of Portugal the deceased had the right of making a will: has he made one? The jus gentium refers the form of the instrument to the place where it is to be carried into effect—that is England; but how and where is it to be proved? By the law of the country and in the place where the property lies: and the law of that country is to inquire (if there be proof that the party intended to give the property) whether it is given with certain formalities, these formalities being either those which the law imposes, or which the deceased has imposed on himself. The former, that the will must be in writing, have been complied with: and so, as we contend, have been the latter, because he did not impose on himself the formalities required by the law of Portugal, but an attestation by three witnesses. A different mode of probation may be required in the Portuguese courts and in these courts: the will, if re-[450]-quiring probate there, would be admitted to proof according to the mode of probation there required. If by the Portuguese law the deceased could have made no will, the case might be different.

The only question is whether this will can be given in evidence. A similar question arose in Brodie v. Barry. Sir W. Grant, remarking on the decisions that the question, whether a will should be read against an heir, belonged to the law of real property, says, "Upon that principle, if the domicil were in Scotland and the real estate in England, an English will imperfectly executed ought not to be read in Scotland for the purpose of putting the heir to an election, and upon the same principle, if by the law of Scotland no will could be read against the heir, it would follow that a will of land situated in Scotland ought not to be read in England to put the Scotch heir to an election." He doubts, as well he might, the soundness of the principle, and finally the will was read. Probate has never been refused in such a case. What is the principle on which the probate proceeds? By the law of the land it is vested in the ordinary, and if granted it must be on some act of which testimony can be given. If by the law of the land the ordinary is to grant probate when he is satisfied a will has been made in England, it is strange that he should not do the same upon evidence that a will has been made elsewhere, either according to the law of the country where made or to the law of England. If proof be given that a will has been admitted to probate in the country where made, your Lordships must admit it to probate here; but if it be tendered for proof originally here, you must examine it by the law of England, for you have not the means of ascertaining whether it has or has not been tendered for probate where executed. In Wad-[451]-dington's case the will of an Englishman domiciled in France, made in the English forms and not conformable to the law of France, was admitted to probate; both wills were held valid, and the intention carried into effect. The circumstances of the present case are new. You have now, as a Court of Probate, for the first time to decide a question where the decision against the validity of the papers must be final so as to preclude the party from going to a Court of construction; while, if you pronounce for the validity, the party may resort to the judgment of a Court of Equity. There must have been hundreds of cases of probates of wills granted under the same circumstances as the present, of wills executed in Portugal where the property was in England, yet not one can be cited in which the testator has been held not to be at liberty to dispose of his personal estate in England by a will conformable to the laws of his own country. The absence of such a case affords a presumption that such a will is not contrary to law. All the cases decided are where it was necessary to determine on the effect of the will: here the question is with what species of evidence the Ecclesiastical Court shall be satisfied; and whether it is to be satisfied on its own rules. We can find no instance where a will capable of proof by the law of England has been refused probate. As this question is only whether the instrument shall be admitted to probate, your Lordships will affirm the judgment, and leave the construction to a Court of Equity.

Dr. Lushington, Dr. Addams, and Mr. Follett for the appellants. Lord Coke's maxim, Co. Litt. 198, Nemo potest exuere patriam, has nothing to do with the case. [452] Though a man cannot throw off his allegiance, he may owe a double allegiance, 1 Hale's P. C. 68, and he can acquire a new home. There is no maxim in the English law that an Englishman cannot throw off his domicil of origin and acquire one in any part of the world. There is nothing laid down which confines the change to different parts of the English dominions, for Scotland is as much a foreign country as to its law as France or Portugal: it is only the same country as to its King and legislature. There is no difference then in changing to Scotland or Jersey, or to any foreign country; nor was any such distinction ever adverted to by any Court till thrown out in Curling v. Thornton, 2 Add. 6. If there had been a constant intention of returning, and if the connexions and family of the deceased had been in England, the domicil of origin might have adhered: but he had done all he could to put off his original character: he set up "his tabernacle" in Portugal. He had no earthly connexions in England. The sole persons interested in this question are Portuguese subjects.

Per Curiam. Mr. John Stanley, the party in the cause, is a British subject: he was born before the act of naturalization.

Argument resumed. Legally he is so, but practically he is a Portuguese. There is no proof that the deceased sent his wife to Ireland: the will only says "she went there." No English witness speaks to his declarations of his intentions to return: if he had such intention, is it not strange that he should not have so expressed himself to his own fellow subjects! But Lord Thurlow, in Bruce v. Bruce, expressly said "that an intention to return will not do." The will itself proves [453] that he doubts his right to dispose of his property as a British subject. In referring to the possibility of his son opposing the will, he does not say, I am not a subject of Portugal, nor does he assert his right as a British subject: he hangs a penalty in terrorem over his son. The will is not confined to Portuguese property, but disposes also of English, American, and other effects.

The fact of the codicils being executed in the English form, whether used as an argument to shew his intention of returning or for their validity, amounts to nothing. It is said it was his intention not to adopt the Portuguese forms: it was his intention to pass his property in England, and the question is, could he do so in the way he has adopted? If intention alone is to have effect there would be no need of any form: but the law of all countries requires that the intention should be expressed so that the law may understand it, and that the personal property may be distributed according to its rules. If it be a clear principle of law that personal property has no locality; that the law of the place is not to be looked to at all, it follows as a necessary deduction that the case of a party dying, leaving a will, must be liable to the same rules as in a case of intestacy. The law which binds the person governs the effects. If, then, the person of the testator was governed by the law of Portugal, so must these instruments; if the property is distributable by the law of Portugal, the instrument should be valid by that law. If intestate, it is conceded that his property, in whatever country, would pass according to the Portuguese law: how, then, are we to find whether he is intestate or not. If the will by the Portuguese law is invalid, he is intestate in Portugal; for you can [454] never say, that because this will is valid in England, it is therefore valid in Portugal. Supposing it to be valid by every other law, but invalid by the law of Portugal, then the property would go according to the Portuguese law, as in a case of intestacy. Suppose a will, giving, without specification, all the testator's property in different places; by the law of what country are you to see that the will is valid? It is necessary to look to that point; for the deceased may be testate in one country, and intestate in another: we contend that, on principle, if it be once established that in cases of intestacy the law of domicil is to prevail, it must follow that in testacy it must also; otherwise you cannot find out whether the party be testate or not. If a foreigner made a will, valid by the law of his own country, and invalid here, disposing of property in this country, could the Court refuse probate? When an instrument is invalid the Court of Probate refuses probate; it does not grant probate and send the paper to the Court of construction: so if the codicils in this case are to be governed by the Portuguese law, you cannot send the instruments to a Court of construction that it may have a construction contrary to the rules of a Court of Probate. The same law must prevail as to the probate and construction, otherwise persons as executors will obtain control over the property to which they have no right, and the probate would be conclusive evidence of their right unless a Court of Equity interfered.

From Waddington's case no principle can be extracted; it is not reported; it was arranged by consent of parties; the decree was settled by counsel and confirmed by the Vice Chancellor. The case of Gordon v. Brown, House of Lords, [455] 1st of March, 1830, establishes that a British subject may acquire a foreign domicil in complete derogation of his British, and that then his will must be construed by the law of that domicil.(a) [456] The Judge of the Prerogative, in speaking of the (a) Gordon, Trustee of John Brown v. Mary Brown. House of Lords, March 1, 1830.

This was an appeal from certain interlocutors of the Lord Ordinary and First Division of the Court of Session in Scotland. Wm. Brown, by birth a Scotsman but domiciled in Virginia (so described in the Lord Chancellor's judgment), died in 1811 at Richmond in America, having on the 29th of June, 1805, made his will in Virginia, which will was proved by the executors, in the proper Court in Virginia, in February, 1812, and administration with this will annexed was also granted by the Prerogative Court of Canterbury to his father and mother. The will commences, "I William Brown of Lynchburgh, state of Virginia, do make this my last will and testament." After giving to certain persons (all Scotch) legacies "in Virginia Currency and an acre of land at Lynchburgh," it proceeds: "to my father and mother James and Margaret Brown, of Kirkcudbright, N.B., I leave one 4th share of the balance of my estate to them or the survivor of them; to my sister, Jean Muir, of Kirkcudbright, N.B., I leave one 4th share of the balance of my estate, at her death to be equally divided between her children. To my sister Isabella Black, do. To my sister Mary Brown, I leave the remaining one 4th share of the balance of my estate, at her death to be equally divided between her children should she have any." It then appoints three executors, two described as resident in Virginia and one in Scotland, and concludes: "Witness my hand and seal at Lynchburgh this 29th of June 1805."

Test. G. P.—T. M. WILLIAM BROWN (L.S.).

It appears that the testator at the time of his death was in partnership with Mr. Boyd Miller in London, and although by far the greater part of his property was in America, he had also funds in England: but it does not appear that he had either real or personal estate in Scotland.

After the death of the testator a suit was instituted in the Virginia Court of Chancery by Mary Brown (the respondent) and Jean Muir, as residuary legatees in the will, against the executors and legatees. In May, 1816, a decree was pronounced that payment of the shares of Jean Muir and Isabella Black, both having children, ought not to be made unless security be given that at their respective deaths their shares should be divided among their children, as provided by the will; that the executors pay to Mary Brown one 4th of the testator's residuary estate, and to the husband of the other two sisters their respective shares on giving bond in 70,000 dollars that at the death of their wives their legacies shall be divided amongst their children.

In October, 1816, Mary Brown, by power of attorney, authorised John Brown alarm that persons abroad would feel if the law [457] we contend for prevail, seems to have understood us to argue that the validity of wills was to be deter-[458]-mined according to the law of the place where a person was casually resident, and not where he was [459] domiciled. This we never maintained: but if the doctrine of the lex loci rei sitæ were to prevail, it [460] would go far to deprive parties of the power to receive on her account the money that she should be entitled to under the will of the testator; and in conformity with the decree the money was paid to him as her attorney. "It seems, therefore," said Lord Chancellor Lyndhurst, "extremely difficult to say that Mary Brown is not, under these circumstances, entitled to an account against John Brown for the money he has so received under a power of attorney from her, and in pursuance of a decree of a competent Court in America pronounced upon the subject of this will in a suit instituted for that purpose. It is said, however, on the part of the appellants, that Mary Brown was entitled to a life interest in this property; and that she being entitled only to a life interest, the residue was undisposed of and would pass therefore to the father, and from him by virtue of certain deeds to John Brown. For the purpose of establishing that this was the true construction of the will, the opinion of an English lawyer was offered in evidence, but the Court in Scotland justly observed that they had nothing to do with the law of England, and that there was no evidence to shew that the law of Virginia corresponded with the law of England in respect to the rules by which an instrument of that kind was to be construed."

---

"A petition was presented that the opinions of Virginia lawyers might be taken for the purpose of guiding the consideration of the case. The Court, however, rightly I think under the circumstances, rejected the petition. [See infra.] The Court of Virginia had in effect in 1816 pronounced a judgment on the construction of the will, for they had decreed that Mary Brown was entitled absolutely to this property; they had directed this property to be paid to her, and it was accordingly paid to John Brown as her agent appointed by her to receive that to which she was entitled under the will. It seemed, therefore, under these circumstances, and after so long an interval of time, not right again to postpone the cause for the purpose of taking further evidence as to the real and proper construction of the will. It was urged, however, that John Brown ought not to be bound by that decision; he was a party to that suit, his name was upon the record, but the decree was pronounced during his absence in Scotland. Although sitting here your Lordships cannot be apprised precisely of what the law of America is in this respect, yet it is probable that, the decree having been made in his absence, he might have obtained a rehearing. It is not, however, suggested that he was not apprised of the decree at the time it was pronounced in 1816: he had received from the executor the money under the decree, he had taken no steps from 1816 for ten years to call that decree in question, and therefore I think the Court below rightly judged that they might take that decree as the foundation of this judgment, and decide accordingly." *

Judgment of the Court of Session affirmed.

March, 1824.—The interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, Lord Eldin, finds, "If the opinion of any foreign lawyer were necessary or useful, the opinion of an American lawyer, as best acquainted with the American law, ought to be taken; that from the nature of William Brown's settlement, which is very simple and clear, the construction put upon it by the respondents is apparently ill founded; and that it has been asserted that the settlement was regularly brought before an American Court which gave judgment in Mary's favour, and that no sufficient answer has been made to that assertion."

Dec. 14, 1824.—The interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, Lord Alloway, finds, "That by the plain import and meaning of the words of the testament, as well as by the judgment of the competent Court in Virginia, where the testator died, and which stands unchallenged and unaltered, the fee of the legacy is vested in Mary Brown, who, by assent of both parties, is long past the period of having children: that the construction of this American will cannot be affected by the opinion of any English counsel, as it must be judged of solely by the laws of America; that Gordon, &c., as of making a will of property situate in a different country from that of their domicil. This cannot be the law of any civilized country. We contend that the personal representative must be ascertained by the lex domicilii.

---

* The rest of the case related to subsequent transactions between John and Mary Brown, and had no bearing whatever on the point of domicil.

On the question of domicil the appellants cited The Harmony, 2 Robinson, 324; Ann. 1 Dod. 221; 2 Dyer, 165 b. Campbell v. French, 3 Ves. 323; Sawer v. Shute, 1 Anstr. 63; Scott v. Swartz, 2 Com. 677; Pipon v. Pipon, Ambler, 25, 799, ed. 1828. Potter v. Brown, 5 East, 131; Anstruther v. Chalmers, 2 Sim. 1; Re Ewing, 1 Tyrwhitt, 91; 14 and 15 Hen. 8, c. 4.

---

representative of Brown, is accountable for sums drawn by him as attorney of Mary in virtue of this American settlement."

Notes of Judgment in the Second Division of the Court of Session.

May 27, 1825.—Lord Justice Clerk. Had there been no proceeding in America, the proper course would have been to ascertain what the law of that country was: and as that was the place where the deed was executed, it should be regulated by the law of that country and of that place. As the Courts there had decided in Miss Brown's favour, and the trustees had produced no evidence of a reversal of that decision, I have no difficulty in adhering to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

Lord Robertson. I agree with Lord Eldin and Lord Alloway, and the pursuer; and indeed all parties agree that the fee of this legacy is vested simply and absolutely in Mary Brown. No satisfactory answer is made to her assertion that the settlement was regularly brought before an American Court, who decided in her favour.

Lord Pitmilly. I think the decree is quite decisive.

Lord Alloway. I agree with your Lordships that this case was decided in the most formal and regular manner in 1816. The decree of this foreign Court is completely established. The judgment was pronounced in 1816, but they never attempted to bring the sentence again under the review of the American Court.

The reasons for the appellants, with reference to the interlocutor of the 14th of December, 1824, state: "They do not know how the meaning of a foreign instrument can be said to be obvious to a Scotch Court, when its meaning is disputed and all foreign evidence upon the subject is excluded. Words may have one meaning when read by the law of one country, and another meaning when read by the law of another country. Accordingly the better practice of the Court of Session has always been to treat the law of a foreign country as a fact, and let it be proved by professional opinions. This was done in the cases of Robertson, of Trotter, and of Murray: all of these questions turned upon the construction which the law of England applied to words used in wills executed in India; and if their mere obviousness in common language had been held sufficient, no inquiry would have been necessary." They then proceeded to deny that there was any legal evidence before the Court of the American decree; that it was made in the absence of John Brown, and the mere fact of decreeing the money to be paid to Mary Brown, who had no children, without security, did not decide that she was entitled to it absolutely.

On the other hand, the printed reasons for the respondents stated: "All inquiry upon the construction of the American will was wholly incompetent and irrelevant, and no defence against this action arose from the terms of that will. The fee of the legacy was clearly vested in Mary Brown. It was indeed maintained in the Court below that however plain the construction might appear to the judges, they were not entitled to form an opinion, because the meaning of the will ought to be determined by the law of the country where it was executed. The question is merely one of intention, and not one depending upon any technicalities of law. If there had been any difficulty in the construction, this would have been only determined by the opinion of American lawyers, as by the argument maintained on the other side, the law of America must form the rule: and an opinion of a Virginia lawyer, in opposition to an English lawyer, was given, that Mary Brown was entitled to the legacy in fee, subject only to the contingency of her having children. It was unnecessary, however, to enter into any discussion as to what the American law might be, as that law was expressly declared by the American Court itself."

In the foregoing case the deceased, though of Scotch birth, had clearly abandoned his forum originis entirely and for ever. It did not appear that he ever visited or contemplated a return to Scotland; his property was all in America or England; he had none either real or personal in Scotland. The will describes him as of Virginia,

The Court mentioned the following cases:—Bell v. Reid, 1 M. and S. 726; Adam v. Kerr, 1 B. and P. 360; Alves v. Hodgson, 7 T. R. 241: and that there were several cases in bankruptcy.(a)[1]

[461] In reply.

Feb. 4, 1831.—The King's advocate and Mr. Serjeant Stephen.(a)[2] The cases from the Admiralty Reports merely apply to national character as relating to commercial purposes. The case of Ewing has reference only to the statute law, and would apply equally to temporary residence as to domicil. Hog v. Lashley was not relied on in the Court below as a case in point: no facts are set forth; it did not relate to the validity but only to the construction of a will; it is of no weight. None of the other cases cited on the other side bear with any stringency on the point. The law of no country prevails out of its territory unless by comity, Voet, lib. i. t. 4, pars 2, and this comity does not apply universally but partially; not to immoveables nor against a positive law. Huber de conflictu legum, lib. i. t. 3. Therefore it does not apply to this case; for money in the funds has been considered in the nature of im-[462]-moveables; thus by 3 G. 4, c. 9, s. 2, the dividends of these funds are secured on the consolidated fund which by 56 G. 3, c. 98, s. 1, includes the land-tax; s. 13, however, provides that parties shall be possessed thereof as of a personal estate devisable as and makes no allusion whatever to his connexion with Scotland or any other country than America; except that the parties benefited are all Scotch, it has no reference whatever to Scotland: it was not executed in the Scotch forms, but he had in its execution adopted the formalities required by the law of America. It was executed there—was proved there—was principally to operate on property there. To construe the will therefore by the law of America was to construe it in conformity not only with the presumed or probable, but with the almost certain, intention of the testator, and was to follow that law which the deceased himself had adopted. The validity of the will was not in any way in question, and the decision of a competent court in a suit to which both appellant and respondent were parties had been acquiesced in for ten years. There is no one circumstance, except perhaps the domicil in a foreign country, that can give it any material bearing on Stanley v. Bernes. In all other respects it is an infinitely weaker case than either that of Sir Charles Douglas, or of Anstruther v. Chalmers: in the former of which cases the death occurred in Scotland, and in the latter the deceased's intention to exclude Mrs. Lashley from her legitim was indisputable. Had a will, executed under such circumstances, and solely with reference to the laws of America, by a person thus domiciled in America, come before the Prerogative Court, it is conceived that Court would at no time have hesitated to follow the decision of an American Court pronouncing for or against the validity of the will. In such cases the Prerogative Court probably acts on the principle that the deceased, having chosen to impose on himself the formalities required by the lex domicilii, must adhere to them, in the same way that if a person by an attestation clause evinces an intention of having witnesses to a will of personalty, such will is primâ facie invalid without them. In both cases the deceased, having imposed them on himself, must adhere to formalities originally unnecessary.

---

(a)[1] See Montagu and Gregg's Bankrupt Laws, ed. 1827, vol. i. pp. 172, 3; 362-4; 427, 8; 503, 4; and the cases therein cited. Also see Selkrig v. Davies and Salt, 2 Dow (First Series), 230; 2 Rose, 98, 291, S. C. Bank of Scotland v. Cuthbert (1 Rose, 462)—characterized by Lord Eldon as a report indeed well worth looking at—2 Dow, 245. The principal authorities and cases are there commented upon. Ex parte Geddes, 1 Glynn and Jameson, 414. As to legacy duty, see Attorney-General v. Cockerell, 1 Price, 165. See also Pottinger v. Wightman, 3 Mer. 67; Doe v. Vardill, 5 B. and C. 438, and the dicta of Abbott, C. J., Holroyd, J., and Littledale, J., and the authorities cited. See also, relative to the law which governs the succession of personalty, Sir Leoline Jenkins' letter to Lord Arlington, the memorial of the French lawyers, and the reply of Sir L. J. on the conflicting claims to the personal estate of the Queen Mother (Henrietta, widow of Charles I.), who died intestate in France. Life of Sir L. Jenkins, vol. ii. pp. 663, 669: and Kent's Commentaries on American Law, vol. ii. p. 344, 5 (New York, 1827). He says: "Personal property is subject to that law which governs the person of the owner:" and cites Bynkershoek (Quæst. Jur. Priv. l. i. c. 16), adeo recepta hodie sententia est, ut nemo ausit contra hiscere.

(a)[2] Mr. Alderson having become a Judge of the Court of Common Pleas.

such: thus giving to all indiscriminately the privilege of devising it by less strict forms: why then should the testator, or even a natural-born Portuguese subject, be deprived of the privileges granted by this positive law? Except to effectuate the intentions of the parties (Voet, l. i. t. 4, pars 2), or to protect creditors, as in the cases in bankruptcy, the lex loci rei sitæ prevails, because there is nothing to counteract it; and there is no comity to a foreign law merely as such. In the case of Ewing effects in France were held not liable to the legacy duty. Why? by reason of their locality. In England, even in intestacy it is only the distribution which follows the lex domicilii. The succession, properly so called, that is, the representation, is governed by the lex loci rei sitæ. No notice is taken of foreign probates and administrations: but for any effects here an English representation is necessary. 11 Vin. Ab. tit. Executors, R. 3. Jauncey v. Seeley, 1 Vern. 397. Tourton v. Flower, 3 P. Wms. 369. Pipon v. Pipon, Ambler, 25.

At common law the goods of the intestate passed to the ordinary, and therefore the law of England governed as to the succession; and still that law governs the succession by effect of the statutes. In granting administration to a domiciled Scotsman where the half blood do not succeed, the Court could not exclude a brother by the half blood in favour of an uncle by the [463] whole blood: nor could it exclude the mother, who by the law of Scotland cannot succeed to her children, in favour of a brother. This shews that the representation is at all events to be governed by the English law, whether the Court of construction would hold the administrator cum test. ann. a mere trustee for the next of kin or not. It is a fallacy to say that if the next of kin is beneficially entitled by the law of Portugal, therefore of necessity he is entitled to the administration: for if the law of Portugal is to govern in all respects, no administration at all would be necessary; the effects would pass under the authority of the Portuguese law without the exercise of any authority here. It is a fallacy to say that because personal property is to be distributed according to the law of the domicil in cases of intestacy, therefore the validity of a will must be determined according to the same law. The true question is, was not the deceased testate in England? As the law of England must decide whether the property is real or personal (Voet, l. 5, t. 1) it must decide whether the person be testate or intestate. It is a fallacy to say that he cannot be testate in England and intestate in Portugal. It is clear he may be so in the case of immoveable property, and è converso, testate in Portugal and intestate in England. It is a fallacy to say that if the will be proved here, it is holding personal property local or governed by the lex loci rei sitæ: it is not the property that is to be governed, but the character of the instrument by which it is passed; and all the jurists say that that is not to be governed by the lex domicilii, but by the lex loci contractus, save that when executed in reference to another country it is governed by the law of that country. [464] Huberi Prælect. tom. 2, l. 1, t. 3, s. 5. Robinson v. Bland, Burr. 1077. A will is analogous to other alienations. Grotius de Jure Belli, l. 11, c. 6, s. 14. It would be strange if it were otherwise, because the law of execution of instruments is a mere rule of evidence. Heinec. Recitat. l. 11, t. x. s. 492. Voet, l. 28, t. 1, s. 3: or if rather a rule of solemnity, why should the comity of nations apply to exclude the intention of the party? It will apply to effectuate intention. Thus a will executed according to the forms required by the lex domicilii may be valid for the disposal of property in every part of the world: but is the converse necessarily true, that if not executed according to those forms it must be invalid? Is it not more reasonable that the party should have the option of determining whether he shall execute his will according to the lex loci rei sitæ or according to the lex domicilii? The same principle on which the law of domicil is said to prevail in intestacy, viz. presumed intention, would perhaps require that, primâ facie and in the absence of manifest intention on the part of the deceased to adopt the formalities required by the lex loci rei sitæ, the validity of a will should be determined by the lex domicilii: but the principle cannot apply where that presumption is negatived by clear and decisive evidence. If then these codicils had been executed according to the Portuguese forms, but not according to the English, they would have been proveable here; and on the same principle the present codicils should be proveable. The execution of these codicils at Madeira with reference to effects in England is the same as if it had taken place in London: and could it then be contended that they were not valid? It is not [465] the same case as if they had been accidentally conformable to English law: but here the intention was to pass English property in an English form; why is not this sufficient in a will as in the case of other instruments?

On 11th February, 1831, the Judges reversed so much of the decree of the Prerogative Court as pronounced for the third and fourth codicils and the addition to the third codicil, and decreed letters of administration (with the will and first two codicils) to John Stanley, the residuary legatee, and directed the costs to be paid out of the estate.

On a subsequent day it appeared that though all the other executors had renounced, Mr. Gordon—whose appointment under the first codicil, revoked by the third codicil, now revived owing to the invalidity of that third codicil—had not renounced; a decree issued, calling upon him to take or renounce probate, and the same having been served upon his agents in London, and personally upon himself at Madeira, and no appearance being given, the order of the 11th of February, 1831, remains unrescinded: and Mr. Stanley has, accordingly, taken the administration with the will and two codicils annexed.

[466] WYATT v. INGRAM. High Court of Delegates, 13th and 17th July, 1828; 7th, 8th, and 9th January, 1829.—Sentence of the Prerogative Court reversed, semble on the ground that the facts disclosed in evidence established capacity, and volition, and sufficiently rebutted the suspicion—arising from the relation of client and attorney subsisting between the testator and the executor and residuary legatee—and from the conduct of the latter.—A commission of review is not grantable, unless the Lord Chancellor be satisfied that the principles of law on which the Court decided were wrong, or that the facts were either misstated or misunderstood.—Where a will is impeached on the ground of fraud, the parties who seek to establish the will must remove or explain and so neutralize the facts out of which the suspicion arose.—The relation of client and attorney between a testator and the person benefited by his will excites suspicion.

[See note in Court below, 1 Hagg. Ecc. 384; 162 E. R. 621.]

From the judgment pronounced in this case in the Prerogative Court (1 Hagg. Ecc. 384) an appeal was prosecuted to the Delegates, where the cause was argued, before Littledale, J., Gaselee, J., Vaughan, B., Burnaby, Daubeny, Gostling, Addams, Blake, LL.D., by Dr. Lushington and Mr. Knight (with whom were Dr. Dodson and Mr. Thessiger), in support of the sentence: by the King's advocate, the Attorney-General (Sir J. Scarlett), Dr. Phillimore, and Mr. Follett contrà.

The Court adjourned till the 20th January, when the cause was again directed to stand over till the 8th July; on which day the Court, being equally divided in opinion, no sentence was pronounced.

12th, 14th, and 15th February, 16th June, 1831.—A commission of adjuncts having issued, the cause again came on for argument before the Judges above named, and before Parke, J. (K.B.), Bolland, B., Bosanquet, J.; and after hearing Dr. Lushington, Dr. Dodson, and Mr. Thessiger in support of the judgment, and counsel (as before) contrà, the Court reversed the sentence of the Court of Prerogative (17th June); decreed probate of the will and codicil to Wyatt, and the costs of the appeal out of the estate.(a)[1]

[467] Chancery, 25th, 26th, 27th, 28th and 31st January, 1832.—A petition, afterwards presented for a commission of review, was in the usual course referred to the Lord Chancellor: and the question was argued by Sir Edward Sugden and Dr. Lushington (with whom was Mr. Wakefield) in support of the application, and by the King's advocate and Mr. Follett contrà,(a)[2] the Lord Chancellor's judgment, after

(a)[1] The following were among the cases cited in support of the judgment:—Billinghurst v. Vickers, 1 Phill. 187. Paske v. Ollat, 2 Phill. 323. Barton v. Robins, 3 Phill. 455, n. Middleton v. Forbes (cited by the Court, 1 Hagg. Ecc. 395). Wells v. Middleton, 1 Cox, 112. S. C. 4 Bro. P. C. 245. Gibson v. Jeyes, 6 Ves. 266. Eagleton and Coventry v. Kingston, 8 Ves. 438. Wood v. Downes, 18 Ves. 120. Walmsley v. Booth, 2 Atk. 27. Saunderson v. Glass, ib. 297. Woodhouse v. Shipley, ib. 535. Webb v. Claverden, ib. 424. Ward v. Hartpool, 3 Bligh, 471. Hatch v. Hatch, 9 Ves. 292. Watt v. Grove, 2 Sch. and Lef. 502. Sheppard's Touchstone, 406.

(a)[2] In addition to the cases cited in the Delegates, the following were quoted on the same side:—Wright v. Proud, 13 Ves. 138. Pitcher v. Rigby, 9 Price, 79. Segrave v. Kirwan, 1 Beatty, 157. Mountain v. Bennet, 1 Cox, 353.

referring to the cases of Matthews v. Warner, 4 Ves. 186, Goodwin v. Giesler, ib. 211, n., Ex parte Fearon, 5 Ves. 633, and Eagleton and Coventry v. Kingston, 8 Ves. 438, for the principles on which such applications were to be considered, was in substance as follows:—"Then were there in this case any such questions of law, or had any of the facts been overlooked or misstated, or misunderstood? From the elaborate judgment which had been pronounced by the Judge in the Court below, by whom the case had been first decided, it was obvious that scrupulous attention had been paid to every part of the case. He had found, on examining the facts, that they amounted to a case of suspicion, and he had therefore called for a greater degree of proof on the other side, additional evidence in proportion to such suspicion, in order to clear up or remove the effect of that suspicion. In cases of wills impeached on the ground of [468] fraud it was incumbent on the parties who sought to establish the will to remove or to explain, and so to neutralize, the facts out of which that suspicion arose. The learned Judge in the Court below had acted upon this, and had examined the evidence for the purpose of seeing whether the suspicion which unquestionably existed had been removed. He went through the facts of the case, and they could not be said to carry it further than a case of suspicion; but he thought fit, in the sentence he pronounced, to declare that the will was invalid. The Court of Delegates, pursuing the same course of investigation, were of opinion that, notwithstanding the suspicion, the balance of the testimony was sufficient to support the will, and they accordingly reversed the decree of the first learned Judge. The great admitted fact of suspicion arose from the circumstance that the testator and the person to be benefited by his will stood in the relation of client and attorney towards each other.(a) This point the Court of Delegates had considered, and they were in the result satisfied that the other circumstances of the case were strong enough to rebut the presumption which necessarily arose from that relation; and which presumption, if they had not believed it to be rebutted, would have given a contrary turn to their decision. They had considered the proofs which had been given of the state of the testator's mind, his capacity to make a will, [469] the singularity of his conduct, the eccentricity of his habits, and all those other circumstances relating to the testator personally, which were in the main admitted on both sides, although exaggerated by some witnesses, and attempted to be softened by others. They had not overlooked the evidence which went to shew the feelings the testator expressed towards some of the relatives, the little care and interest he evinced respecting his property, and the little knowledge he had as to some part of it, and having well investigated and weighed all these, and all the other facts of the case, the Court of Delegates came to the conclusion that the will in question was the will of the testator, and that it was not, as was alleged on the other side, the will of the Messrs. Wyatt."

The Lord Chancellor then, after stating that the Delegates had all the other facts before them—that unless he could be satisfied that the principles of law on which that Court decided were wrong, or that the facts were misstated, or misunderstood—it was impossible he could recommend the Crown to grant a commission of review; a doubt was not sufficient; he must be convinced that the Judges were clearly wrong; one sentence was the opinion of a single mind; the other of various minds of different professional habits and modes of thinking, proceeded, "If he were to pronounce upon the evidence, to the whole of which he had attended, and which he had weighed with the most scrupulous care, all that he could say of it was that it had in some respects tended to raise doubts in his mind which had not been removed by any thing he had heard; but even with the existence of those doubts, and after giving to the evi-[470]-dence on either side the full value to which it was entitled, he could not bring himself to any other conclusion than this, that if he had been one of the Judges of the Court of Delegates, he should in all probability have nevertheless joined them in the sentence which they had pronounced." His Lordship then adverted to the evidence (and to the observations tending to take off the effect of that evidence) of the factum, particularly that of Mr. Adlington—of declarations in favour of Wyatt, and of the illness of Wyatt's father to account for his non-production as a witness: and proceeded, "These had, it appeared, all been discussed before the Court of Delegates; the doubts arising from such facts, and the difficulties occasioned by the conflicting evidence on various parts of the case, had all been weighed, and considered, and decided upon by that Court. His Lordship did not therefore feel himself authorized to say that there had been any miscarriage before the Delegates, or that any part of the case had been so overlooked as to render any further inquiry or further deliberation necessary. . . . Looking to the conduct of the parties after the execution of the will, it was perfectly natural and perfectly reasonable to question the circumstances under which the will was executed: but this conduct, as well as all the other facts connected with the case, had their due share of consideration, and formed one of the grounds on which the Court of Delegates had exercised their judgment. For these reasons, then, and acting upon the authority of the cases to which he had adverted, he should feel it to be his duty to tender his advice to his Majesty against granting the commission prayed; and should make his report, adopting, with a few exceptions, the [471] language of Lord Eldon's certificate in Eagleton v. Coventry. It would have been more satisfactory to him if he had ascertained that he had any power to interpose, as to costs, in favour of the parties by whom this application was made. If he should find, upon further examination and inquiry, that he had any power to deal with that question, he should take it into his consideration."

(a) See Paine v. Hall, 18 Vesey, 475; referring to the case of Hicks v. Parr, before Buller, J., at Winchester Assizes, 1789, cited by Lord Eldon in Trimlestown v. Lloyd, 1 Bligh, 449, 458, 476. (S. C. 1 Dow, N. S. 85) and in Walker v. Stephenson, 3 Esp. 284, and by counsel, 4 Esp. 51, and noticed by Buller, J., in Revett v. Brahan, 4 T. R. 497.

On a subsequent day the Lord Chancellor stated that on investigation he was convinced that he had no authority on the question of costs.

TYRRELL AND HARDING v. MARSH. High Court of Delegates, 11th, 12th, 13th, 14th and 15th January, 1830.

This was an appeal from the sentence of the Prerogative Court (see 2 Hagg. Ecc. p. 48), and the cause was argued by the King's advocate and Dr. Addams for Mr. Marsh; by Mr. Campbell, Dr. Lushington, and Mr. Skirrow for Mr. Tyrrell; and by Mr. Brougham, Dr. Phillimore, and Mr. Follett for Mr. Harding.

The Court, consisting of Littledale, J., Parke, J., Bolland, B., and Burnaby, Daubeny, Gostling and Blake, LL.D., gave no sentence.

4th February, 1832.—A commission of adjuncts issued, when the parties having entered into a compromise, the sentence was reversed by consent.

[472] HIGGS v. HIGGS. Arches Court, Mich. Term, 2nd Session, 1830.—In an allegation of faculties the amount of capital embarked, or the particulars of partnership concerns, is not to be set forth, but only the income.

This was a suit of divorce, brought by letters of request from Leicester: the present question respected the admission of an allegation as to the husband's faculties to aliment his wife.

The King's advocate in opposition.

Addams contrà.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is a suit brought by the wife for separation by reason of cruelty and adultery. A libel, charging both, was given in on the first session of Easter Term, 1830: no defensive allegation having been given in, publication passed; and the cause is ready for hearing. An allegation of faculties however has now been brought in, and it is desirable that it should be answered, because a constat of the property may be material if the wife should be ultimately entitled to a sentence.

The first article pleads that Higgs and Smith are partners in a hosiery business, and as lace merchants; that they employ one hundred persons; that their annual returns are 14,000l., and that their income from the business is 1000l., of which Higgs is entitled to one moiety.

[473] The Court is always especially cautious not to require a disclosure of partnership concerns or matters of business and trade; the only material circumstance is the amount of income. The first article therefore, in pleading the number of persons employed and the amount of the annual returns, is objectionable, and may be injurious to the interests of the partner. The wife will take all the benefit to which she is entitled, by stating the income and that the husband is entitled to a moiety. If improper or insufficient answers are given, the wife will have the opportunity of examining the partner; but it is not at all necessary for her to have these details set out.

For the same reasons the second article, which pleads the capital embarked by the partners and that the husband is entitled to a moiety, is objectionable; and it is unnecessary, because the income has been already stated, and it is on that the alimony must be calculated.

The sixth article also, which pleads that she is unable to set forth the stock in trade and the debts due, is objectionable on the same grounds.

It is from forbearance to the partner and not to the husband that the Court requires these articles to be reformed. If the husband shall not fully and fairly disclose his income, then the wife may examine witnesses.

Allegation reformed.

[474] BIRNIE v. WELLER AND ELLIOTT. Arches Court, Hilary Term, By-Day, 1831. —Where the person first elected churchwarden had on payment of a fine been excused, a person elected in his place at the same vestry-meeting is bound to serve, unless some exemption be shewn.

This was an appeal from a sentence of the Commissary (a) of the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's, where it was a suit, at the instance of two parishioners, calling on Alexander Birnie to take upon himself the office of churchwarden of the parish of St. Helen, Bishopsgate. At a vestry on the 15th of April, 1830, Mr. Birnie was declared duly elected as junior churchwarden, and was so returned at the visitation; but he declined to take the office on the ground that another person, John Hodgson, had been first chosen and was excused on paying a fine, which Mr. Birnie contended was not legal, and consequently that his subsequent election was invalid. The vestry books were before the Court: and on the 15th April were the entries following:—"1830. In nomination of under churchwarden, J. Hodgson and A. Birnie; and Mr. Hodgson was declared duly elected. Whereupon the vestry clerk having informed the vestry that Mr. Hodgson requested to fine for the office, a motion was made and seconded to that effect, and carried. And in his place A. Birnie and P. Millard were put in nomination, and Mr. Birnie declared duly elected." In support of allowing Mr. Hodgson to exempt himself by paying a fine, such was alleged to have been the custom of the parish, and by the vestry books it appeared that the practice had prevailed at least for 100 years, and the fines were invariably applied in aid of the poor or church rate. A series of instances were adduced; among others that Birnie had, in [475] 1818, fined when chosen sidesman. It was admitted on the part of Mr. Birnie that there had been such a custom, but it was alleged that the custom was bad and contrary to law.

The proceedings were by act on petition and affidavits. It did not appear that the fine was regarded as an exemption beyond one year.

Phillimore for the appellant. A pecuniary fine is no legal exemption from serving the office of churchwarden: if admitted it would lead to the office being served by indigent and improper persons. The practice is long subsequent to the time of legal memory.

Addams contrà. The fine does not operate as a legal defeasance: and the usage has never prevailed so as to drive the parish to elect improper persons.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The question is whether the parish could not release Mr. Hodgson from serving. There has been in this parish a custom to excuse for above 100 years, and though the Court may not approve of the practice of fining, for it is liable to abuse, is there any authority to shew that the vestry has not the power to excuse a person once chosen? By mere election the office is not full; for as soon as the election is notified to the person chosen, he may shew that he is in such a state of health as to be unable to discharge the duties of the office, or that he is going abroad, and that it would [476] be more convenient to him and advantageous to the parish that he should serve in another year. I know of no authority to the effect that because a vestry first fixes upon one person and subsequently sees some good and reasonable cause, such as ineligibility, poverty, or ill health, to excuse him, it may not rescind that election and proceed to a new election. Nor do I know of any authority that because the vestry has, even for some bad reason, excused the individual first fixed upon, a proper person, subsequently chosen at the same meeting, is not duly elected nor liable to serve.

In the present case the vestry met in order to elect some one as churchwarden; and they finally elect Mr. Birnie. The question whether if after Mr. Hodgson's election the vestry had been dissolved, and on a subsequent day he had applied to be excused, another vestry meeting would not have been necessary in order to proceed to a new election, is not raised in this case. Nor is it necessary for the Court to go the length of deciding that the payment of a fine is a legal exemption. The practice might lead to many inconveniences. But the acceptance of the fine is discretionary with the vestry; and if any inconvenience arises from the practice, it is in the power of the vestry to stop it. There may, however, be instances where the practice is beneficial; where the vestry may have selected a fit person, but on consideration and on cause shewn may prefer accepting a fine for the advantage of the parish, and so exempt the individual first elected. Such an exemption, however, cannot render a subsequent election of another person void; and in the present instance it is not Mr. Hodgson who comes [477] forward to claim an exemption by paying the fine, but it is Mr. Birnie who claims exemption on a denial of the vestry's power to excuse Mr. Hodgson. I wish it should be distinctly understood that I do not determine or say any thing as to the legality of the practice of fining: but without expressing any approbation of the system, it is sufficient for me to decide, that as the vestry has chosen Mr. Birnie, and as no ineligibility nor exemption has been shewn, that he is bound to undertake the office. I must therefore affirm the decree.

(a) Sir Herbert Jenner—King's advocate.

On costs being pressed, the Court said the parties instituting the suit are the former churchwardens; and though in the hope of promoting the harmony of the parish the Court might not, on its own motion, feel disposed to give costs, yet if pressed, it is bound to allow the costs of appeal. It is a very different matter in the first and in the second instance.

Decree affirmed, with costs of appeal.

LLOYD AND CLARKE v. POOLE. Arches Court, Easter Term, 2nd Session, 1831.—On appeal in a pew cause from condemning churchwardens in costs, held, 1st. That giving or refusing costs is not a matter absolutely unappealable; though such appeals, especially for trifling sums, are much to be discouraged. 2d. That an appeal is perempted by doing any subsequent act in furtherance of the sentence, viz. attending taxation of costs. 3d. That churchwardens were properly condemned in costs where the party proceeded against in substance succeeded, and the suit was rendered necessary by their undue suppression of information.—If a party does acts in furtherance of a sentence, he bars his right of appeal.—To avoid defeating substantial justice the Court will, as far as it properly can, disregard mere form.—Churchwardens are entitled to protection if they proceed fairly; if not, they are peculiarly responsible to the Court.

On appeal.

This was, originally, a pew cause promoted against the churchwardens of the parish of Leominster, by a parishioner of, and owner or occupier of a messuage or tenement in, that parish: and the Judge [478] of the Consistorial Court of Hereford having decreed "that the churchwardens had not done their duty in neglecting to seat the complainant, and therefore condemned them in costs," they appealed.

Addams for the appellants.

Dodson for the respondent.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This question comes on in the form of an act on petition extending a protest. The proceedings were originally instituted in the Consistory Court of Hereford in December, 1828, by Mrs. Poole, widow, against Lloyd and Clarke, churchwardens of Leominster, to allot a sufficient number of sittings in the parish church for the accommodation of herself and family. No mention was in the first instance made of her tenants. In the course of the proceedings the churchwardens exhibited the parish books: by those books it appeared that Mrs. Poole was entitled to more seats than she had previously been allowed to occupy. Her proctor declared that she would be satisfied with the accommodation set forth in the books, and discontinued the proceedings; and the Court on the 8th of April, 1830, condemned the churchwardens in the costs to which Mrs. Poole had been put by the proceedings. A bill of costs was accordingly brought in: the proctor for the churchwardens attended the taxation, but afterwards alleged he had previously appealed, having protested of a grievance at the time of the sentence and entered a protocol. The costs were [479] taxed at 10l. 17s.; an inhibition has been taken out; an appearance under protest given, and the facts are now disclosed in an act on petition; and as the matter is so trifling, it was desirable to bring it forward in this simple and summary manner.

It is, I think, clear that the only appeal is from the condemnation in costs, the whole of which amount to 10l. 17s. Yet, trifling as it is, several points may arise. First, whether an appeal lies from costs alone. Secondly, whether the party has not perempted his appeal by his subsequent acts. Thirdly, whether the Judge did wrong in giving costs.

The first point, whether an appeal will or will not lie from costs alone, has been occasionally discussed in these Courts. There are dicta both ways; and perhaps different rules in different jurisdictions: and it is rather to be collected that in the Ecclesiastical Courts at least such matters are not absolutely unappealable: and I can by no means go the length of holding that under no circumstances can there be an appeal either from giving or from withholding costs. The costs of the suit are, in some cases, the only means of enforcing the act to be done, or of correcting the offence committed; as, for instance, the suspension ab ingressu ecclesia would be no correction of a person who had violated the sanctity of the place and disturbed the service of the church. I cannot therefore hold that in no case will an appeal lie from giving costs or from refusing them.

In the case of Barnes v. Jeffe, Arches, M. T. 1779, the proceedings were similar to the present. The party appeared under protest, alleging, 1st, that there was no appeal from costs; 2dly, that the appeal was perempted. I have only the [480] case prepared by the proctor for his counsel, but have no note of the judgment. The Court dismissed the appeal: but whether on the ground that no appeal lay, or that it was perempted, or that the amount was too small, does not appear; therefore I do not rely upon it.

The case of Collier and Drinkwater v. Pearson (Arches, 4 Sess. T. T. 1798) was a suit against the churchwardens to exhibit their accounts; and was an appeal from the refusal of costs. Sir William Wynne held that an appeal would lie; and having gone through the facts of the case, said "that he thought the parishioners having a right to have the account produced, there was no ground for costs prior to the production of those accounts; but having continued the cause afterwards they were liable to the costs from that time." He therefore reversed the sentence quoad those costs.(a) On the other hand, appeals from [481] costs alone are much to be discouraged; especially when they are of trifling amount and evidently vexatious. This is the doctrine of Courts of Equity. In Owen v. Griffiths (1 Ves. sen. 250) the marginal note runs thus: "The rule, that no appeal for costs merely, not to be strictly adhered to, if a sound distinction can be made." And Lord Hardwicke, in the course of his judgment in that case, says, "Yet if it were to be laid open generally, that an appeal might be for costs, it would cause that general inconvenience to which a particular inconvenience ought to give way." In Wirdman v. Kent (1 Bro. C. C. 141) the case of Owen v. Griffiths was adverted to and sanctioned, and a further case before Lord Northington is referred to in a note. The result of the cases is that there is no absolute rule; that the question is mixed up with and must depend on the whole circumstances: but that such appeals are much to be discouraged. In general, in these Courts costs are mixed up with some question of the merits, some act decreed to be done or correction inflicted. Here, however, was no act in the principal cause to be done by the churchwardens: the object of the proceeding was attained, and the whole sum in dispute is 10l. 17s., so that a more frivolous ground of appeal never occurred.

---

(a) In the argument in Collier v. Pearson a doubt was thrown out whether the Court could entertain an appeal from costs; but no authority nor case was cited to that precise effect. The case from 1 Brown C. C. 141, was referred to, as was also the case of Colley and Blandon v. Clark and Page, Arches, Hil. T. 1774; but in the latter case the appeal was from the rejection of an allegation as well as from a condemnation in costs. On the other hand, the case of Luke v. Whittaker was relied on. It was originally a suit promoted in the Archidiaconal Court of Cornwall by Whittaker, a clergyman, against Luke, a parishioner, for going out of church in a disorderly manner during the time of divine service. The Court pronounced the articles proved, and gave costs, which, on a subsequent day, were taxed at 1s. From this taxation Whittaker appealed to the Arches; and Dr. Calvert was of opinion that costs ought to have been given, and that having been given, they should have been taxed as usual; and therefore reversed the sentence and gave full costs. The Delegates (1783) again reversed the sentence of the Arches, not on the ground that costs were not the subject of appeal; but because the suit was frivolous, and that 1s. was sufficient.

Secondly, whether the appeal was not perempted. Costs were decreed on the 8th of April: the appeal was not entered till the 21st of April, the last day but one on which it could be entered; and it was then merely a protocol brought, it would seem, neither to the notice of the party nor of the Court. The proctor of the appellant in [482] May attends the taxation of costs, which is contributing to the carrying of the sentence into effect; and it is held that if a party does acts in furtherance of a sentence he thereby bars his right of appealing, and such act amounts to a desertion of the appeal. It is here, however, said that this attendance was given with an understanding that it was not to prejudice the prosecution of his appeal: but though he might so understand it, it is positively denied that such was the understanding of the other party; and no entry of any such reservation was made on the record.

But thirdly: did the Judge do wrong? Because if substantial justice was likely to be defeated, the Court would, as far as it properly could, disregard mere points of form. The affidavit states that Mrs. Poole applied for further sittings, being only allowed to occupy half a certain pew. It is not alleged that she had sufficient accommodation in that half pew for herself and family; it is not pretended that, in answer to the application by her solicitor, the churchwardens apprized her that by the parish books she was entitled to other sittings. Mrs. Poole, being a female, cannot be presumed to be privy to what passes at vestries. She had therefore no means of enforcing further accommodation than by the institution of these proceedings. At last the churchwardens produce the books, and then for the first time she is apprized of these other sittings: being so apprized, she certifies that she is satisfied and discontinues further proceedings. I am of opinion, therefore, that the Judge did right in ordering the costs to be paid by the churchwardens: they rendered the suit necessary by neglecting sooner to inform Mrs. Poole of this further accommodation. Even if I had any doubt [483] as to the propriety of the sentence, I should unwillingly hold that such an appeal for so frivolous a sum was justifiable on the part of the parish officers, who are also the officers of the ordinary; they are entitled to protection if they proceed fairly and candidly: but if unfairly, they are peculiarly responsible to the Court The appeal is vexatious and must be dismissed with costs.

The form of the minute must be that the Court pronounces for the protest; and, on the merits disclosed, affirms the decree with costs.

JAMES AND STANLEY v. KEELING. Arches Court, Trinity Term, 4th Session, 1831. —Churchwardens and their predecessors, though constantly acting for a whole township consisting of three districts, were uniformly described as churchwardens of A., the principal place in the township and where the chapel stood. In a suit for subtraction of church-rate, the Court reversed, with costs in both instances, a sentence sustaining a protest that the defendant, occupying lands in the township, but not in the district in which A. was situate, was not legally sued by churchwardens thus described.

This was a cause of church-rate, originally instituted in the Consistorial Court of Lichfield, by the promoters described as "the churchwardens of Bloxwich, within the foreign of Walsall, in the county of Stafford, against Keeling, a farmer within the said foreign." Keeling appeared under protest, alleging "that the parish of Walsall is divided into the borough of Walsall and foreign of Walsall, and the foreign is subdivided into the liberties or districts of Wood-end, Towns-end, and Coldimore; of Great and Little Bloxwich and Harden; and of Shelfield and Walsall-wood; that Keeling was resident within the district of Shelfield and Walsall-wood, and had never owned nor occupied lands or tenements within Great or Little Bloxwich or Harden, and therefore had not been legally cited." For the promoters it was alleged "that the township of the borough and the township of the foreign of Walsall had each two churchwardens, that they (the promoters) were and are churchwardens of the foreign of Walsall [484] (within which are the liberties of Shelfield and Walsall-wood), though, like their predecessors, having been sworn in as churchwardens of Bloxwich—the principal place within the foreign and where the parochial chapel is situate —they have been described in the citation as churchwardens of Bloxwich: that their predecessors, although sworn in as churchwardens of Bloxwich, were constantly deemed churchwardens of the foreign of Walsall; were uniformly so described in all resolutions and vestry-books both of the borough and foreign of Walsall, and have constantly collected rates over the whole borough; and that Keeling, who has for many years past been rated in all respects as in the present year, hitherto invariably paid." In reply it was alleged that the only question was whether Keeling had any rateable property within the liberty of Bloxwich, of which alone the promoters are described as churchwardens; that he, Keeling, was not liable to be proceeded against for non-payment of church-rates, except by the churchwardens of the parish of Walsall in their corporate capacity, or by the churchwardens of that portion of it called the foreign, and that the promoters ought to have been so described in the citation.

The Judge below dismissed the defendant with costs, and the churchwardens thereupon appealed to this Court.

The King's advocate and Phillimore for Keeling.

Addams contrà.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The only question is whether James and Stan-[485]-ley are churchwardens of the whole foreign. I am at a loss to understand how they are not, because both they and their predecessors having always acted for the whole foreign, the mere fact that they were sworn in and described as the churchwardens of Bloxwich (where the chapel of the foreign is) cannot restrict their office. I must concur in the remark made by counsel, that the objection is most frivolous, and raised apparently to harass the parish and defeat a lawful demand.

It is said that the party was anxious to try the right, but there is no right to try. The whole defence is an unfounded objection—a mere reliance on the want of a full description, the churchwardens being only described as churchwardens of Bloxwich instead of the foreign of Walsall. The description is quite sufficient in a civil suit, where such extreme formality is not required.(a) It is not like the case of a misnomer of a defendant when there may be some just ground for resistance, because in that case there would be no sufficient constat that the party cited was the proper party. I must repeat that the present is altogether a frivolous and vexatious opposition. I reverse the sentence and condemn the respondent in the costs in both Courts.

[486] THE OFFICE OF THE JUDGE PROMOTED BY BLISS v. WOODS. Arches Court, Trinity Term, By-Day, 1831.—A clerk cannot, under 7 and 8 G. IV. c. 72, s. 3, officiate, without consent of the incumbent of the parish, in a newly erected chapel, consecrated and endowed as a chapel of ease, unless the right of nomination has, by deed under seal, been previously declared to be in the endower.—Under the general law, the erection of a new public chapel (properly so called) requires the joint consent of patron, incumbent, and ordinary, and (generally) a compensation to future incumbents.—The whole cure of souls, and all the emoluments of a parish, belong, under the original endowment, to the incumbent and his successors, and vest in the existing incumbent by institution and induction.—The earlier church-building acts, 58 G. III. c. 45, 59 G. III. c. 134, 3 G. IV. c. 72, carefully protect the rights and interests of patrons and incumbents, especially existing incumbents, and 5 G. IV. c. 103, only allows a departure from that principle for a limited time, and under very special circumstances. Semble, that the sole object of 7 and 8 G. IV. c. 72, authorizing the church-building commissioners to declare the right of nomination to be in the endower, with lands or money in the funds, of a chapel, without compensation made to the incumbent, was to encourage such endowments, and that such chapel must (save as to the compensation) be built either in conformity to the general law, or under the provisions of the earlier church-building acts.

[Applied, MacAllister v. Bishop of Rochester, 1880, 5 C. P. D. 204.]

By letters of request.

This was a suit brought by the Rev. George Bliss, incumbent of the parish of Funtington, Sussex, against the Rev. George Woods of Sennicots in the same parish, touching and concerning his soul's health, &c. &c., and more especially "for (a) Even in a penal action, if a parish is styled by its popular and well-known name it is sufficient. Williams v. Burgess, 3 Taunt. 127. See also Burbidge v. Jakes, 1 B. and P. 225. Kirtland v. Pounsett, 1 Taunt. 570. Steel v. Smith, 1 B. and A. 94, and 9 G. IV. c. 15.

publicly reading prayers, preaching, administering the Holy Sacraments, and performing other ecclesiastical duties and divine ceremonies of the Church of England in a certain building (howsoever consecrated) newly erected, and never before used for the celebration of divine service, situate at Sennicots aforesaid, under colour of a certain licence as pretended from the Bishop of Chichester, by him the said G. Woods unlawfully obtained."

The first article pleaded that by the laws and constitutions ecclesiastical the right of patronage to a chapel of ease is, in default of other lawful patron, in the incumbent of the mother church; and that no minister of the church can lawfully officiate therein without being nominated by such incumbent, or such other person having the right of nomination, to the diocesan for his licence, and without such licence thereupon first duly had; and that a minister officiating within any parish "not being duly licensed thereto by the diocesan, contrary to the injunctions or without the leave [487] and consent of the incumbent of such parish, is liable for so doing to ecclesiastical censures."

2. That Bliss was a minister in holy orders, and having been nominated by the Dean and Chapter of Chichester to the perpetual curacy of Funtington was duly licensed and admitted thereto, and now is incumbent of the perpetual curacy of the said parish.

3. Exhibited his licence.

4. That in 1829 the chapel in question was built and fitted up, and on the 3rd of December, 1829, was (howsoever) consecrated as a chapel of ease to Funtington.

5. That from the time of such consecration, and up to the time of the citation, Woods officiated therein under a pretended licence from the diocesan, "unlawfully obtained, without being nominated thereto by Bliss, or any other person having by law the right of nomination thereto," on all the Sundays in December, 1829, in 1830, and in January and February, 1831, "contrary to the injunctions and without the leave and consent of Bliss."

The 6th, 7th, and 8th were formal articles.

On the 4th Session of Easter Term these articles came on to be debated.

The King's advocate in objection. Though the nomination is primâ facie in the incumbent, yet this chapel was built under 7 and 8 Geo. IV. c. 72. However, the most convenient course would be for the Court to suspend the admission of the articles till a responsive allegation is brought in. The suit is to try a civil right, and [488] that cannot be tried on the admission of the articles, because all the facts are not before the Court.

Per Curiam. How can I suspend the articles? Mr. Woods may immediately give in an allegation loco responsi. There is no additional convenience in going out of the usual course.

The Court finally admitted the articles on the understanding that no witnesses should be examined for the present, and that a responsive allegation should be brought in.

The first article of this responsive allegation pleaded the 7 and 8 Geo. IV. c. 72, s. 3.(a)

2. That Mr. Baker, at his own expense and with the sanction and approbation of the bishop, and with the knowledge and privity of Bliss, built the chapel and endowed it to the satisfaction of the commissioners, with a permanent provision; and by the deed of endowment, dated 12th November, 1829 (previously approved by the said commissioners), the chapel, &c., and the stock in the public funds for the endowment,

(a) "And be it further enacted, that when any person or persons shall, to the satisfaction of the said commissioners, endow any chapel built or hereafter to be built by such person or persons with some permanent provision in land or monies in the funds exclusively, or in addition to the pew rents or other profits arising from the said chapel, such endowment to be settled as the commissioners shall direct, it shall be lawful for them to declare that the right of nominating a minister to the said chapel shall for ever thereafter be in the person or persons building and endowing the said chapel, his, her, or their heirs and assigns, or in such person or persons as he, she, or they shall appoint, and notwithstanding no compensation or endowment may be made to or for the benefit of the minister of the church of the parish within which such chapel shall be built."

were vested [489] in the Bishop, Dean and Archdeacon of Chichester, and in Baker, his heirs and assigns, on the several trusts, &c. therein mentioned: that on 29th August, 1829, the commissioners, being satisfied with the endowment, through their secretary, intimated their readiness to declare the right of nomination to be in Baker, his heirs, &c., upon certain conditions, which were immediately complied with.

3. That on 3d December the bishop, having previously apprized Bliss of his intention, consecrated the chapel: that on 5th, Baker nominated Woods, and on 19th the bishop granted him his licence; that Bliss offered no objection to such consecration, nomination or licence; that Woods paid over all the sacrament money to Bliss, who received it with a knowledge that it had been collected in the chapel.

4. Exhibited the nomination and licence.

5. That in order formally to declare the right of nomination the commissioners, on 7th January, 1830, transmitted for Baker's approbation a draft deed of declaration, which had been previously prepared under their directions; and the same was returned approved by him: that the commissioners postponed from time to time affixing their common seal to such deed, being desirous that the same should be delayed until an explanatory statute had been obtained: that accordingly a bill was brought in in 10 G. IV., but the dissolution of Parliament stopped further proceedings: that in the first session of 1 W. IV. a bill passed the House of Lords, and Parliament was again dissolved.

6. That since the institution of this suit the commissioners' common seal was affixed to this [490] deed dated 10th May, 1831, and declaring the right of nomination to be in Baker.

7. That subsequent thereto Baker again nominated, and the bishop again (25th May, 1831) licensed, Woods.

8. Exhibited a copy of the deed of nomination and the second licence.

On the third session a further allegation on behalf of Mr. Bliss was brought in: it pleaded:

1. That though the chapel was erected with the privity of Bliss, he from the first at all times expressed his unqualified dissent to its erection and use, unless it should be under the entire control of himself, as incumbent of the parish, who by himself or his curate would officiate therein, and invariably refused that any person should officiate except on his nomination: and it exhibited copies of three letters from Bliss to Baker (marked A, B, C).

2. That though the bishop did apprize Bliss of his intention to consecrate, yet he verbally assured him that he was authorized so to do by the commissioners, by whom it was then asserted that all had been settled relative to the said chapel: that Bliss, thereby misled and erroneously conceiving thereon that his right as incumbent of the parish in respect to the chapel had wholly determined, offered no objection to the consecration nor to Woods' licence on the nomination of Baker; but that as soon as he was more correctly informed that all had not been settled, and that the commissioners had neither in fact declared, nor could by law declare, the right of nomination to be in Baker, the incumbent avowed his determination to seek redress, if not otherwise conceded, in [491] the Ecclesiastical Court; and exhibited a letter (D) from the bishop, and one (E) from the commissioners' secretary.(a)

(a) The letters referred to in Mr. Bliss' allegation were to the following effect:—

(A) January 2, 1826.—Mr. Bliss to Mr. Baker. Though Baker's communication of yesterday appeared rather an act of courtesy than as reporting the progress of any measures to effect the project he had in view, he lost no time in replying. After regretting that many were at a distance from church, he stated that the proposed remedy was so very partial as not to be put in competition with the evils which might result from its adoption, particularly as the residents of Sennicots had every facility of conveyance: but independent of this, the 5 Geo. IV. c. 103, requiring that twelve householders should certify to the bishop that there was not church accommodation for one-fourth of the parishioners, seemed to militate in letter and spirit against the projected erection, and was so inapplicable to Funtington as to offer a legal impediment: that the legislature seemed not to contemplate the convenience of inhabitants, but aware that an unnecessary division of a parish would be a disruption of that union which ought to subsist between the authorized minister and his people, only provided for cases of absolute necessity, where the want of accommodation in the

3. That Bliss consented to receive the sacra-[492]-ment money as alms collected in his parish for the poor; but informed Woods distinctly that such act was no compromise of the incumbent's rights; for that he altogether denied the legality of the nomination and licence.

4. That the whole population of Funtington [493] exceeds not 800, of all ages and both sexes: that there is church-room for 600 at one and the same time; and that no part of the parish is four miles from the church.

On the 4th Session of Trinity Term the two allegations came on to be debated.

Addams and Nicholl in objection. The charge laid in the articles is almost admitted by the allegation of the defendant, which denies neither facts nor law. The substance of the 2d and 3d article is, that on the 29th August, 1829, the commissioners intimated their readiness to declare the right of nomination, but, though they did not in fact declare it till after the articles in this case were admitted, on the 3d December, 1829, the bishop consecrated the chapel, and on the 19th licensed Mr. Woods on the nomination of Mr. Baker: and it is averred that both these acts, as well as the erection of the chapel, took place with the knowledge and privity of Bliss. But the correspondence completely proves that Mr. Bliss was always dis-parish church was so notorious as to render it a paramount duty to afford more. He wished some remedy could be devised which had not its concomitant evils; as for himself, he declined no labour which his parishioners might choose to impose upon him to meet their spiritual wants. The introduction of a second service on the Sunday had, in some measure, lessened the evil. The letter concluded with a compliment to the liberality of Mr. Baker's project.

---

(B) April, 1826.—From Mr. Bliss to Mr. Baker. After stating he had called several times upon the bishop by his desire without finding him at home, and his wish to remedy the inconvenience that Mr. Baker's family and others had sustained, he suggested that as one of the services of Funtington was a gratuitous service, and therefore transferable at pleasure to any part of the parish; and as his object in instituting it was the accommodation of his parishioners, there could be no impropriety in adopting that course which would best secure the original design: if, therefore, Baker thought it expedient to proceed in the erection of the projected chapel, he (Bliss) would gladly take the gratuitous discharge of its duties, and serve it alternately with the church: this would prevent the tax of endowment, and only required the concurrence of the patrons to render his voluntary act binding upon his successors.

(C) April, 1826.—From Mr. Bliss to Mr. Baker. To meet Baker's wish not to incommode the parishioners in general by a transfer of the second service, he (Bliss), though he did not think any one would complain, would most gladly embark in a third duty, opening the church on the Sunday evening as was the practice in the neighbouring village. He felt it incumbent upon him to be candid as to any delegation of the ministerial duty of the parish: Providence had allotted to him a sphere of clerical occupation, and he should be doing violence to his conscience by conceding, by any act of his own, the spiritual direction of any part, and thus voluntarily putting such direction out of his own control: he had made himself responsible for the charge, and felt that no dispensation of man could release him from his obligation whilst he had health and strength for the duties connected with them. Could he conscientiously resign any part of the charge to any independent control, he should be truly gratified in complying with Baker's proposition; but as his sense of duty imposed a restraint upon him, he trusted Baker would feel satisfied with the expedient suggested, as it met the object Baker had stated himself to have in view.

(D) 16th March, 1830.—From the bishop to Mr. Bliss. As he wished to avoid all discussion on a matter about which they differed so entirely, viz. the consecration, he declined any further correspondence on the subject: he had acted under the authority of the commissioners, and was perfectly satisfied that in what he had done he was authorized.

(E) From the commissioners' secretary to Mr. Bliss, 20th February, 1830. He had laid before the board a letter from Bliss, and acquainted him that the formal proceedings of the board must be postponed till their powers had been more defined by parliament; but that the board saw no reason to alter the opinion heretofore expressed upon the subject.

senting, though for a time he submitted in silence from an erroneous notion (which he entertained in common with, and in some degree received from, his diocesan) of the powers and of the acts of the commissioners under 7 and 8 Geo. IV. c. 72, passed while the discussion relative to this chapel was going on. Nothing, however, short of absolute consent would in such a case estop Mr. Bliss. Any appearance of acquiescence, proceeding, as it did, from misinformation, would want the essence of all consent —intention. The validity of that consecration and licence must [494] depend on the question whether Baker had a legal right to nominate; we impute no blame to the bishop, because if he acted illegally he so acted under a misconception of the law and of his duties.

The 5th, 6th, and 7th articles are singular enough, considering this is a defensive allegation; for they state that the commissioners postponed the execution of the deed of nomination from a doubt as to their powers; that two explanatory acts were brought in, but did not pass, and that since the institution of this suit the seal was affixed, and a new nomination and licence executed, thus virtually admitting that the case is not brought within the provision of 7 and 8 Geo. IV., and that the authorities under which Woods officiated at the times laid in the articles were invalid, inasmuch as, according to their own shewing, it was not till after the institution of this suit that the right of nomination was legally (if ever it was legally) given to Baker. They plead a sort of incipient consent; but even supposing the act of parliament did not require a formal deed, as by implication we contend it does, the commissioners, being a corporation, could only express such intention by an instrument under their common seal. 1 Bl. Com. 475. These three articles, then, amount, in effect, to an affirmative issue; and as far as respects the issue of the present suit, the defendant is out of Court.

But since the 7 and 8 Geo. IV. c. 72 has been pleaded in defence, and since the necessity of another suit may be prevented by the expression of the Court's opinion as to its construction, we will proceed to inquire whether, if the deed had been sealed prior to Woods' officiating, he would have been pro-[495]-tected by that statute; or, in other words, whether that statute, saying nothing in extension or limitation of the powers previously existing as to the building of chapels by individuals or otherwise, authorized the commissioners to declare the right of nomination to be in the endower, without consideration of the mode in which the chapel was built; and whether, if they issued such a declaration, the nominee of the endower had a right to officiate therein without consent of the incumbent of the mother church? The title and preamble of 7 and 8 Geo. IV. shew that this statute is to be taken in conjunction with the former acts. What then is necessary to the legal building of a chapel, meaning thereby not merely the construction of the fabric, but the erection of an edifice clothed with all the legal characters of a chapel? The consent of the patron, incumbent, and ordinary, and a compensation for future incumbents under the common law: Dixon v. Kershaw, 2 Ambler, 231; Farnworth v. Bishop of Chester, 4 B. & C. 555. Here no consent of the incumbent was given. The chapel then was not legally built under the common law. Do, then, the church-building acts legalize its erection? The first act is 58 Geo. III. c. 45, "for building additional churches in populous places;" the preamble points to and the enacting part, particularly ss. 13 and 15, provide for the same object: the act then enables the commissioners to procure additional accommodation in regard to parishes of 4000 inhabitants, with accommodation for not more than one fourth in the churches or chapels therein, or 1000 resident above four miles from any such church or chapel. The titles and preambles of 59 Geo. III. c. 134, 3 Geo. IV. c. 72, shew that the [496] objects of those acts are also limited to such parishes: the provisions then are quite inapplicable to the circumstances of Funtington, where the population is only 800, church-room for three-fourths, and no one resident four miles from the parish church.

The title and preamble of 5 G. IV. c. 103 are to the same effect: but ss. 5 and 9 depart in some degree from the principle; for, without reference to population, by s. 5, if twelve householders certify to the bishop, in writing, that there is not church accommodation for one-fourth of the inhabitants, and that they are willing by private subscription to erect or purchase a chapel, and to provide out of the pew rents a competent stipend; and by s. 9, if any member of the Church of England shall subscribe at least half jointly with the parishioners, who may be willing to raise the rest by rate, the bishop may, if he think fit, consent, after certain particulars are stated to him as to the number of free seats, a provision out of the pew rents for the preacher, for the other expenses of divine service, and the maintenance of the chapel: but no pew rents shall be taken nor service performed till the chapel is consecrated. These sections still only apply to parishes where there is an extreme want of accommodation, evidenced in one case by the certificate to that effect, and in the other by the inhabitants being willing to contribute part out of the rates.

Still the parish of Funtington does not come within either case provided for by this act. There is not want of accommodation for one-fourth of the inhabitants; nor, on the other hand, was the chapel built partly out of the rates. So that the church-building acts, prior to 7 and 8 Geo. IV. [497] c. 72, are not applicable to this chapel. The legality or illegality of the building, of the consecration, nomination, licence, and officiating subsequent to the sealing of the deed depends then on the construction to be put on the 7 and 8 G. IV. But though the previous acts may not apply to this case, they may aid in the construction to be put on 7 and 8 G. IV., by shewing the principles on which, and the spirit in which, the legislature proceeded. All the early church-building acts up to 5 G. IV. c. 103 had been cautious of invading the rights of incumbents, patrons, and ordinaries: they reserve to the existing incumbent the right of nominating in all cases without exception, and to future incumbents, in all cases where there is not an entire division of the cure into two distinct parishes and districts after the existing incumbency; in which latter case the patronage, with one single exception (3 G. IV. c. 72, s. 31), is given to the patron of the mother church. The 5 G. IV. c. 103, ss. 5, et seq. does seem in some degree to relax this principle—though, after giving the bishop a power which he did not before legally possess of consenting to the building, or of consecrating the chapel without other endowments than pew rents, it does not altogether overlook that the consents of the incumbent and patron were previously necessary to the building and consecration of the chapel, since s. 11 provides that the parties when they make application for the bishop's consent are to give notice in writing to the patron and incumbent, and the bishop shall not signify his consent within three months of the time that such notice has been given. After it has been so strongly held by different courts, and the former statutes have so [498] carefully maintained the principle inviolate, that the patron and incumbent must be consenting parties to all arrangements which interfere with their rights, some doubt may be entertained whether the legislature, by these general words, meant to dispense with the necessity of such consents, or only to provide that if, within three months, the parties did not express their dissent, they should be held to have consented. However, assuming that it is meant hereby to give the bishop the right, after hearing any objections from the patron and incumbent, to determine whether he shall notwithstanding proceed, it is only under very special circumstances, which do not apply to the present case, that the bishop after this notice has the power to declare the right of nomination for two turns to be in the individuals so purchasing or building: but by s. 9, if the chapel is built partly by rates, the incumbent of the parish shall have the right of nomination from the commencement, except if it be made a distinct church the original patron shall have that right.

These rights of patrons and incumbents having been thus carefully preserved, can the 7 and 8 G. IV. c. 72 intend at once to destroy them? The enactment to work such an effect must, we contend, be so clear as to admit of no other construction. Is such the case? We contend not; but that the object of that statute was two-fold. 1st. Upon a composition between the patron, bishop, and incumbent to legalize in any parish the consecration of a chapel with an endowment not in land, such endowments not before being legal save in particular parishes under the special provisions of 5 G. IV. c. 103, ss. 5, et seq. [499] 2dly. When the chapel was legally built, either with the consents required by the general law or under 5 G. IV. c. 103, and thus endowed, to permit the perpetual nomination to be given to a person other than the incumbent of the mother church without compensation to future incumbents; that is, when the chapel was permanently endowed with lands or money in the funds, and not merely with pew rents, to the satisfaction of the church-commissioners, they are allowed, in conjunction with the bishop, patron, and incumbent to do, without compensation for future incumbents, what those three individuals might have done with that compensation; or in the cases provided for by 5 G. IV., the commissioners might do perpetually what the bishop could have only done for two turns; but it does not give any additional power to individuals to build. As in this case the chapel was not legally built under the statutes, its legality must depend solely on the alteration made in the general law by 7 and 8 G. IV., which, dispensing in word with the necessity of a compensation to future incumbents, must be held to ratify and confirm the necessity of the joint consents. "Expressio unius exclusio est alterius," it in fact substitutes the approval of the commissioners for that compensation; but it leaves the matter of the consents required as it stood at common law. But, supposing that the church building commissioners had, without any previous enquiry, authority to declare the right of nomination to be in the endower, does it follow that the nominee has the right to officiate without the consent of the incumbent of the mother church? The incumbent having, by the general law, the exclusive cure of souls in the parish, [500] no minister of the Church of England, licensed or unlicensed, can, in a consecrated or unconsecrated chapel open for public worship, officiate without the incumbent's consent, Carr v. Marsh, 2 Phill. 198. Farnworth v. Bishop of Chester, 4 B. and C. 569. Duke of Portland v. Bingham (on final admission of articles before the Delegates), 1 Hagg. Con. 169, in notis. This consent, then, is independent of the right of nomination, for in the last case the chapel was proprietary, and the right of nomination was never pretended to be in the Duke of Portland or the perpetual curate. The incumbent has the right to refuse his pulpit to lecturers, endowed or unendowed, where the right of election is in the vestry or in trustees. Turton v. Reignolds, 12 Mod. 433. King v. Bishop of Exeter, 2 East, 462. There can be no difference between the use of a pulpit in a church and of a chapel; for the principle is that the whole cure of souls, being in the incumbent, he has a right to see that no improper doctrine is preached in his parish, per Bayley, J., 4 B. and C. 570. There appears no distinction between an endowed lectureship and a newly endowed chapel; if in one case the will of the founder gives the nomination to one set of persons, and the law the right of consent to another, there seems to be no reason why in the other case, the right of nomination being taken from the incumbent by statute, his right of consent should not remain. Might not, under a composition, the right of nomination be given expressly subject to the consent of the incumbent for the time being to every new appointment? and would not this be the effect of a statute affirmatively placing the right of nomination elsewhere? The statute in short does not allow duty [501] to be performed in the parish without the incumbent's consent, any more than it does in the diocese without the bishop's licence.

The mischiefs to be let in by the construction for which Mr. Woods must contend are manifest. The commissioners would be bound, without further inquiry than as to the sufficiency of the endowment, to declare the right of nomination: the incumbent would still have the cure of souls of the whole parish, and of every part of it (for the commissioners have no power to carve out for the minister of this new chapel a particular district); while doctrines at variance with those inculcated by the regular pastor might be delivered in this chapel without his control. Schisms, heart-burnings, and animosities would be the result, and infinite mischief accrue to the interests of the church and of religion. If, then, the construction of this act admits of any doubt, if, by interpreting it one way, such a sweeping change in the discipline of the church, hitherto carefully preserved, will be effected, while by another, at least equally obvious, a more limited and reasonable operation can be given, the Court will lean to that construction which, by supporting the general policy of the law, preserves to the incumbent the exclusive control of the spiritual concerns of his parish.

The King's advocate contrà. There is no admission of the charges of the articles in the allegation of the defendant: the case is brought forward to obtain a knowledge of the law, not to punish Woods if he has acted illegally.

Per Curiam. Will the opinion of the Court in this case de-[502]-cide that question, or can the Court be called upon to pronounce an opinion on the law, unless the facts in the case raise it? Here are matters alleged after the offence charged was committed, and is the Court to enter upon the consideration of them on this ex post facto declaration and licence? I do not hold myself bound to decide upon the construction of the act of parliament, which is admitted to be doubtful, and to explain which a bill was brought in and passed one branch of the Legislature, and will probably be reintroduced. The Court may explain the act one way, and the Legislature another: I will hear the whole argument; but do not thereby bind myself to express any opinion of the act.

Argument resumed.

The 7 and 8 G. IV. c. 72 reviewed the 5 G. IV. c. 103, and extended the remedy to cases not within that act. I admit the general law that the exclusive right to officiate is in the incumbent; but the question is whether under 7 and 8 G. IV. the general law is not varied. Dixon v. Kershaw is not confirmed to its full extent by Farnworth v. Bishop of Chester; for in the latter case Lord Tenterden seems to be of opinion that Lord Northington had pushed the demand of a compensation for future incumbents beyond its proper limits. The Legislature certainly meant to provide against the difficulties thrown in the way of building chapels by the necessity for that compensation: but, as we contend, it also proposed to go much further; and looking to the increased demand for church accommodation; to the inadequacy of the means hitherto furnished by Parliament to provide that accommodation, and [503] to the great evils thence resulting to the interests both of religion and of the Established Church, they were of opinion that it was necessary to afford much increased encouragement to the building and perpetual endowment of chapels, and therefore to make what had hitherto been considered by the general law as the rights of the patron and incumbent, to yield to the urgent and paramount calls for increased church-room. The Court must remember that Parliament had granted large sums to effect this purpose; that these acts are therefore to be considered remedial, and that, in the construction of them, the Court must look to the advancement of the remedy and the abatement of the evil. In the present case this consideration would lead precisely to the same construction as the wording of the 7 and 8 G. IV. c. 72, s. 3, almost necessarily demands: the language of it does not require assistance to be thus drawn from looking to the object and spirit of the legislature: it declares in the clearest terms that, provided only the chapel be sufficiently endowed, the commissioners may without further inquiry declare the right of nomination to be in the endower.

Per Curiam. "Built or hereafter built." Can that mean, built in any way; or must it not be legally built? That is properly put as the gist of the case.

The King's advocate. I should certainly be prepared to argue that the statute applies to all chapels whatever and however built: but since the Court seems strongly of opinion that, as far as the present suit is affected, the statute cannot [504] protect Mr. Woods, it is needless to press the argument further. Yet the construction put by the commissioners upon this statute must be taken into consideration in his justification; and they have expressed an opinion that they had the power of declaring the nomination to officiate in this chapel.

Per Curiam. Who is the patron?

Addams. The Dean and Chapter of Chichester.

King's advocate. The question hereafter may be, who is the incumbent? for it is a perpetual curacy.(a) I admit that if the construction we [505] contend for is upheld, the statute will make a great alteration in the powers and rights of incumbents.

(a) See The Duke of Portland v. Bingham, 1 Hagg. Con. 163, 167, as to appropriations pleno et utroque jure, and who in such cases is the incumbent, and has the cure of souls. In the second citation extracted in the Consistory Court, and in the articles afterwards given in, and admitted in the Delegates, the Duke of Portland is described as "incumbent." The heading of the articles was "for officiating under colour of a certain licence by him (Dr. Bingham), &c., illegally obtained, &c., from the Bishop of London, at the promotion of the Duke of Portland, patron, &c., incumbent, &c." The point whether the Duke of Portland was incumbent, and had the cure of souls, never received a judicial decision: the point was not raised in the protest; and that being overruled in the Consistory, Arches, and Delegates, the articles were, on the 16th of November, 1797, admitted without opposition. The protest, in substance, alleged, "that however competent it might be for the Duke of Portland or any other person voluntarily to proceed by articles against Dr. Bingham, for having publicly read prayers, &c., in the chapel without any licence or authority whatsoever, at least sufficient in law, were such the fact (the effect of which proceeding would be to correct and restrain him by judicial censure from continuing so to read, &c. for the future), yet that the Duke of Portland in a criminal suit, under any title or qualification soever, cannot agreeably to law call upon Dr. Bingham to bring into and leave in the registry of the Court the licence described in the citation; nor is it competent for him to put Bingham on the proof of the legality thereof, wherefore he prayed to be dismissed."

[506] Per Curiam. And of patrons too.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. This is a suit brought by the incumbent of Funtington against Mr. Woods for performing [507] without lawful authority divine service in a chapel newly erected at Sennicots in that parish. The articles state the facts that in 1829 a parishioner built this chapel, and the Bishop of Chichester consecrated it as a chapel of ease to Funtington; that in 1829, 1830, and January and February, 1831, Mr. Woods performed service therein contrary to the injunctions and against the consent of the incumbent, and without any legal authority. The defensive allegation, after reciting the 7 and 8 Geo. IV. c. 72, for amending the church-building acts, pleaded that Mr. Baker, with the sanction and approbation of the Bishop of Chichester and with the privity of Mr. Bliss, built the chapel and endowed it to the satisfaction of the church-building commissioners, by deed [508] dated on the 12th of November, 1829; that the commissioners, by their secretary, intimated their readiness to declare the right of nomination of the minister to be in Mr. Baker and his heirs for ever, upon certain conditions, which he immediately assented to and complied with; that on the 3d of December, 1829, the bishop with the privity of the incumbent consecrated the chapel by the name of St. Mary's Chapel; that on the 5th Baker nominated Mr. Woods; on the 19th the bishop granted him his licence, and Mr. Woods has done the duty there ever since. In the 5th article the allegation proceeds to plead "that, in order formally to declare the right of nomination, the commissioners, on the 7th of January, 1830, directed a deed to be prepared, the execution of which they delayed until an explanatory act had been obtained—that a bill was brought into Parliament, but that owing to the demise of the Crown it did not pass—that since the institution of the suit the seal of the commissioners has been affixed to the deed bearing date the 10th of May, 1831, declaring the right of nomination to be in Mr. Baker, and that

---

In reply: "That the Duke of Portland, patron, &c., incumbent, &c., of Marylebone hath, according to law, and as the promoter of the office, a right to call on Dr. Bingham to receive articles for publicly reading, &c., and that it is not imported by the citation that the licence shall be brought into the registry until the articles, intended to be given, shall have been admitted, at which time the licence, according to justice, should be brought in;" and it was further stated "that the citation does not allege that the Duke of Portland is under any title, except as promoter of the office, about to call upon Dr. Bingham to bring in the said licence, nor to put him upon proof of the legality thereof, admitting that the Duke of Portland has no right in the present suit, under any title or qualification, to proceed civilly for that purpose."

The editor is not in possession of any note of the argument or judgment in the Consistory overruling the protest; but from a note of what took place in the Arches, it appears that Sir W. Wynne thought that that part of the citation which called upon Dr. Bingham to bring in the licence was inaccurate and irregular, there being certainly a confusion of a civil and criminal suit; yet that it would not vitiate the citation if no prejudice arose to the party; that there was everything essential to a criminal proceeding, viz. the name of the judge, of the promoter, and the cause for which it was instituted; though it superfluously went further: and that the order of the Court below to give an absolute appearance did not enjoin Dr. Bingham to bring in the licence, and if it should thereafter be ordered, he would be at liberty to object: and that if the words objected to had been omitted, still the promoter might thereafter apply to have the licence brought in: so that the determination by the decree could not materially injure the defendant.

This decree was affirmed in the Delegates: and the articles, therein admitted, pleaded:

1. That by the laws, &c., ecclesiastical, no person can officiate without the leave and licence of the Ordinary.

2. That on a vacancy in 1787, the Duke of Portland, who was and is the sole patron, rector, &c., incumbent, &c., appointed Sir Richard Kaye to be curate of Marylebone.

3. That Dr. Bingham, aware of the premises and of the duke's right, several times applied to obtain his consent to open the aforesaid building (in Quebec Street) as a chapel, in which, on obtaining the bishop's licence, he might officiate; that the duke always refused his consent.

4. That notwithstanding, Dr. B., concealing that the duke had refused, on the 4th he has since again nominated Mr. Woods, and that the bishop has again licensed him by an instrument bearing date on the 25th of May, 1831."

In reply to this, Mr. Bliss gave in a further allegation averring that he has at all times unequivocally expressed his dissent from the erection of this chapel, unless the curate should be under the entire control of the incumbent, and that he has invariably refused his consent to any other nomination. It exhibits certain correspondence, and finally states that the population of the parish [509] does not exceed 800; that there is church-room for 600, and that no part of the parish is distant four miles from the church.

Upon the facts of the case there seems little or no controversy or dispute; and though the suit is brought in the form of a criminal proceeding, yet it is admitted to be intended for the purpose of trying a civil right, not for the purpose of punishment.

The question then is, whether at the time the suit was brought the defendant was legally authorized to officiate in this chapel: for in my judgment what has been done since the suit commenced cannot legalize an act which was previously illegal. The chapel is newly erected, and is alleged to be consecrated as a chapel of ease to the parish of Funtington. In the deed, declaratory of the right of nomination, issued since the commencement of the suit, it is thus described, "that the trustees, their heirs and assigns should use their best endeavours to procure the chapel to be consecrated, and a licence for its being for ever thereafter used as a place for the celebration of divine service according to the rites of the United Church of England and Ireland, and to be devoted to ecclesiastical purposes, but not to interfere in any respect with the parochial and other privileges, immunities, or rights of the parish church of Funtington or the minister thereof." I have some difficulty in understanding how that is to be effected. That a chapel with an officiating minister is not to interfere with the rights of the incumbent, seems a condition not very easy to be complied with.

---

of January, 1791, obtained the bishop's licence; that such licence was illegally obtained, and that the said building is newly erected, and has never been used for divine service.

5 and 6. That notice was served upon Dr. B. before the opening of the chapel that it would be opened against his grace's consent.

7. That notwithstanding, Dr. B. officiated therein on the 13th of January, and in the other months of 1791, and till May, 1792, under colour of the licence so illegally obtained without the consent of the duke, patron, &c., incumbent, &c.; and without the consent of Sir R. Kaye, then in possession of the office of curate of the parish, and without any legal authority.

8. That since the citation he continued to do so.

 In The Duke of Portland v. Bingham Lord Stowell's remarks on Herbert v. The Dean and Chapter of Westminster (1 Hagg. Con. 168, 9) seem to afford a satisfactory explanation of the discrepancy supposed to exist between that case and Dixon v. Kershaw (see Farnworth v. The Bishop of Chester, 4 B. and C. 569), by shewing that the dean and chapter were the actual incumbents of St. Margaret's—as such had the cure of souls—and were in that character (not as mere patrons or impropriate rectors with a vicarage endowed) entitled to nominate to that chapel. Being also a royal peculiar, the dean and chapter in their corporate capacity are clothed with the characters of ordinary, patron, and incumbent: and till about a century ago they deputed one of the prebendaries and a minor-canon to officiate as curates of St. Margaret's. Since that period, however, by an instrument under their common seal, they "do nominate, constitute, and appoint" a prebendary "their curate and chaplain of the parish of St. Margaret to reside and personally to officiate therein, and faithfully to do and perform all the customary duties of the said cure, and for his pains and support allot him an annual pension of 13l. 6s. 8d., and all oblations, emoluments, and profits arising from marriages, christenings, burials, &c., for his life, on condition that if he is absent more than four months in any year the cure shall be void, as if he were naturally dead." By a separate instrument they give him a lease of the tithes. The curate is not licensed; but since 57 G. III. c. 99, ss. 73, 74, the assistant curate has been licensed by the Bishop of London. Sed quære, whether royal peculiars, not being specially named, are included?

By 58 G. III. c. 45, s. 25, and 1 and 2 Will. IV. c. 38, s. 12, certain churches and chapels built under these acts shall be deemed perpetual curacies, and the spiritual person serving the same, the incumbent thereof.

I conceive that by the general law and the constitutions of the Church of England no person [510] has a right to erect a new public chapel, forming part of the ecclesiastical establishment of the Church of England,(a) whether as a chapel of ease or otherwise, without the concurrent consent of incumbent, patron, and ordinary,(b) and [511] without a provision for the indemnity or compensation of the future incumbent,

---

(a) Unless rights were granted to this building by competent authority and with all the necessary consents, it would become a mere proprietary chapel—a perfect anomaly unknown to the constitution of our Church, and in our ecclesiastical establishment. See Moysey v. Hillcoat, 2 Hagg. Ecc. 46. Still, in such a chapel, even after the licence of the bishop is obtained, the consent of the incumbent would be necessary to legalize the performance of divine service therein. See Duke of Portland v. Bingham, 1 Hagg. Con. 161; Carr v. Marsh, 2 Phill. 198.

(b) In The Duke of Portland v. Bingham (1 Hagg. Con. 161) Lord Stowell says, "It is generally true that the consent of the incumbent to the erection and use of a chapel is requisite." Kennett, in his Parochial Antiquities, vol. ii. p. 261 (ed. 1818), states to this effect: The inhabitants of Piddington, within the parish of Ambrosden, had procured a chapel to be erected within their own village, with a mansion-house allotted for a capellane to be provided and maintained by the successive vicars: this had occasioned some difference between the inhabitants and vicar, which was now composed by the joint consent of the patron, vicar, and the people, with confirmation of the diocesan, by virtue of an agreement, entitled "Dotatio capellæ S. Nicholai in villulâ de Piddington," and from this deed, dated the 14th of October, 1428, it appears that Piddington was divided from Ambrosden, and invested with distinct parochial rights: that the inhabitants were to provide, at their own cost and expense, and to have the nomination of a resident capellane, who was to receive all and singular the fruits, tithes, mortuaries, and emoluments within the chapelry, and hitherto paid to the vicar; and to occupy the mansion-house: he was to pay due obedience to each successive vicar; and the vicar released all tithes excepting the reserve of 20s. in money, and one quarter of wheat to be yearly paid to him and his successors: and the repairs of the chapel, chancel, and manse were for the future to be on the inhabitants and in no wise on the vicar, patron, or the successors, with a provision that if the chapel was void for a year, the tithes, &c. should be paid to the vicar. This was not a newly erected chapel; for Kennett says, p. 298-9, "I have met with no records nor tradition that assign the time when this chapel was erected. . . . Whenever it was first built, I believe it was not consecrated till ten years before this composition in 1418; . . ." which seems to be clearly implied by this expression in the present instrument, "in eâdem capellâ et ejus cœmeterio jam tandem de novo ritè dedicatis."

Remarking on this deed of composition, Kennett, p. 268-9, says, "Here is the triple league or joint consent of the diocesan, patron, and incumbent, whose suffrages were all required, if the church were full, to authorize an alteration of this kind. In a synod at London, convened by Anselm, Archbishop of Canterbury, in 3 Hen. I., the 15th constitution provides, Ne nova capella fiat sine consensu episcopi. So when an oratory or chapel was allowed at the grange of the Abbey of Waverley, in the parish of Aultun, com. Southampt., A.D. 1250, it was done by the permission and consent of the Bishop of Winchester, diocesan, and patron, and the rector of Aultun. So when the chapel of St. James, in the parish of Oakley, was constituted, A.D. 1418, the ordination of it was by authority of the Bishop of Lincoln, diocesan, de consensu et assensu prioris et conventus, &c., the proprietors and patrons, cum voluntate et assensu vicarii. And if the lord of any manor or inhabitants presumed to erect a chapel without such due permission and assent, such act was neither just nor valid. Therefore, when a chapel was founded within the parish of Watlington, com. Oxon., by the lord of that manor, for the greater conveniency of his family and tenants, the abbot and canons of Osency, patrons of the parish church, entered a protest against it; and in 1182 appealed to Richard, Archbishop of Canterbury, and from him, soon after, to Pope Urban the Third, who sent over a commission to the abbots of Abingdon and Missenden, and the prior of Kenelworth, who, upon inquiry and judicial process, dissolved the said chapel, because illegally built, without consent of the parties concerned."

perhaps in all cases—certainly if his pecuniary rights and interests are to be in any manner affected. The cure of souls of every parish or parochial district belongs to, and all its emoluments are by the original founder and endower set apart for the maintenance of, the incumbent and his successors, and become vested in the existing incumbent by his [512] institution and induction. The principles on which the consent of all these parties is required are obvious. The consent of the ordinary is necessary, as the general guardian of the interests and order of the church, and as the conservator of its constituted establishment. The patron is a party because the rights and value of his patronage may be affected. The incumbent himself is still more immediately affected, both in his pastoral duties and his pecuniary rights, both of which are committed to him when instituted and inducted. If chapels can be erected and ministers be placed in them at the nomination of others, not only will it deprive the incumbent of the means of directing the spiritual instruction of his parishioners which has been entrusted to him and which he has solemnly undertaken—not only will it produce schisms and dissentions, and thereby exert an injurious influence upon the religious principles of the parish, but it must almost necessarily affect in some degree the emoluments of the benefice as well as the pastoral duties of the incumbent. Such I apprehend to be the general law upon the subject, and the principles on which the law is founded.

In a question (as to the right of nomination to such a chapel) the law, as I have above stated it, is accurately laid down by a decision proceeding from high authority; a decision of the more value because not being made in this Court it could not be founded on the prejudices which might be suggested to belong to an ecclesiastical lawyer, but proceeding from a Lord High Chancellor of England—I mean Lord Northington, in the case of Dixon v. Kershaw (2 Ambler, 528. 2 Eden, 360). That case is [513] infinitely stronger than the present, supposing the church-building acts out of the question. This doctrine has since received the equally high sanction of the deliberate opinion of the Court of King's Bench in the case of Farnworth v. The Bishop of Chester (4 B. & C. 569), qualified merely by the expression of a doubt, on the part of the Chief Justice, as to the necessity of a compensation to future incumbents, where nothing is taken from the income of the incumbent. Perhaps the principle on which the compensation is required is that the incumbent, patron, and ordinary cannot bind the successors to their prejudice, or compromise what was originally, by the endower, intended to be attached to the incumbent, either as temporal rights or spiritual obligations. Nor is it very easy to suppose a case where even the mere erection of a chapel will not almost necessarily, in some degree, affect the income of the benefice. Under these authorities it appears clear that by the general law the consent of the patron and incumbent is necessary as well as that of the ordinary.

Such being the general law protecting the rights of the incumbent and of the patron, it follows that under the facts stated these rights have been invaded, and that Mr. Bliss would be entitled to obtain a sentence against the defendant unless the latter should be protected by the act of parliament referred to. The question then resolves itself into this, whether this general law is so altered by the church-building acts, and particularly by that of 7 and 8 Geo. IV. c. 72, as to give Mr. Baker a right to erect the chapel and to render the licence of the ordinary sufficient to protect the defendant [514] from any penal consequences for officiating there. In order so to protect him, the statute must have been strictly complied with, for general rights are not to be taken away without clear and direct authority.

It is necessary in the first place to see how the matter stood at the commencement of this suit, and when the articles were admitted. Here had been a new chapel built, it had been consecrated, and a licence had been granted to Mr. Woods, but here is no consent given by the incumbent, nor by the patron; and surely to the surrender of such rights a formal and regular consent would be necessary—not mere privity and acquiescence. Now it is quite clear that the incumbent was extremely averse from the erection of this chapel, unless he were to have the direction of the duty to be performed in it: here are his letters in 1826 in which he takes a very correct view of the subject, and makes very liberal offers for the performance of the duty and for the satisfaction of the parishioners; and if after that he did not, against the supposed sanction of his diocesan and of the church-building commissioners, protest at every step, but remained silent, his consent is not thence to be inferred; nor is such conduct to bind him. There might possibly be some understanding between Mr. Baker, the diocesan, and the church-building commissioners, but an understanding is not sufficient. It is possible they were desirous that additional church-room should be provided in this parish: but the Court cannot enter into these considerations. It can only pronounce on the legal right: and to establish that, the act and deed of the commissioners in an authentic form was at least necessary. Suppose nothing further de-[515]-claratory of the right of nomination had ever been done than had been done before the commencement of the suit, could it be contended that the incumbent had lost the right of nomination to this chapel? In my judgment, at the commencement of the suit, Mr. Woods was officiating in this chapel without legal authority, and Mr. Bliss would have been entitled to a sentence prohibiting him in future. What was the answer of the commissioners in February, 1830? "That the formal proceedings of the board with respect to the chapel must be postponed till their powers had been more defined by Parliament." They doubted therefore even of their own powers at that time, and issued no declaration giving the right of nomination to Mr. Baker, and depriving the incumbent of his authority over this chapel. What occurs afterwards? A bill is brought into Parliament but does not pass, and another bill which is not yet passed; and so the matter rests till the suit is commenced; and then, after the articles are given in, a formal deed declaratory of the right of nomination issues, and a new licence is granted. The very circumstance of obtaining this deed and this new licence shews that the defendant was aware that his title was imperfect until the authority of the commissioners was obtained in a regular form under their corporate seal.

In this view of the case it may hardly be necessary to consider the construction of the 7 and 8 Geo. IV. c. 72, in order to decide that, when the articles were given in, Mr. Woods was doing duty in this chapel without a legal nomination, for at that time no deed had been executed purporting to convey the right of nomination to any other [516] person than the incumbent: and the Court is not bound in this suit to decide whether, if the formal deed of nomination and licence had issued in December, 1829, instead of May, 1831, Mr. Baker would have possessed the right of nomination, and Mr. Woods would have been legally licensed and qualified to officiate without the consent of the incumbent. The Court can make no decision on that point in the present suit, and therefore is not regularly called upon to express any opinion on the construction of the statute, except so far as it may tend to confirm its judgment that until a declaration by a formal deed purporting to transfer the right of nomination to Mr. Baker was made, the licence to Mr. Woods was invalid, and consequently that Mr. Bliss is entitled to a sentence on the articles given in in this suit. At the same time, as the examination and consideration of this act of Parliament may be satisfactory, the Court will not shrink from stating its present view of the construction of the statute.

To take that view it is necessary to refer to the several acts for building new churches, and to see how far the general law relating to the rights of patrons and incumbents respecting chapels has been continued or altered.

The general law has been already stated, viz. that the erection of a new chapel requires the concurrent consent of ordinary, patron, and incumbent, and also (under certain circumstances at least) a compensation to the incumbent. The 7 and 8 Geo. IV. c. 72, referred to for the defendant, is expressly entitled, "To amend the acts for building and promoting the building of additional churches in populous places;" it must [517] therefore be construed with reference to, and in conjunction with, those former acts. Parliament granted first 1,000,000l., and afterwards 500,000l. in addition, for the purpose of building new churches, and appointed commissioners to carry that purpose into effect. The object is declared in 58 Geo. III. c. 45, entitled, "An act for building and promoting the building of additional churches in populous parishes." What are considered to be populous parishes, s. 13 defines: "Only where the population is not less than 4000, and there is not accommodation for more than one fourth." S. 75 provides that a certain proportion shall be "free seats" for the use of the poor. To furnish additional church-room in populous places, and to give accommodation to the poorer classes of society, were then the primary objects. In furtherance of these objects Parliament, in this first act, and in all the subsequent acts, has shewn particular attention to protect the rights and interests both of patrons and incumbents, and especially of existing incumbents. S. 16 provides, if parishes are divided, the consent of the patron under his hand and seal is to be had, and the division is not to take place till after an avoidance by the existing incumbent. S. 18. The new church is to remain a chapel of ease, and to be served by a curate appointed by the incumbent until an avoidance. S. 21. Commissioners may build additional chapels to be served by curates nominated and appointed by the incumbent of the parish: and there are various clauses tending to shew how careful the Legislature was to protect inviolate the rights both of patrons and existing incumbents, and to preserve the constitution of the church as established under the general law. S. 67. If the new churches are [518] made distinct churches, and not separate parishes, the right of presentation shall belong to the patron of the parish. S. 68. If the chapel is built in the whole by rates, still the nomination of the minister shall be in the incumbent of the parish, not in the parishioners who build. Again, the commissioners in the first instance are to settle the pew rents; and these, by s. 78, the churchwardens may afterwards alter. But how? With the consent in writing of the incumbent, patron, and bishop. So that throughout the whole of this first act the Legislature is particularly cautious to have the concurrent approbation and consent, and in an authentic form, of all these parties whose rights can be affected, or who can even remotely have an interest in the new built church or chapel; thus anxiously preserving the general law in these respects.

The same principle will be found to run through the 59 G. III. c. 134. "To amend and render more effectual an act passed in the last session for building and promoting the building of additional churches in populous places." In this act, by s. 12, new churches are to become distinct benefices, but are to be served during the existing incumbency by stipendiary curates to be nominated by the existing incumbent of the parish. So again, by s. 16, where there are new chapels, the commissioners may allot districts to any chapel of ease or parochial chapel already existing, but the curate shall be nominated by the incumbent of the parish church, except where the right of nomination shall already be legally vested in any other person or persons; expressly therefore recognizing and protecting the existing rights of the incumbent as vested in him under the general law.

[519] In the next act, 3 G. IV. c. 72, to "amend and render more effectual" the two preceding acts, the same principle is still observed. By s. 16 the commissioners may convert a district chapelry into a district parish, "with the consent of the ordinary, patron, and existing incumbent;" but if the incumbent refuses, then it may be done at the next avoidance. How careful again here is the Legislature to maintain vested rights, which it will not allow to be infringed without consent.

In the 5 G. IV. c. 103, which passed on the granting of the additional 500,000l., and is entitled, "to make further provision and to amend and render more effectual" the three preceding acts, the same general principle is recognized; but there is something of an exception and departure from it under special circumstances, carefully, however, set forth and guarded, and only for a limited time (see ss. 5-13 inclusive). It can only be done where there is not accommodation for one fourth of the inhabitants: it must be on a certificate of that fact to the bishop by twelve substantial householders of the parish, and that they are desirous to build or purchase a chapel and out of the pew rents provide a competent stipend for the minister, and other expenses; then the bishop may signify his consent if he thinks fit. The subscribers must then elect three trustees, and supply a vacancy in the trust occasioned by death or resignation, by electing a new trustee or trustees, "being members of the Church of England;" or the chapel may be built in part by a subscriber and the rest by rates, "if the bishop thinks fit" to consent, and the same portion of free seats shall [520] be set apart as under the church-building acts; but notice in writing of the application to the bishop must be given to the patron and incumbent, so as to afford each of them an opportunity of laying their objections before the bishop. Then, under all these circumstances, the trustees shall have the right of nomination for two turns, or forty years; but if the chapel is built, even in part, by the rates, the nomination of the minister shall be in the incumbent of the parish. Under all these special circumstances—great want of additional church-room—not sufficient accommodation for one fourth of the inhabitants, and where private subscribers engage to furnish this additional church-room—here is, to encourage so good a work, a breaking in upon the rights of the incumbent and patron for two turns, unless they shall satisfy the bishop that the measure would be injurious; for it is still left in the full discretion of the bishop: so that under all these strong circumstances, after two presentations, the right reverts; and the right of the person entitled by the general law is only ousted for two turns. It is impossible to look at all these separate acts without seeing how anxious the Legislature was to preserve the rights of all parties, and only under very special circumstances to allow an invasion of them.

In the present case it is quite clear, if Mr. Bliss' allegation be correct, that the building of a chapel at Sennicots does not come by any means within the 5 G. IV. c. 103. Funtington is not a populous parish; it has only 800 inhabitants of all ages and descriptions; and instead of there being only church-room for one-fourth, there is church-room for three-fourths, which, including [521] all ages and sexes, is more than ever would attend divine service at one and the same time.

Having thus remarked on the general law, and observed how sparingly it is broken in upon by the church-building acts, I come to the consideration of the act referred to in the defendant's allegation—the 7 and 8 G. IV. c. 72.

It is, as I have said, entitled "an act to amend the acts for building and promoting the building of additional churches in populous parishes," and therefore must be construed in conjunction with them. It is a very short act passed at the very end of the session of Parliament, having received the royal assent on the second of July, 1827; and Parliament was prorogued on that day. The bill, it is said, was brought into the House of Commons on the 15th of June, and was passed in fifteen days. I mention these circumstances to shew that it was a hasty measure, and that the construction of it is not, in derogation of the general law, to be carried beyond the strict letter. It has only three clauses; the first two, at all events, are for no very complicated or difficult objects. The first act passed in 1818, and its operation being confined to ten years, it would expire in 1828. The first clause of the new act is to continue the power of the commissioners for ten years longer. By s. 2 the commissioners may divide parishes into ecclesiastical districts as provided by the 58 G. III.; and if there shall not be burial ground within the new district, the interments may (till burial ground be provided) take place in the cemetery of the parish church; and for this purpose a legislative provision was hardly required. The burial in the original churchyard was a matter of necessity; and at all events the provision was of a [522] very insignificant nature. The third section is that relied on; and the object of it is obviously to encourage the permanent endowment of chapels with land, or money in the funds, exclusive of or in addition to pew rents; and from its wording this section is confined to that object. It has no explanatory preamble pointing out and suggesting any other object, or that it was expedient to make any further alteration in former acts, or that the law as it stood before required amendment; but if any person would give a liberal endowment in land, it secured to him the right of nomination in perpetuity. This was going a great length, even if restricted to chapels legally built according to the law as it stood before, that is, either under the general law and with the joint consent of patron, ordinary, and incumbent, or under the law as modified and varied by the church-building acts. The nomination is to be to the endower and his heirs, not even restricted by requiring that they shall be members of the Church of England: the words are general, and the section is so loosely and carelessly penned that it bears every appearance of having been hastily drawn. Looking to the general law, and to all the former acts which this act is to amend, it seems extremely difficult to suppose that the Legislature here intended to subvert all the general law and all the careful provisions of the former acts by this short sweeping clause thus expressed; and that any person, erecting a building and calling it a chapel in any parish—without any regard to its population or want of church-room, without any regard to the doctrines he may wish to introduce into the parish, without any regard to the duties entrusted to the parochial incumbent and the sacred trusts which he has un-[523]-dertaken, without any regard to the situation of the building, possibly close adjoining to the parish church, and so far particularly injurious and offensive to the incumbent —has only, when he has built his chapel, to state to the commissioners that he has amply endowed it, and then claims to be entitled, he and his heirs, to nominate a minister to officiate in that chapel and to propagate his own doctrines there. This would be an extreme construction to put on the words, and which I cannot conceive would give effect to the intention of the Legislature.

The true intent and meaning of the act are of immense importance, not merely in this individual case, but to the whole constitution of the Established Church, its patrons and ministers. If the endowment be ample and the right of nomination claimed, can the commissioners refuse to declare that the endowment is to their satisfaction? The words of the act are, "When any person shall to the satisfaction of the commissioners endow" (not build and endow) "a chapel built or hereafter to be built by such person or persons." Still the chapel so endowed must have been legally built either under the general law or according to the former acts; for, in that particular, this section does not purport to make any alteration in the law; the commissioners' functions under it are limited to deciding on the sufficiency of the endowment. Here is no preamble to the clause expressive of any other object, or of an intention to enlarge or extend the powers of the commissioners in any other respect; here are no words authorizing them to make any conditions which they in their discretion shall think proper—no such extensive powers are entrusted or delegated [524] to them by the Legislature. If the construction contended for by Mr. Woods be the true one, they could make no conditions at all; and if the other construction be the true one, the only conditions, the compliance with which they could require, are those imposed either by the general law or by the former acts, particularly the 5 G. IV. c. 103, taken in conjunction with this, thus offering, in consideration of an endowment either in lands or money in the funds, extended encouragement—viz. the perpetual nomination instead of the nomination for two turns or 40 years, and without compensation for the benefit of the incumbent of the parish, which the general law required, in addition to the consent of the patron, incumbent, and ordinary. Upon Mr. Baker's application the commissioners could only answer—"either get the consent of the bishop, patron, and incumbent, or bring your chapel within the clause of 5 G. IV., and then when you have endowed it to our satisfaction you will be entitled to obtain the right of nomination." If "built or hereafter to be built" precludes all enquiry—how built? by what authority built? whether necessary? whether useful? whether not injurious? injurious to the patron? violating the rights and interfering with the duties of the incumbent? then it may be possible that, as soon as the right of nomination was formally declared, Mr. Woods might be properly licensed or would be guilty of no offence subsequent to that time: but if the words "built or hereafter to be built" mean built according to law, either with the consent of the bishop, patron, and incumbent, or under former church-building acts, particularly the 5 G. IV., upon a certificate that three-fourths of the inhabitants had not church-[525]-room, and that room was wanted, then the clause becomes intelligible, though still going very far. Then the object of the act is only to encourage the endowment of chapels already existing, or which may hereafter be built either under the general law or by the commissioners, or under the clauses of 5 G. IV. In that construction the principles of the general law will be preserved: then the provisions of the act, passed only two years before, will be secured, and yet the plain and obvious object of encouraging the endowment of regular chapels will be obtained.

But if, as I have said, the construction contended for on behalf of Mr. Woods be correct, and if any person building a chapel in any parish without the consent of incumbent, patron, or ordinary, where the population does not require it, has only amply to endow it so that the commissioners cannot in conscience refuse to say that it is endowed to their satisfaction (for that is the sole question confided to the consideration of the commissioners as far as this clause goes)—if that be the true construction of the clause, then will all the general law respecting the rights of patrons and incumbents, which in all the former church-building acts have been so fully recognized and so carefully protected, be entirely swept away—then will even those guards, provided by the 5 G. IV. for supplying chapels in populous parishes, become quite useless, and an entirely new system, tending materially to produce divisions and religious contention in parishes, be introduced into the practice of the church.

In the present cause the Court is not called upon to decide or to express any decided opinion upon the true construction of this clause, respect-[526]-ing which it is evident, and in no degree extraordinary, that doubts have been entertained: no act has yet passed defining the powers of the commissioners in this respect: but whatever may be the true legal construction of the act, now that a deed of declaration has been executed, it seems clear that at the time of bringing in the articles, no deed of nomination being then in existence, Mr. Baker had no valid authority to nominate; and as the present allegation does not shew that Mr. Woods had the incumbent's consent to officiate, it forms no sufficient defence to the charge laid in the articles. I must therefore reject both allegations.

On the 2d Session of Mich. Term (Mr. Bliss having declared he proceeded no further), Addams applied for his costs on the ground that the decision of the Court had ascertained that Mr. Woods had transgressed the law, and that, if the case had proceeded, Mr. Bliss would have been entitled to its sentence: but that it was now useless to continue the suit, since the ex post facto provision of 1 and 2 W. IV. c. 38, s. 20, had declared that, in this and similar cases, the chapel shall be deemed to have been legally built, and the deed to have been valid from the date thereof.(a)[1]

The Court, under all the circumstances, declined to give costs.

[527] FULLECK v. ALLINSON. Prerogative Court, Mich. Term, 1st Session, 1830.—A testamentary paper cannot be set aside on the ground of monomania (the deceased's belief of an attempt to poison him), except there be the most decisive evidence that at the time of the factum of the paper the belief amounted to insane delusion. Semble, that a will, of personalty only, agreeable to long entertained intentions, prepared two months before, and execution merely delayed for want of witnesses, would be valid as an unexecuted paper, even though the execution finally took place during supervening insanity.

[Applied, Fairtlough v. Fairtlough, 1839, Milw. 36. Referred to, Davies v. Gregory, 1873, L. R. 3 P. & D. 32.]

This was a cause of proving the last will, with three papers (as codicils or additions thereto), of the Rev. John Monkhouse, promoted by John Fulleck, Esq., one of the executors, against Barbara Allinson, widow, the sister and only next of kin. The deceased died on the 15th of October, 1828, aged 70. His will was as follows:—"I, John Monkhouse, late Fellow of Queen's College in Oxford, and now rector of Bramshot in the county of Southampton, and residing there, do make my last will and testament as follows, first expressing my belief in one God only, and in a future state of retribution as declared by Jesus Christ his authorized messenger." Debts and funeral expences to be paid; 1850l. to the Provost and Fellows of Queen's College, Oxford, and their successors, in trust, to invest the same at interest on such securities as the law will allow; the interest to be applied in "teaching all the children from six years old and upwards (and who shall be desirous of taking the benefit thereof) of all persons residing within the parish of Bramshot, whatever their religious persuasion be, in reading English, in writing, and in arithmetic; excepting such children as are bastards, or any children of persons given to whoring, thieving, cheating, tricking, biting, overreaching or extorting; and I most earnestly desire that this exception may ever be attended to, which from the regard that persons ought to have for the welfare of their offspring will supply the best means I can leave behind me for counteracting the extreme dishonesty and great unchastity of the parish, and for promoting the probity [528] and virtue of its inhabitants." Plan of teaching to be Bell or Lancaster: suggests to the trustees the propriety of requesting the rector of Headley, the vicar of Selborne, and the rector of Bramshot for the time being to superintend, &c. To the said provost, &c. 100l. for the repairs of their building. To the same 100l. "on trust, to pay the same to the treasurer for the time being of a voluntary society known by the name of the Unitarian Society for promoting Christian Knowledge and the practice of virtue by distributing books, the same to be applied to the purposes of that society." To the provost, &c. all his books for the use of the library of the Tabordars of the said college; also 20l. to be paid by the provost, &c. "in equal proportions, to ten poor families of the best general character in Bramshot." "To those who poisoned my faithful dog, my companion by day and my guardian by night, one shilling as a memorial." Residue to the provost, &c. on the same trusts as respects the 1850l.

Henry Budd, Esq., John Fulleck, Esq., Charles Butler, Esq.,(a)[2] Rev. Robert Dickinson, rector of Headley, Rev. William Cobbold, vicar of Selborne, Henry

---

(a)[1] 1 and 2 W. IV. c. 38, s. 1, repeals 7 and 8 G. IV. c. 72, s. 3: and several subsequent sections make new provisions, but under many limitations and restrictions, for declaring the right of nomination to be in the endowers.

(a)[2] It appeared that the deceased was offended at Mr. Butler for his conduct while investigating, and his disbelief of, the attempt to poison the deceased's well; and therefore erased his name as an executor: the deceased also mentioned, two days before his death, a similar intention as to Budd's name, and for the same reasons.

Marshall of Godalming (to each 5l. for their care herein), "executors in trust of this my will which relates to my personal estate solely."

Dated 19th April, 1827. JOHN MONKHOUSE (L.S.).

Attesting witnesses—John Parson,(b) Samuel Charles Locke.(c)

[529] 1st Codicil, (No. 1). To H. Budd, Esq., J., Fulleck, Esq., C. Butler, Esq., and H. Marshall, all his real estate at Bramshot on trust to sell, and to apply the produce of the purchase money to the Provost, &c. of Queen's, upon the trusts expressed in his will: "and I bequeath to the executors of my will one pound to be applied in providing good wholesome milk, if it may be had, to be given to the children of the parish of Bramshot in the manner they shall think fit."

Dated 24th April, 1827. JOHN MONKHOUSE (L.S.).

Attesting witnesses:—Charles Mellersh, James Limbell, clerks to Mellersh and Marshall, solicitors, Godalming, Sarah Loveland, servant to Mr. Marshall.

The will and this codicil were both in the writing of the testator upon one sheet of paper, enclosed in an envelope and endorsed, "My will to be opened on my decease and not before." JOHN MONKHOUSE.

June 24, 1827.

"The executors are—Mr. Fulleck, Mr. Henry Marshall, Mr. Budd, Mr. Dickinson, and Mr. Cobbold." (a)

No. 2 and 3 were labels in the deceased's writing—one inscribed "for Ann Anker, my housekeeper;" the other "for Hannah Harrison;" and each dated February 20, 1827; and attached to two canvass bags (found in the deceased's iron chest), the one containing 49l. 2s., and the other 49l. 3s., in silver.

[530] These testamentary papers were opposed by the next of kin in an allegation setting up that the deceased was always odd and eccentric, particularly latterly; that William Harrison, who had married the deceased's niece (Mrs. Allinson's daughter), had, in 1817, come from Cumberland at the deceased's desire to farm his glebe—at first resided with the deceased, then removed to a house a mile distant, leaving his daughter, then four years old, with the deceased; that until April, 1827, W. Harrison and the deceased continued to be on good terms together: that Harrison managed the deceased's tithes for him, and that the deceased constantly appointed him churchwarden of Bramshot, and on his influence that he was appointed guardian of the poor: that he (W. H.) was appointed churchwarden and guardian of the poor on Easter Monday, 16th of April, 1827, for the year ensuing. That in a day or two after such appointments had been made the deceased, under a delusion of mind, declared that the well belonging to his house had been poisoned by an infusion therein of mercury, or of arsenic, or other poisonous matter, and expressed a belief that the same had been done by Mr. Harrison or some of his family: that the well was about ninety feet deep and five in diameter at the top, and from twelve to fifteen at the bottom. That the deceased, in consequence of this delusion, would not permit the water from the well to be used: and from such time the water for his house was brought from the well of John Cover, a labourer in his employ; to whom he sent directions to have the lid of his well fastened by a chain and padlock, and which was done: that the deceased, upon examination being dissatisfied with them, Cover, by his direction, fastened the lid with an iron bar and a new padlock; [531] and kept the well locked: that in the summer of 1827 the deceased was angry because there were chinks in the lid, and helped to fill them up with chips. That there was no poison in the deceased's well, and that his apprehensions were the effect of delusion and derangement; that he subsequently thought the water spouts, tank of rain water, the eggs, butter, and milk from W. Harrison were poisoned. That this belief continued to his death. It further pleaded vain attempts of his friends to remove this belief in respect to it, and to other matters, and his belief that his dog was poisoned in 1826: that the papers, pleaded as the will and codicils, were prepared and executed subsequent to the time when the deceased was impressed with the belief of the poison, and while he was of unsound mind and under mental delusion. It also pleaded

---

(b) Curate of Headley.

(c) Curate of Bramshot.

(a) The deceased had transcribed, in the register book of burials at Bramshot, certain parts of his will; and also an abstract of the codicil (No. 1). This transcript and copy were signed by him and dated May 1, 1827.

affection for his sister, and that he was accustomed to afford her pecuniary assistance unsolicited.(a)

[532] The allegation in reply pleaded circumstances to shew that the belief that his well had been poisoned was not an insane delusion; but was founded on rational though possibly on insufficient grounds; and that his conduct, conversation, and letters on this subject were rational and sensible: the plea exhibited a number of letters upon this subject, and others on matters of business, and a correspondence published in the Gentleman's Magazine proving that, as early as 1814, he had entertained Unitarian notions. It also pleaded that he had given instructions, in 1819, for a will of the same purport. The 43d article denied that the papers were prepared after he had taken up this belief of poison; for that some time before, in a conversation with one of the witnesses, he spoke of the will as being ready to be executed, and proposed, for the sake of privacy, to execute it at the [533] witness' house; and that such intention was only postponed in consequence of the non-arrival of the witness' friend, who was then intended to be the second attesting witness. The 44th pleaded; that his belief in the attempts to poison him produced no change in his affection for his sister; for that he made to her the same small remittances which he had been accustomed to do before; that the day but one before his death, in a conversation with his solicitor, he expressed his adherence to the will. It also pleaded that he had for some time disliked Harrison; that such dislike gradually increased; that he never confessed that Mrs. Harrison or the children were his relations; and that he never intended either of them to be objects of his testamentary bounty, but intended to give a small freehold to Harrison, for the title deeds of which he wrote to his solicitors on the 16th of February, 1827, declaring that he meant to deliver them to Harrison in his life-time.

As the circumstances pleaded in the allegations on either side were established,

---

(a) This allegation was brought in on 7th May, 1829; and on the 14th, four papers were brought in annexed to an affidavit by Mr. Marshall, the deceased's solicitor. No. 1. The draft of a will in the handwriting of the deceased, delivered to M. by the deceased shortly previous to November, 1819. No. 2. Draft of a will prepared therefrom by M. No. 3. Copy of a letter from M. to deceased, sent with such draft. No. 4. Instructions for the codicil as to the real estate, delivered to M. about the time the codicil was executed.

No. 1 was the will of 1819, the heading of which corresponded with the last will, except the words "his authorized messenger" were omitted. He left 3000l. stock to the rector of Headley, vicar of Selborne and rector of Bramshot—to pay the yearly interest to a schoolmaster; and after payment of such legacies as shall be hereafter mentioned, and of all just demands on him, all the rest and residue of his personalty to the same, in trust to build a school and master's house.

The clause as to the exclusion of certain children, and his object in this exclusion, were the same as in the latter will.

Legacies, printed books to his successors, 100l. to the Provost of Queen's College towards the repairs of their buildings; 100l. to the treasurer for the time being of a voluntary society [its name or designation to be inserted here] for promoting, &c., as in latter will. Residue to the three trustees of personalty, to the rector of Headley, &c., to be applied to the repair of the school and dwelling-house.

Executors—the three trustees.

Date in blank. Signed, but not sealed: attestation clause, but no witnesses.

No. 2 exactly agreed with the last will, except in the omission of the words "his authorized messenger;" and of the description of the society; and that the books were bequeathed to ——— on trust to deliver to his successor. There was also a blank clause for legacies, and there was no clause respecting his dog. The appointment of executors was also left in blank.

No. 3 explained that these variations from No. 2 arose from legal difficulties in effecting the deceased's intentions in the mode that he proposed.

No. 4. "My house and gardens at Passfield in the parish of Bramshot to be sold, and the interest of the money to be applied partly to the purposes expressed in my will, and partly in providing good wholesome milk (if it may be had) to be given to the children as opportunity serves."

with very slight exceptions, the question was whether the belief which the deceased entertained was a sane or insane belief.

The King's advocate and Nicholl in support of the will and codicils.

Lushington and Dodson contrà.

[534] Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The statement and observations necessary to be made in this case, as the reasons of the sentence the Court is about to give, need in no degree be proportioned to the bulk of the evidence which has been introduced into the cause. The material facts lie in a narrow compass.

The will, codicil, and two other papers propounded are all in the handwriting of the deceased, and the will and codicil are regularly executed and attested. There is no question of the factum, nor of the intention, provided the deceased was of sound mind. The instruments are opposed on the ground of insanity.

The history of the deceased and of the parties connected with the cause is pretty accurately detailed in the allegation given in opposition to the will, and the circumstances therein stated will lead to some of those prominent points which are more precisely to be considered.

The deceased, the Reverend John Monkhouse, was the son of a Cumberland farmer, became a fellow of Queen's College, Oxford, and was for the last twenty years of his life rector of Bramshot, Hants, a college living. He was always odd and eccentric in his habits; he resided in the rectory house, and was latterly very retired. His sister had two daughters, one married Harrison, then a farmer near Penrith, the other married Moffat and resided with her mother. The allegation pleads affection for this sister, and that the deceased occasionally afforded her pecuniary assistance. In 1817 Harrison and his family, by the deceased's invitation, came to Bramshot to rent the glebe and manage the tithes, [535] having previously sold off his own stock in Cumberland. For about two years he resided at the deceased's house, and then removed to a house about a mile distant, leaving one of his daughters, Hannah, about four years old, to reside with the deceased. After their removal the deceased continued on good terms with Harrison and his family. Harrison collected his tithes, was appointed his churchwarden, and, on his interest, guardian of the poor up to the 16th of April, 1827. The 6th article lays the origin and commencement of insanity—that it took place after the 16th of April, 1827; and between that time and the 19th of April the deceased was seized with the delusion of mind which led to the execution of the will; the will being executed on the 19th of April, the codicil on the 24th.

A great number of the following articles state circumstances taking place in May, June, and afterwards, all tending to confirm that this impression respecting the poison was a delusion of mind; and the 26th article sums up the averment and fixes the insanity to this impression: it pleads that the instruments propounded as the will and codicils of the deceased "were prepared and executed subsequent to the time when he first became impressed with the idea that W. Harrison and his family had made an attempt to poison him, and whilst he, the deceased, was of unsound mind, and under mental delusion."

The great mass of the evidence and the principal bearing of the arguments are to shew delusion in May and June, 1827; but the precise question is whether at the time this will and codicil were prepared the deceased was become insane. The fact may bear differently on the will and codicil: [536] they are of different dates; there is an interval between the execution of them, and a much greater interval between the times of their respective preparations. They are subject to different rules of law; for the will applies solely to personal property, the codicil exclusively to real—except a legacy of one pound introduced rather to record an opinion than as an operative bequest.

The deceased was undoubtedly a very eccentric man; but actual insanity is not alleged before Easter, 1827: he kept large sums of money in his house, which was rather retired; he carried arms; he kept Newfoundland dogs both as guards and companions, and was very much attached to them. In 1824 one of these favorite Newfoundland dogs, called Carbo, died. The deceased thought she had been poisoned; he had her buried, and wrote some verses on Carbo: but thinking she had been poisoned was no delusion; others from the symptoms and appearance of the dog thought so too, particularly Moore, the farrier who attended her. The deceased could not fix on the person who had poisoned her, but he had his suspicions.

His parish was not of a very moral character—particularly in regard to the virtue of chastity—there were many illegitimate children. The deceased (whatever might be the heterodoxy of his religious opinions) seems to have been a strictly moral man, and to have had strong moral feelings. Whenever any of these illegitimate children were christened he recorded the circumstance and the character of the mother in the parish register, extracts from which to the end of 1827 have been exhibited.(a)

[537] This may be eccentric, odd, irregular, and improper; for all such irregularities in a clergyman are improper: but it is not insanity. If it be insanity, he was insane for the last 15 or 16 years, or perhaps all his life; but it is impossible to maintain that such conduct would render invalid any and all acts respecting his property.

It comes then to the consideration whether at the time these testamentary acts were done the deceased was intestable, so as to vitiate and render invalid the instruments propounded. The will, as I have said, is all in the handwriting of the deceased; it is remarkably well written, without alteration or erasure at the time of the execution; it bears no appearance of excitement or hurry—the date was filled in at the time of the execution—it is signed and sealed—there is a full attestation clause—and it is attested by two witnesses—both clergymen—one his curate—the other the minister of an adjoining parish—both intimately acquainted with the deceased. Not only is it to be presumed that these two clergymen would not have attested the act unless satisfied of the sanity of the testator; but they do both in the most unhesitating manner depose to their full belief that the deceased was of perfect sound mind; and they thus depose notwithstanding at the time of their examination they [538] were aware of all the deceased's subsequent opinions respecting the poisoning.

Next, as to the contents of the will. That he was an Unitarian, however much to be lamented in a beneficed clergyman, does not render him intestable. Unitarian opinions he appears long to have held. It appears that he made the college trustees by the advice of his solicitor, to avoid the statutes of mortmain; but the passage relating to the poisoning of his dog is that on which reliance has been placed as manifesting the existence of insanity. That clause is certainly odd and eccentric; it does not however record a delusion, but an opinion which he held in common with others, and for which there were rational grounds of belief, or at least of suspicion; and this opinion was recorded to prick and sting the conscience of the perpetrator whoever he might be. This clause will not then, as evidence of defective capacity, vitiate the will.

If this disposition had been a departure from the long course and current of his affections and testamentary declarations towards his family, it might have furnished some marks of that capricious malice and change which often accompanies insanity; but the fact is the reverse: whatever little patrimony he had he seems to have left with his sister, but he kept up no direct intercourse—he had not been in Cumberland since 1800—instead of large and constant pecuniary remittances, he sent three times, on the solicitation of a friend, 5l., and part of that donation he, on one occasion, desired to be applied to the use of a school, shewing, as the will itself does, that he was interested in the education of the poor. The disposition therefore [539] is not a change from affection to his relations, for even Harrison and his wife, the niece of the deceased, were hardly acknowledged by him, and their daughter Hannah was brought up, not as a favoured relation, but as a servant: while, on the other hand, the disposition is in principle the same as the deceased had intended during the last ten years of his life: this is manifest from the testamentary instrument prepared by the deceased himself in 1819; which is all in his own handwriting, is carefully drawn up, is fairly written; he carries it to his solicitor, but as it gave the property in trust to his successors at Bramshot, the bequest could not have been carried into execution. The deceased and his solicitor correspond on the subject; the latter prepares a draft making the college trustees, and sends it to the deceased accompanied by an explanatory letter.

(a) In addition to these entries applying to particular individuals, there was at the close of the book of baptisms ending 1812 a memorandum in the deceased's handwriting: "The want of honesty and chastity are the prevailing defects here; I would give ten of my parishioners for one honest man, till the whole population was renewed." Again, in the book of baptisms for 1821-2, "Of seventy-two marriages in the last ten years, not less than sixty-nine females have been unchaste before marriage. Those who gain husbands are more fortunate than those who bear bastards; but not more virtuous." (Signed) J. MONKHOUSE.

So far then as the disposition is concerned, here were precisely the same intentions in 1819, and expressed nearly in the same terms. At that time his soundness of mind is unquestioned, however peculiar some of his opinions might be. Whether the deceased ever executed a will to that effect does not appear, but the intention continued—at least it was existing long before the suspicion respecting the poison arose.

It does not exactly appear when the instrument propounded was first written—it was after the death of his dog Carbo in 1824; for that event, as has been already mentioned, is recorded in it. It was written and ready for execution in February, 1827, as appears from the evidence of Mr. Parson; it was probably written about the same time as the labels (annexed to the two bags of [540] money) propounded as testamentary; they are dated the 20th of February, 1827. This mode of bequeathing these sums was probably adopted to evade the legacy duty: whether that effect will be produced is not the question; but the bequests will be good as evidence of a clear intention to convey those benefits at his death to the persons named.

As to the will, the account given by the Rev. Mr. Parson, confirmed as it is by the other evidence in the cause, is quite decisive. "On the 16th of February the deceased asked him if he expected any friend to stay, as he had an instrument, and that indeed it was then in his pocket, to which he wished deponent and some friend to be a witness." He answered, "He expected a friend from the neighbourhood of Basingstoke, and would let deceased know when he came." Here then is the instrument prepared, and here is the intention to execute, and that intention only deferred, because he waited for witnesses whom he chose to select for that purpose. On the 7th of March the deceased repeated the inquiry; again, on the 30th of March, just the same conversation took place, and on the 9th of April a similar inquiry was made. Parsons says "he remembers the conversation, for he wrote it in his journal." Having made these four several inquiries in order to get Mr. Parson and some friend to attest the instrument, and finding that Mr. Parson's friend was no longer expected, the deceased on the 19th of April invites his own curate, Mr. Locke, to meet Mr. Parson at his house; and the will is, on that occasion, executed and attested by these gentlemen.

[541] Here, then, for two months, from the 16th of February to the 19th of April, the instrument was ready prepared; the deceased was anxious to execute, and finally did execute, it on the 19th. Suppose then, on Easter Monday (for the insanity is not averred till after that day, and every witness on both sides says that on that day they would without hesitation have witnessed his will), or on any previous day, the deceased had, by the visitation of Providence, been suddenly struck either with death or with violent frenzy, which had continued till his death, would that have affected the validity of the will, which disposes only of personalty? Here was an intention existing ten years before as to the disposition, the instrument ready for execution in February, all in the deceased's own handwriting, the formal execution merely delayed to get such attesting witnesses as he wished, in order that the matter might not become known in the parish. If the intention continued, execution would not have been necessary under the circumstances I have supposed in order to give legal effect to the instrument, that instrument merely disposing of personalty. Assuming then, as pleaded, "that a day or two after Easter the deceased became under a delusion as to the poisoning," it could not affect this will merely of personal property.

This short view of the case seems to put an end to the question as to the validity of the will, for the will was valid at the time the delusion is alleged to have taken place, even supposing such a delusion to have arisen as from that moment rendered the deceased intestable.

The codicil may by possibility stand upon dif-[542]-ferent grounds. That instrument contains a disposition of real property, though of no great value. The law respecting real property looks to the fact of execution—it is essential: if the deceased was of unsound mind when he executed the instrument, it would not be valid in law. The same effects would follow as if the deceased had died between the preparation and execution of a will of real property. The validity of this codicil seems scarcely a fit subject for the decision of this Court. The legacy of 1l. to provide milk can hardly be carried into effect, and the sentence of this Court will not of course bind the heiress at law. The Court will therefore not enter into any detail of reasons respecting the codicil. The disposition of it is the same as of the will, viz. that the property should go to the same trusts.

Now the presumption of law is in favour of sanity till insanity be clearly established. The alleged delusion in no degree respects the sister, who is the heiress at law of the real property and the sole person entitled to the personalty under an intestacy. At all events it was a monomania; for upon every other subject, from the time in question to his death, the deceased acts as a person of sound mind, memory, and understanding, as much as he had ever been: he manages his house, he manages his property and his farm, grants leases, receives tithes, keeps accounts, recognizes his will, holds rational conversation, and does church duty. A monomania to affect such an instrument, under such circumstances, should be clear in point of existence and decided in character beyond all doubt. That the deceased thought and believed that an attempt had been made to poison him seems [543] to be a fact established; but is it established that his opinion in that respect was a mere morbid insane delusion rendering him intestable? The question is not whether the attempt to poison was really made, but whether he had grounds for suspecting it; or whether, as pleaded, "the deceased had no rational grounds whatever for his belief."

What then are the facts?

It seems pretty clearly established that he and his two servants were all taken ill together, with a complaint in the bowels and vomiting. The natural inference from this is, that something in their food had disagreed with each of them: it did not follow that it was poison, still less that it was poison purposely and maliciously introduced: but the coincidence was singular, and might naturally excite some alarm and suspicion. Another fact is that there was some conversation between the two Harrisons—the boy and the girl, William and Hannah—about poisoning. Whether in consequence of this sickness something may have been said about poison, and repeated by the girl to the boy; or something said at Harrison's which the boy repeated to the girl, or how it happened is not very material, but this conversation being repeated either to the deceased's housekeeper, or to the deceased, and coupled with the sickness, might increase suspicion. The deceased was old, he was nervous, he was suspicious, he thought his dog had been poisoned, he suspected young Harrison; these circumstances together might create suspicion without a mere deluded imagination. To a suspicious mind "trifles light as air are confirmations strong."

How does he act? As any rational person having the slightest suspicion of such an attempt would act: [544] he goes to Godalming, consults a medical man, Mr. Balchin; he relates all the particulars; Balchin, neither from his relation nor from his deportment, thinks it mere morbid imagination; he advises him how to act—to take precautions—to use neither the milk nor the water. The deceased relates the same account to his solicitors; they have the same impressions and give the same advice; he is there two days—he has this codicil prepared, he copies it on his will and he executes it. His solicitors and the witnesses have full opportunities of judging of his deportment; and there was neither in the facts which he stated, nor in his behaviour, any thing to induce them to doubt his sanity. They at least thought he had rational grounds at that time for his suspicions. Can, then, the Court venture to say that this suspicion, founded on these circumstances, was insanity—such decided insanity as rendered him at that time intestable and vitiated any civil act he could do?

Under this suspicion of an attempt to poison his milk he has a clause inserted in the codicil to give 1l. to provide wholesome milk. This records that he had the suspicion, but it goes no farther; it does not prove that the suspicion was an insane delusion: the fact might be true or false, but he had the grounds for entertaining the suspicion already stated: he inserts in his will the same sort of record in respect to his dog at least two months previously—before he is suspected of insanity; and there the fact was probably true, for at least in the opinion of others the dog had been poisoned.

The time of this visit to Godalming when the codicil was made is the most important period; but there are various subsequent investigations for the purpose of ascertaining whether any attempt [545] to poison the deceased had been really made: or rather the enquiry is, whether there was any ground to charge Harrison and to take legal proceedings against him. The gentlemen who conduct these several investigations are satisfied that no attempt was made; that there was no sufficient evidence of the fact; and they probably come to a right conclusion that no attempt whatever had been made; that no poison had been infused either into the milk, or into the bucket, or into the well: but the deceased adheres to his own suspicion; they cannot convince him; it does not follow that he was at first insane; he was not believing impossibilities—he was not believing that trees could walk, nor that statues could nod, nor any thing naturally impossible—of the falsehood of which reason must at once convince him. An opinion against rational probability is not necessarily an insane opinion; it is not drawing right conclusions from manifestly false premises, but erroneous inferences from premises which may be true. The deceased and his two servants had been simultaneously sick and ill. Some conversation about poison had taken place between the boy and girl. His dog had a strong appearance of having been poisoned three years before—he consults a medical man, relates all the circumstances and symptoms both to him and to his solicitors—they advise precautions—he carries some milk to his medical man, Balchin—Balchin cannot analyse, but he compares it with some milk of his own and they are different. "It had," says Balchin, "a hot, brackish taste, and imparted the same sensation to his tongue as if there had been corrosive sublimate put into it: he was of opinion that the [546] milk contained corrosive sublimate, and told the deceased there was something wrong in the milk." Here there is ground for the suspicion: here is a medical opinion confirming the deceased's opinion: that opinion might be erroneous—the taste might arise from some accidental cause—there might have been something infused into this milk, though not by Harrison. Certainly the deceased appears to have been sincere in his opinion that poisoning had been attempted—he adheres to that opinion—the gentlemen who investigate the matter cannot convince him that he is wrong in his opinion and that they are right. Even if all these investigations had made the impression deeper and his conviction stronger, till what was originally no more than suspicion at length grew into insanity, becoming a morbid delusion, which no proof nor reasoning could remove, still, that ex post facto delusion would not affect the validity even of the codicil. His whole conduct and deportment on the 23d and 24th of April were those of perfect sanity, supposing him to have any grounds of suspicion. The whole of his subsequent conduct is quite consistent with it—he retains his opinion founded on the circumstances referred to: but he manages his property, he occupies his glebe, he settles for his tithes; he keeps his accounts, he in some degree recovers his health and spirits. If insanity did exist, it is monomania in the strictest sense and to a singular degree. When such circumstances arose to excite the original suspicion, the Court is not prepared to say that monomania did exist when the codicil was executed.

To invalidate an instrument in the handwriting of the deceased, prepared from his instructions, [547] the solicitors, the medical person, the attesting witnesses all concurring in opinion, and judging from the conduct and deportment that he was of perfect sound mind, the existence of insanity at that time ought to be clear beyond all doubt, in order to affect even the codicil; still less could this suspicion affect the will regarding personalty only, containing a disposition intended ten years, and, as appears, during the whole of ten years, prepared two months before, and the execution merely delayed to get witnesses.

In this view it is proper to pronounce for the will and the other two papers; and, as far as the Court has jurisdiction, for the codicil also.

Lushington asked for costs out of the estate. The only next of kin was excluded.

The King's advocate. The executor cannot consent but does not oppose.

Per Curiam. I am extremely disinclined to allow the costs out of the estate: but, considering the great extent of the property, I shall direct costs on both sides out of the estate to form part of the decree. It is under the very particular circumstances of this case that I grant them; but I am almost deterred from so doing by the great bulk of evidence introduced into the cause.

[548] ROBERTS v. ROUND AND OTHERS. Prerogative Court, Dec. 8th, 1830.—Testatrix having (without destroying the seal or signature) partially mutilated a duplicate will, but retained in her own possession, and carefully preserved entire, the other duplicate, such mutilation is neither a total nor partial revocation. On evidence of uninterrupted affection for the parties benefited, will pronounced for. Costs out estate.

This was a cause of proving the will of Diana Caswall; and was promoted by the sole executor and residuary legatee against the next of kin.

The allegation pleaded that Miss Caswall died on the 23d of April, 1830, leaving Susan Constantia (wife of J. Round, Esq.), Maria (wife of J. C. Bourchier, Esq.), Mary (wife of J. G. Wilkinson, Esq.), and Ann (wife of J. Rolt, Esq.), her nieces, only next of kin, and the only persons in distribution: that her personal and real estate was each of the value of 30,000l.

2. The execution, in duplicate, of the will, on the 11th of April, 1814.

3. That when she gave instructions for her will she shewed to Mr. Dance, the solicitor, a previous will, whereby she had devised her four estates to the eldest four of the five daughters of her brother; and which provided that if either of the four died, the estate left to that one should go to the next youngest sister; that Dance then pointed out "that in that case her brother's youngest daughter would not be entitled to any estate except in the event of the death of the fourth daughter, and suggested that as the several estates were very unequal in value, a provision for her youngest niece might be made by a charge upon one of the larger estates;" to which she replied "that she would not divide an estate;" that Dance then suggested "that she might treat her leasehold house in Davies Street as a fifth estate, so as to give a property to each niece;" [549] that she replied, "No, the Davies Street house must be for my eldest niece:" that Dance then said "that in case of the death of either of her nieces she must reconsider the will she was about to make, and adapt it accordingly;" that after the death in 1815 of the third daughter (one of the legatees), Dance reminded the deceased as to the effect of her will; to which she replied "she would consider of it:" that upon his again, shortly afterwards, mentioning the subject, she replied "that she felt a difficulty about it; that she did not like to make another will without naming her brother an executor, which she should not do."

4. That the will was kept by the deceased; that the duplicate was immediately after the execution sealed up in an envelope, and left with Dance, who so retained possession of it till October, 1827, when he delivered it to her, at her request; that she did not afterwards ever allude to her will, or to the duplicate, or to her testamentary intentions to Dance (though she saw and consulted him on legal business several times during her last illness, and for the last time on the 7th of April, 1830), or to any other person, save that in November, 1829, she enquired of Dance "how her property would go if she died without a will;" when he informed her. That the duplicate was, when delivered to the deceased, sealed up in its original envelope, and was in the same condition as when executed, and that it remained in her possession to her death.

5. That, on the day next following the deceased's death, the will and duplicate were found by Mr. Dance, Mr. and Mrs. Round, and Mr. and Mrs. Bourchier, in the deceased's portfolio, which was on her bed to the time of her death; [550] and was at her request taken to her by her nurse in the presence of Mathews, her confidential servant, on the evening next preceding her death, that she might see if it was locked; and that it so remained locked (the key being kept by the deceased), and was, very shortly after her death, delivered by Mathews to Mr. Dance, Mr. and Mrs. Round, and Mr. and Mrs. Bourchier. That the will, found in the portfolio, was enclosed in an envelope endorsed, in the deceased's hand-writing, "My will, dated the 11th of April, 1814:" that on the duplicate being found in the portfolio, the first sheet was discovered to have been mutilated or cut as the same now appears.(a) That the de-[551]-ceased was confined to her bed-room by her last illness for about two months, during which time the portfolio was never removed from her bed-room, and, previous to her illness, it was usually taken to her bed-room at night; that it was left sometimes in the sitting-room all night, and was so left, with the key in it, one night in November or December, 1829.

(a) "I give and devise all those my freehold messuages, &c., in, &c., unto and to the use of my *niece Susan Constantia Caswall, eldest daughter of my brother, George Caswall, of Sacomb Park, in the county of Herts, Esquire, her heirs and assigns for ever. I also give and devise all those my freehold messuages, &c., in, &c., to the use of my niece Maria Caswall, second daughter of, &c., her heirs and assigns for ever. I give and bequeath all those my leasehold messuages, &c., in, &c., unto my niece, Eliza Caswall, third daughter of, &c., her executors, administrators, and assigns. I give and devise all my copyhold or customary messuages, &c., in, &c., to the use of my niece, Mary Caswall, fourth daughter of, &c., her heirs and assigns for ever. I bequeath all that my leasehold messuage, No. 33, Davies Street, &c., from and after the expiration of one

* The parts in italic were cut out.

6. That one evening, in or about November, 1829, the housemaid found on the carpet in the dining-room a paper writing, alleged to have been part of, and cut from, the first sheet of the duplicate; that the housemaid put it between the leaves of a book then in the parlour, but during the deceased's life never mentioned her having so done; that after the deceased's death the paper was found in the book by Mr. Round, and that it is now in the same condition as when put into the book. [No other testamentary paper and no other part of the mutilated duplicate could be found.]

7. Pleaded the endorsement on the envelope and also the word "mine," written with pencil on the outer sheet of the will, to be in the deceased's hand-writing.

8. Pleaded uninterrupted affection and regard for her nieces: that they constantly visited the deceased when they were in London: that either Mrs. John Round or Mrs. Bourchier visited her [552] daily during her last illness (the two other nieces being out of England), and were by her directions admitted to her bed-room; and the deceased told Mathews "that she wished Mrs. J. Round to come daily."

9. Pleaded undiminished friendship for Miss Roberts, the sole executrix and residuary legatee; that the deceased corresponded with her, and sent her presents of money and other tokens of regard; that Miss Roberts, for several years prior to and till August, 1817, resided with the deceased, and afterwards visited her for a few weeks in each year.

The evidence entirely sustained the allegation.

Phillimore and Lushington for the executrix.

The King's advocate and Dodson for Mrs. J. Round and Mrs. Bourchier.

Addams and Haggard for Mrs. Green Wilkinson and Mrs. Rolt, cited Pemberton v. Pemberton, 13 Ves. 310 (see Colvin v. Fraser, 2 Hagg. Ecc. 266).

Judgment—Sir J. Nicholl. What upon the face of the instrument are the sound legal construction and presumptions? Suppose that the mutilated instrument alone had been found and that no duplicate had ever existed. This mutilation of the first sheet, leaving the signature untouched, would not be a total revocation: it would be a revocation of those particular devises only (Larkins v. Larkins, 3 B. and P. 16); but there being two [553] papers both in the deceased's possession, the presumption of law would be that by the preservation of one duplicate entire she did not intend a revocation of these particular devises, otherwise she would have mutilated both duplicates. The construction then to be put upon this act of mutilation (for it clearly appears to have been her own act) is, that at most, it was a preparation for a projected alteration, to which she had not finally made up her mind, or which she had abandoned; and therefore she preserved entire the duplicate which she had always retained in her own possession and on which she had written the word "mine."

If upon the face of the paper any doubt could arise, the extrinsic circumstances detailed in the evidence concur in establishing this conclusion. She did not mean to revoke altogether, for she continued to the end of her life on the most affectionate and confidential terms with Miss Roberts, the executrix and residuary legatee. Many of her letters for years past are exhibited, some a few days only before her death. She did not mean to revoke the devises to all her nieces, for those who were living continued to her death on the most affectionate terms with her, the two in town going daily or twice a day to sit with her during her last illness. At the time of the preparation and execution of the paper she was very firm in her intention, and resisted calendar month after my decease, unto my niece, the said S. C. Caswall, her executors, administrators, and assigns; and in case any of them, my said nieces, shall happen to die in my lifetime, or after my decease, and without lawful issue, then I bequeath the estate and premises hereinbefore devised or bequeathed unto her or them respectively, unto the next younger sister of her so dying as aforesaid, and to the heirs, &c., of such next younger sister, according to the nature and quality of the estate." The will then gave two leasehold houses, and 500l. Bank Long Annuities to Miss Roberts, and contained this clause; "I give unto my niece S. C. Caswall all my household goods, furniture, &c. &c., and all other effects and things which shall be in my house at my decease, except monies or securities for money, and except such articles as are herein otherwise bequeathed." The deceased further gave various legacies, and minutely specified the proportions in which her nieces should take her trinkets, furs, and lace, bequeathing "her beads of different colours to be equally divided between her nieces Mary and Ann."

the applications of Mr. Dance to vary the disposition. The mutilation therefore, done in this fanciful mode, could only have been some thoughtless experiment of a projected alteration, which probably did not involve an alteration of all these devises, but only of the wording and description of the nieces, rendered [554] desirable by the death of one of them, and the marriage of the others subsequent to the execution of the will: but whatever the object was, she seems to have abandoned it and to have abided by the original duplicate instrument, the possession of which she retained.

Upon the whole I pronounce for the will: but as the act of the deceased made it necessary to take the judgment of the Court, the parties are entitled to their costs out of the estate.(a)[1]

DEAN v. DAVIDSON. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, 1st Session, 1831.—After the case had stood over some time for further information, the Court, on securities justifying, granted to a residuary legatee administration (with a will of 1801 annexed), on affidavits that the party went to Demerara in 1802, and had not been heard of since 1804, that his mother, who died in 1826, believed him to have died many years before, a bachelor, and without a later will, and that diligent inquiries had been lately made at Demerara, but without obtaining conclusive evidence of his death.

On motion.

James Davidson, the sole executor in the will of Thomas Dean, having been cited by William Dean, a first cousin of the testator and one of the residuary legatees, to accept or refuse probate, or shew cause why administration, with the will annexed, should not be granted, appeared to the decree, and on the 2d Session of Hilary Term, 1829, set forth his petition; that the testator formerly resided in Paternoster Row, but in December, 1803, sailed for Demerara, and left his will, dated the 17th of July, 1801, in his possession: that from the time he left England he, Davidson, had not had any communication with, nor received any information respecting, him, save that in 1828 William Dean had shewed to him a letter written by the testator, and dated Demerara, 1804; that he, Davidson, has no sufficient means [555] of forming a belief whether Thomas Dean be living or dead, and therefore submits whether he ought legally to be called upon according to the decree.

To meet this petition an affidavit was brought in by Mr. Bundy, stating that he had married the mother of Thomas Dean; that since 1804 no letter nor communication had, to his knowledge, been received from him; that a report had reached England of his death, but that his mother did not make any inquiries respecting him, and that she died in 1826, and believed her son to have died a bachelor, and without having left a will of a later date than that of 1801, executed about the time of his coming of age. Two affidavits were filed by William Dean, one stating that in 1828 he caused inquiries to be made in that part of Demerara where the deceased had last been heard of, and that some documents and information of the death of a Mr. Dean had been received in 1829; but as they did not effectually establish the identity, a further letter had been sent for more particulars, which, up to April, 1830, had not been furnished. The other affidavit stated that a bill in Chancery had been filed by certain parties claiming under the will of Thomas Dean, that the deponent was made a defendant, that Davidson had appeared to the bill, and that a reference would be made to the Master to report as to whether the said Dean was dead or alive: and that to obtain affirmative evidence of his death the deponent had used the greatest diligence.

The cause stood over from time to time upon the exhibition of these affidavits; the Court having intimated that, if no further evidence could be procured, it should presume the testator to be [556] dead;(a)[2] when on this day, the death of Davidson being alleged, the administration, with the will annexed, was granted to William Dean: but as the testator might possibly not be dead, the Court directed the securities to justify.

An application was then made by Lushington for the costs incurred on behalf of Davidson; which was opposed by the King's advocate.

(a)[1] See Lambell v. Lambell, infra, 568.

(a)[2] See Doe v. Griffin, 15 East, 293. See also Doe v. Jesson, 6 East, 85. 3 Bac. Abridg. 369. Doe v. Deakin, 4 B. and A. 433. 1 Jac. I. c. 11, s. 2, as to bigamy. 19 Car. II. c. 6, as to leases for lives.

The Court, after ascertaining that the costs did not exceed 10l., allowed 5l. nomine expensarum.

CONYERS v. KITSON. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, 1st Session, 1831.—On a petition respecting the grant of administration, the asserted widow having married, during the deceased's lifetime, another man (since convicted of felony), had a daughter by him, and continuing to cohabit with him, the Court granted administration to the sister, and condemned the widow in costs.

This question respected a grant of administration between a party asserting herself to be the deceased's widow and the sister and admitted next of kin. There were also five nephews and nieces, infants, who were entitled in distribution: they were not before the Court. The interest of Charlotte as the lawful relict of the deceased was confessed by the proctor for the sister in an act of Court. The property did not exceed 2500l., and was invested in the funds. The cause was argued on petition and affidavits.

Lushington and Addams for the sister.

Burnaby and Dodson contrà.

Subsequent marriage is no bar. Webb v. Needham, 1 Add. 494.

[557] Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. Laurence Conyers died on the 10th of April, 1829, intestate, and the question is, to whom administration of his effects shall be granted, whether to Charlotte Conyers, otherwise Moorey, claiming to be his widow, or to Anne Kitson, admitted to be his sister.

The statute (21 Hen. VIII. c. 5) directs administration to be granted to the "widow or next of kin;" leaving it therefore open to the ordinary to grant it to either: and though usually a preference is given to the widow, yet it has always been held and repeatedly been decided that the widow may be set aside and administration, at the discretion of the Court, be granted to the next of kin.(a)[1] This discretion however (like all other cases of judicial discretion) is not to be exercised arbitrarily and capriciously, but on reasonable considerations—it is the boni viri arbitrium.

In the present case some doubt is raised whether the asserted widow ever was legally married to the deceased—whether, at the time of the marriage, she had not another husband living: but as there was a fact of marriage, the Court would primâ facie be disposed to regard her as the lawful widow. Her original name was Perfect; she was first married to a person of the name of Thompson, and supposing or asserting him to be [558] dead, she was in March, 1815, married by banns at Leeds to the deceased, then an apprentice and a minor: but she was described as Charlotte Thompson, spinster—not widow.

Conyers did not long continue to cohabit with her, but enlisted as a soldier, went to Canada, and there remained till his death in 1829. Charlotte—whether Perfect, or Thompson, or Conyers—did not long continue without a husband or asserted husband; for on the 11th of November, 1817, she was married to Thomas Moorey, by the name and description of Charlotte Perfect, spinster. Her identity is not called into question. With Moorey she has ever since cohabited; and they keep a public house called the Black Bull, at Pontefract, and have a daughter residing with them, who is about seven or eight years old, and is acknowledged as their child. This Moorey had the misfortune to be convicted of felony in April last, and to have suffered six months' imprisonment: (a)[2] yet the Court is asked to place the property in such hands.

These facts, then, which are not disputed, are quite sufficient to govern the discretion of the Court. Without entering into the validity of her marriage with the deceased—into her previous character, or subsequent conduct—into what were the

---

(a)[1] In Sayer v. Sayer administration was granted by the Prerogative Court to the son—acting by his guardian: the administration was prayed by the widow. She appealed. 3 Sept. T. T., 1713, the Court of Delegates held that the ordinary had discretionary power in granting the administration, either to the widow or next of kin; and that a minor, acting by his guardian, is within the statute, and equal to a major. See also supra, 217, note (b), and Lambell v. Lambell, infra, 570.

(a)[2] In the act on petition it was stated, on behalf of Mrs. Conyers, that Moorey was convicted on having unsuspectingly purchased a small quantity of oats which were afterwards proved to have been stolen.

deceased's grounds of withdrawing from her—what reasons she had to suppose him dead when she married Moorey—what her subsequent character or conduct has been —what is the good repute or ill fame of the Black Bull public house—[559] without these considerations, her marriage to, or connection with, this now convicted felon—be that marriage valid or that connection only adulterous—is quite sufficent to justify the Court in exercising its discretion of setting aside her claims to the administration as widow, and in preferring those of Mrs. Kitson as the sister. Against Mrs. Kitson's character nothing is said in the act on petition, but one single affidavit (and that a strange one) is offered to impugn it: while there are several affidavits exhibited in support of her fitness and respectability. To her, therefore, the administration must be granted, but she must give justifying security.

There have been a great number of affidavits exhibited, apparently prepared in the country; some of which are quite irrelevant, and might well have been spared. This woman's application to be entrusted, as a fit and proper person, with the administration in the character of the deceased's widow, even supposing her to be legally entitled to that character, was, considering her de facto marriage to, and connection with, Moorey, a bold and rash attempt. Her claim to share in the effects must be established in a different mode; with that the Court at present has nothing to do: this is merely a question who shall have the administration, and does not involve an enquiry into the validity of the marriage. But, being of opinion that her perseverance in pressing her claim to the administration was perfectly unwarrantable, I am bound to condemn her in the costs of the present petition.

[560] IN THE GOODS OF FREDERICK STABLES. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, 4th Session, 1831.—When, after the death of a brother administrator, administration had been revoked, because the mother had not formally renounced, that revocation rescinded on the mother's affidavit that she was aware of her son's application for the administration, and had under it received her distributive share.

On motion.

Frederick Stables died in 1815, a bachelor, and intestate, leaving a mother, and several brothers and sisters. On the 26th of August in that year letters of administration of his effects were granted by this Court to his brother Henry, described in the administration "as the natural and lawful brother, and one of the next of kin of the deceased." At the time this administration was taken there was no formal proxy of renunciation by the mother; she however was perfectly aware of her son's application for the letters of administration, and from time to time received her proportion of the intestate's effects.

Upon the death of Henry Stables, the administrator, it was proposed that the two surviving sisters should take out an administration de bonis non, and, the mother having executed a proxy of renunciation, as well in respect to the original administration as to the de bonis non, the sisters in December last applied for the grant, when the original administration was revoked before a surrogate, on the ground that the mother had not formally renounced previous to the issuing of that grant. To obviate the necessity of administering again to the full amount of the deceased's (F. Stables') property, Haggard, on the above circumstances, and upon the affidavit of the mother, moved the Court to rescind the revocation of the [561] administration, and to decree a de bonis grant to the surviving sisters.

Per Curiam. As the mother was cognizant of and virtually renounced the original grant, I think the former revocation was unnecessary: let it be rescinded, and a grant de bonis pass as required.

IN THE GOODS OF ELIZABETH DARLING. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, 4th Session, 1831.—The Court being bound to satisfy itself that the applicant for an administration is entitled to the grant, great delay in applying, by raising suspicion, justifies it in calling for explanation.

Per Curiam. A circumstance occurred two days ago which the Court feels bound to notice, because it is connected with a subject important both to the profession and to the public at large. Important to the profession, because it relates to the rules according to which the passing of common form business is regulated; and the profession will better understand and more readily give effect to those rules if the reasons for which they were made are explained: important to the public, because it much concerns them—1st, that every facility should exist in obtaining grants, and 2ndly, that such caution and guards should be interposed as afford security against improper grants. It is the object of the Court to provide for both these results; but the difficulty consists in combining them.

Representations have frequently been made as well by public bodies—the bank, the South Sea Company—as by private individuals, in respect to the facility with which grants are obtained—that a party has only to come forward and swear that [562] an individual is dead, and that he is the next of kin, and thereupon immediately obtains the administration. They have accordingly urged the necessity of making some regulations to restrain this facility: nor is it extraordinary, where hundreds of millions pass under the grants of this Court that the necessity of caution should be strongly felt.(a) Proposals at different times have been made that the death and that the party claiming was next of kin should be proved, first by affidavit, and secondly, of the one fact by certificate of burial, and of the other by certificates of marriages and baptisms. Various other modes of providing against frauds have also been suggested. To require, however, in every case proofs of this sort, would be productive of such an inconvenience and expense to the public, and such an interruption to the passing of probates and administrations in common form, as would far more than counterbalance the advantage to be thence derived in the additional security against fraudulent grants, which bear an extremely small proportion to the total number of grants issuing under the seal of this Court: at the same time the Court has always said, "Shew exactly the evil to be guarded against, and a remedy which will not, by imposing extraordinary inconvenience on the public, be an evil greater than that sought to be avoided, and the Court will readily adopt such remedy:" and I will now state that if any rule made by the Court should in practice be [563] found inconvenient, or any other regulation more convenient or effectual could be suggested either by a single practitioner or by any body of practitioners, and subsequently be laid before the registrars to be submitted to the Court, every attention and consideration will be given to such suggestion.

On the principle of combining facility with security, the Court has made some regulations. For example, the time of the death is required to form part of the oath, and to be inserted in the margin of the probate or administration. The reason for this is, that if the time of the death has long past, it becomes reasonable that some enquiry should be made why the grant was not sooner taken out; the delay raises something of a suspicion requiring explanation. By noting the time of the death on the margin, debtors to the estate, whether public bodies, as the bank, or private individuals, have their attention directly drawn to it and are enabled more easily to ascertain that payment is made to the right person. This regulation produces little or no inconvenience, and has given great satisfaction: the effect of it having, as represented to me, been found by the Bank of England and South Sea House to be extremely beneficial. The Court has also publicly mentioned, and desired it to be understood in the registry and in the profession, that it looks for precaution both to the practitioners and to the public office.

On application to any proctor to extract a grant it is his duty, if there be any matter requiring explanation, to obtain that explanation of the party, in order to satisfy his own conscience and the inquiries of the public officer why, for instance, if there has been a considerable lapse of time, the grant was not earlier applied for. It [564] is the duty of the clerk of the seat, before he forwards the business, to require that explanation of the proctor, in order that he may be enabled to state it to the registrar. It is the duty of the registrar, when the grant comes before him for signature, if he sees anything requiring explanation, to refer to the clerk of the seat, and to ascertain whether the difficulty has been removed: and thus, and by inquiry of the proctor (if necessary), to satisfy himself that the grant may properly issue. If the explanation be not satisfactory to the registrar, he is either to stop the business on his own discretion, or to apply to the Judge for his directions. Thus, if

---

(a) The probates and administrations, issuing out of the registry of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, during the years 1828, 1829, and 1830, were—

Total number of grants	30,543.
Total amount of effects	£128,723,362.

each party discharges his duty, it is almost impossible that any improper grant should pass; nor should any trouble be considered too great that leads to the efficient discharge of a public duty. It is quite obvious that these precautions are necessary, and (a statement of the principles on which the regulations on this subject are founded having, as satisfactory to the practitioners, to the clerks of the seats, to the registrars, and to the public at large, been thus publicly made) the Court feels confident that every respectable and intelligent member of the profession will readily and strictly pursue the directions of the Court.

I will now state the case that has given rise to these observations. An administration was brought for the registrar's signature; the party applying was described as the natural and lawful son and one of the next of kin; the deceased had been dead eleven years, a widow with more than one child, in a remote part of the kingdom (Bankhead, Durham), and left property in value exceeding £450 and under £600, and yet no administration [565] had been taken out for eleven years. This was exactly the sort of case in which enquiry ought to be made, and as the party himself was on the spot there could be no difficulty in obtaining the necessary information. The case might be perfectly fair, and, if so, the explanation could be easily furnished: or it might be false and fraudulent, and might originate in one of those circular letters which have been sent all over the kingdom. Again, the person applying, the son, might be just come of age, and might without the knowledge of the other children or of their guardians be endeavouring clandestinely to get possession of this money.

It is true, in a case of recent death, if a party swears that he is one of the next of kin, the grant would issue without enquiry as to the knowledge of the other next of kin. But there is this distinction between the two cases: where a death has recently occurred the attention of all the parties entitled to the representation would naturally be alive; they would either take out the grant themselves; or, expecting such a grant to be applied for by others, would, if they thought it needful, take measures to protect their own interests; ex. gr. if a next of kin whom they deemed unfit for the trust applied, they might shew cause why the Court ought in its discretion to prefer one of the other next of kin, or might take care that the sureties were substantial. So if a fraudulent grant were applied for, speedy detection must almost certainly result from the attention which at such time is specially directed to the deceased's affairs. On the other hand, where a long interval has occurred between the death and application for a representation, the parties interested have frequently no reason to suppose that any such grant is in [566] contemplation, and their vigilance, therefore, is not roused. In such cases surprise is as possible and as much to be guarded against as immediately on the death, when the law provides against it by directing that no administration shall issue within fourteen days from the decease.

In the case now under consideration, the registrar, observing the nature of the grant, asked for some information. When, however, the solicitors were applied to, they sent to the proctor a letter, bearing date on the same day, complaining strongly of the prejudice to which their party was exposed by the unwarrantable delay thus interposed, declining to account for the circumstances why the administration had not before been required, and intimating that, as the statute was imperative on the Court to grant administration to the next of kin without regard to lapse of time, and as their client had come up 300 miles, they should apply to the Court of King's Bench for a mandamus. I have no reason to doubt that these gentlemen are respectable solicitors, and thought they were acting according to their duty to their client, nor do I presume to express an opinion as to what that duty might be.

The statute of administrations, it is true, directs that administration should be granted to the next of kin, but it does not prescribe the mode by which the Court is to satisfy itself that the party applying is the next of kin, and is really entitled to the grant: the Court must be governed by circumstances, as to the measures it shall take for that purpose: but no one can doubt that, in order to afford protection to parties really entitled, and to guard against fraud, it is bound to obtain that satisfaction. The Court will not be deterred from dis-[567]-charging this duty by any threats of applying for a mandamus; and I feel fully confident that, if such application were made, the Court of King's Bench would not only reject it, but would highly approve of the course that has been taken. The Court can have no wish but to do its duty, and the registrar would not, under the directions he has received, have done his duty if he had passed the administration without explanation. Undoubtedly, less delay would have been incurred if the solicitors had at once afforded that explanation, than has already been occasioned by their refusal to furnish it in the first instance. Any inconvenience that may have resulted to their party from the delay is mainly attributable to that refusal.

An explanation, however, was yesterday offered: the proctor, in a letter to the registrar, from which it appears that he knew nothing of his client, enclosed a letter to this effect, that there had been heretofore no occasion to take out this administration, inasmuch as the property of which the deceased was possessed, and for which this administration was applied for, consisted of a reversionary interest not payable till the death of a Mrs. Anderson, and that she died only a short time since.

Who the writer of this letter may be (for he is not one of the solicitors' firm) the Court is not aware. The reason assigned, if properly verified, would be satisfactory; and probably, if offered in the first instance to the registrar, would have been accepted without further verification: but the objection originally shewn to giving the explanation increases the difficulty; I think now that this letter ought to be verified by affidavit, and that the Court would not act with due caution [568] if it accepted as sufficient a note of an unknown person. I feel quite confident that the solicitors, after due consideration of the extreme caution necessary to be observed in granting probates and administrations—which furnish the handle to millions of property—will see the advantage of the regulations established, and of the necessity of the care and precaution used in the registry. The danger is, and the complaints are, on account of the too great facilities afforded, and not of any unnecessary obstructions interposed in the passing of grants.

LAMBELL v. LAMBELL. Prerogative Court, Hilary Term, By-Day, 1831.—A will found in the deceased's repositories with the seal cut off is to be presumed to be cancelled by himself animo cancellandi, and can only be revived by some further act. Costs out of estate. Administration to the widow refused.

[Referred to, Price v. Powell, 1858, 3 H. & N. 350; Bell v. Fothergill, 1870, L. R. 2 P. & D. 150.]

This was a cause of granting administration promoted by the widow against the deceased's brother William, sole executor and residuary legatee named in a will, formally made and bearing date on the 10th of January, 1820.

The allegation, for the brother, pleaded Lambell's death on the 14th of November, 1830; that his property was about 700l.; and that he left a widow, a sister, and two brothers: that in 1822 he went to reside in a lodging in Guernsey, where he died suddenly. That in 1816, suspecting his wife of dishonesty and infidelity, he separated from her, after which she lived in London; that his dislike to her (to be proved by declarations, and a memorandum in his handwriting, annexed to the allegation) continued till his death. That he was under particular obligations to, and had a great affection for, his brother William, and in July and August, 1830, declared he had made his will, and left him the bulk of his property: that on the [569] day after Lambell's death his papers and goods were taken possession of by the Crown officers of the island and sealed up; but that between the death and such possession the papers were accessible to his landlady and to a lodger, who suggested that the deceased had, by word of mouth, given them his property: that on the 26th of November the will was found, by the Crown officers, in a tin case, of which the lid was loose, deposited in a private drawer of the deceased's bureau: that the seal of the will was cut off; and that some words, at the foot of the will, in pencil, were in the deceased's handwriting; but that none of the deceased's friends know to what they referred, or when or by whom the excision took place.

The King's advocate opposed the allegation.

Addams contrà.

Judgment—Sir John Nicholl. The will propounded has on its face the seal torn off. The attestation clause declares that it was signed and sealed, and the seal is cut off. The will was found in the deceased's repositories; it is in ink; but, at the foot of it, are written in pencil, admitted to be in the deceased's handwriting, the following words, which confirm the presumption that the cancellation was his own act: "Your dishonesty to me have caused me to do this.—J. L." It is said that this memorandum may apply to his wife, who is "cut off with a shilling." At all events, however, the will being in the possession of the deceased, and found after his death in his repositories, the presumption is that the cancellation was the act of the deceased [570] animo cancellandi, and that, by that act, he intended to render the will null and void. It is said he might have torn off the name and done some act more effectual: but this is the common mode of revoking.(a)

Having revoked the will by this act it can only be revived by some other act: the circumstances pleaded can at the most raise suspicions and conjectures: it would be extremely dangerous to trust to declarations: besides, he might have subsequently cancelled the will under some mistaken offence against his brother. The property is small; and the Court cannot suffer the parties to expend the whole in fruitless litigation. I shall reject the allegation, and allow the costs out of the estate.(b)

Upon the application of the King's advocate for administration to pass to the widow, the Court said: The grant is discretionary; and as the widow lived separate, I decree it to the brother.(c)

SHADBOLT v. WAUGH AND OTHERS.(d) Prerogative Court, Easter Term, 3rd Session, 1831.—The presumption being that a will when executed contains the deceased's final intentions, to authorize an alteration on the ground of mistake there must be 1st, an ambiguity in the paper; 2dly, clear proof of the omission.—Allegation pleading omissa rejected.

J. Crowder died on 30th November, 1830. His will, contained in six sheets of paper, was regularly executed and attested, and dated on the 14th of February, 1830. Of this will he appointed his brother, who survived him only two days, residuary legatee, and Mr. Shadbolt and two other [571] gentlemen executors. The present allegation was offered with a view to furnish evidence to the Court that certain bequests (one of a leasehold house in Woburn Place to Mrs. Waugh) had by oversight been omitted by the testator in giving instructions for his will. The bequests were in a paper of memoranda or instructions (registered No. 3) from which he had dictated, but declined to shew to the solicitor who drew, his will. The will itself was prepared without a previous draft. Declarations subsequent to the execution of the will, that he had disposed of his property in conformity with the paper of instructions, were pleaded; and it was also alleged that the testator gave the paper itself to his housekeeper to keep in order that she might know how he had disposed of his property.

Addams in opposition to the allegation, cited Lady Bath's case, 3 Phill. 434.

The King's advocate contrà, referred to the case of Mr. Baron Wood's Will, 3 Add. 232.

